A German girl, after having been called on by her lover, will put a star flower or dandelion in water and leave it there until his next visit, drawing an omen from its condition, while a Spanish maiden will take a moss rosebud, wear it on her breast, and if it expands to become a perfect flower the omen is considered exceedingly fortunate. A superstition of the same kind is shown by the East Indian maiden who places a poppy in her hair. In England the primrose is used for the same purpose, and in country districts of New England the spikes of the rib wort plantain are taken, wrapped in dock leaves, placed beneath a stone, and if the next day signs of new buds appear the omen is considered happy.

In France young ladies desirous of ascertaining the extent of a lover's affection take the common daisy and pull off its leaves one by one, with the question. "Does he love me? Does he love me little? Does he love me much? Does he love me with all his soul?" Marguerite in "Faust" uses the common blue bottle with similar questions. In England the ash leaf is sometimes employed to ascertain the faithfulness of an absent lover, and the Irish maiden learns of her future by putting a shamrock in her shoe, after which she walks abroad, and the first man she meets or one of his name will be her husband.—New York Advertiser.

ALIAS SUMMONS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE County of Inyo, State of California.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the County of Inyo, State of California, and the complaint filed in said County of Inyo in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

Victor Trepier Plaintiff, vs Jaques Jalberque and Manasese Louca, Defendants:

The people of the State of California send greeting to Jaques Jalberque and Manasese Louca, Defendants:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the County of Inyo State of California, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this Inyo County, or, if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain the judgment of this Hon. Court dissolving the partnership heretofore and now existing between yourselves and the Plaintiff, under and by virtue of an agreement made and entered into by you on the 30th day of October, 1893, and that the title to the mines or mining claims described in said agreement may be adjudged freed from all the conditions thereof and restored as follows: That the Plaintiff is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "American Flag Mine;" that Defendant Jaques Jalberque is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "French Flag Mine" and that Defendant Manasese Louca is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "Mexican Flag Mine," as said mines are described in said agreement and the complaint of file herein; Together with the costs of suit.

Said plaintiff alleging that you have utterly failed, neglected and refused to in any manner whatsoever comply with the terms and conditions of said partnership agreement, or to perform any of the duties imposed thereby, since on or about the 27th day of January, 1894; as will more fully appear by reference to the complaint on file herein.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, said plaintiff will apply to Court for the relief demanded in said complaint.

Witness my hand and the Seal of said Superior Court of the County of Inyo, State of California, this 27th day of June, A. D. 1894.

Lost—A pair of spectacles between the residences of C. W. Craig and A. V. Davidson. Any person finding the same will confer a favor by returning to A. V. Davidson.

In this issue will be found the announcement of Andy Dell of Bishop as a candidate for the office of Assessor. The gentleman is an old resident of Inyo County, well and favorably known. He is familiar with property values and if elected will perform the duties of that most important office without fear or favor.

John Keegan and Arthur Robinson arrived home on Wednesday from Mammoth where they have been rusticating for the past month. Arthur has been in very poor health for a long time past and went to Mammoth with the hope of being benefited by the mineral springs there, and we regret to say that he was not helped thereby.

J. A. Shelhamer and M. C. Parmley of Pasadena were at Independence early in the week on business in the local Land Office. Mr. Shelhamer informed us that his artesian well-boring plant has arrived at Keeler and he will soon have it in running order. With sufficient water a very large area of excellent land can be made productive near Olancha.

Committee Meeting

A meeting of the Inyo County Democratic Central Committee is hereby called to meet at Independence, Cal., on Monday, August 13, 1894, at 7:30 o'clock p. m., for the purpose of selecting the time and place for holding the County Convention, and setting a day upon which the primaries are to be held, and attending to any other business that may come before said Committee. It is urgently requested that all Committeemen attend. A. W. EIBESHUTZ, IRV. H. MULHOLLAND, Chairman. Sec'y.

INYO COUNTY

The exposition series of the Illustrated Pacific States contains the following:

"The display of Inyo County at the Midwinter Fair, although not extensive or pretentious, was decidedly interesting. It was composed entirely of mineral specimens, prominent among which were the exhibits of the Inyo Marble Company. The display was located in the northeastern part of the Mechanic Arts Building, and attracted the attention of all who passed along the northern aisle of that building. The Executive Committee having in charge the interests of the county at the Fair, was composed as follows: P. H. Mack, Chairman; Bertrand Rhine, Secretary; A. W. Eibeshutz, Treasurer; G. P. Rixford, Manager.

The Committee circulated at the Fair a neat little folder, from which we glean some facts relative to the county that may be interesting to our readers;

The county is third in area in the State, being exceeded only by San Diego and San Bernardino. As to topography it consists of a succession of lofty mountain ranges, with valleys between, of which Owens Valley is the most extensive and most improved. The Sierra Nevada, as seen from Owens Valley, is the grandest mountain range on the continent, the lofty peaks rearing their snowy heads to altitudes of 10,000 to 14,500 feet. Mount Whitney, the highest mountain in the United States, 14,552 feet above the sea, and Death Valley, at one point the lowest depression in North America, 480 below the sea, are both in Inyo County.

The climate is mild in winter, with snow at rare intervals, except on the lofty mountains, and warm and dry in summer, free from malaria, and as healthy as any climate in the world. The summer heat is never oppressive, owing to the altitude, and the nights are always cool.

Owens Valley contains about 500,000 acres of tillable land, all within five or six miles of the railroad, much of it still open to entry under the desert land and other land laws, at the Government price of $1.25 per acre. Patented land under ditches already completed or in course of construction correspondingly cheap, say $10 to $50 per acre, the latter with improvements.

All the grains, vegetables and forage plants grown anywhere in the State are raised successfully, and all the nuts and fruits, except the citrus varieties, grow to perfection. No finer apples, pears, plums, peaches, apricots, prunes and grapes are grown in the State. Hops, tobacco, cotton and peanuts are successfully grown. Inyo honey was awarded a gold medal at the Midwinter Fair.

The county is pre-eminently adapted to stock raising. Alfalfa produces three crops per year, aggregating 8 to 10 tons per acre, while the unimproved and government land, including the natural meadows and other grazing in the mountains, affords an almost limitless summer range.

Inyo has always been prominent as a mining county. Its mountains have produced millions in gold, silver and lead, and are rich in iron, copper, antimony, zinc, tin and bismuth, while the saline marshes produce borax and salt, and Owens Lake carbonate of soda in enormous quantities. The marble deposits are inexhaustible, and are now producing some of the most beautiful white, black and colored marble in the world.

The principal towns of the county are: Bishop, population 1,000; Independence, 650, county seat and location of U. S. Land office; Lone Pine, 300; Big Pine, 300; Keeler, 250.

The county is reached by rail from San Francisco, via the Central Pacific to Reno, Nevada; thence south via the Virginia & Truckee and Carson & Colorado, the latter traversing the whole length of Owens Valley. Or the traveler may go into the county by stage from Mojave, on the southern Pacific."

Darwin Road.

At a meeting of the citizens of the 5th Road District, held at Darwin, Inyo Co., Cal., August 3d, 1894, at which meeting Capt. E. A. Reddy was chosen as Chairman and R. Decker, Secretary, it was

1. RESOLVED, That owing to the condition of the wagon road leading from Keeler to Darwin by the old Toll House it was impassable for present traffic and in the future an impossibility to keep the same in repair without great expense to this road district.

2. That it was the sense of the meeting that a new road should be constructed, commencing at a point in Toll House canyon, about five hundred (500) feet, more or less, northwesterly of the old Toll House; thence, running northwesterly to a point about one half (½) mile north of Jenkin's corral, connecting with the Darwin and Keeler wagon road.

3. It was resolved that our Supervisor, Frank Fitzgerald, Esq., be and is hereby requested to obtain the necessary funds from the General Road Fund of this county to aid in the construction of said road at next regular meeting of said Board of County Supervisors.

4. Resolved, That Chas. Anthony, Esq., be and is hereby requested to receive all contributions and take charge of all funds in aid of repair and construction of said road.

5. And it was further resolved to publish minutes of meeting in the INYO INDEPENDENT.

Whereupon the meeting adjourned subject to call of the Chairman.

R. DECKER, Secretary. E. A. REDDY, Chairman.

Likes the Country.

G. W. Lacey of Texas arrived at Independence on Thursday's train, having come up from Los Angeles via the Keeler and Mojave stage. Mr. Lacey owns considerable property in Texas but is desirous of making a new home in a more pleasant climate. Having become interested in Owens Valley through reading a pampelet published by Hon. C. Mulholland he determined to come up here and investigate. In a conversation this morning he expressed himself as being highly pleased with the country and that he would in all probability return here for the winter. He went up the Valley this morning in company with John Collins for the purpose of examining the extensive and valuable property owned by the Collins' at Warm Spring. Mr. Lacey states that a number of his Texas neighbors will also come here for the purpose of making homes.

Free Silver Club.

Writing at Big Pine on August 5th J. R. Eldred sends the following: "We of the Peoples Party at Big Pine organized a Club called the Big Pine Free Silver Club No 1 On Saturday July 30 we re-organized the Club with seventeen members. On Saturday August 4th the Club met and the membership had grown to twenty-eight. Owing to the rapid growth the Club concluded to take steps towards organizing the County and did so by appointing the following named members as an Executive Committee for the Central Committee to be filled out later. J. R. Eldred, Chairman; Thomas Callow, Secretary; P. W. McMurry, E. H. Blake, C. J. Schalten, D. W. Pitman, Eugene Smith The members of the Club are very enthusiastic and intend to get out a straight Peoples Party Ticket, Supervisor Fitzgerad has been hard at work for two weeks past repairing the road between Keeler and Darwin. As a large quantity of ore will be hauled over this road in the next few months Mr. Fitzgerald is determined to put it in as good condition as possible.

UNITED STATES LAND OFFICE,
INDEPENDENCE, CALIFORNIA,
August 7, 1894.

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN:

Notice is hereby given that the Southern Pacific Railroad Company has filed in this office a list of the lands situated within the townships described below, and has applied for a patent for said lands; that the list is open to the public for inspection, and a copy thereof, by descriptive subdivisions, has been posted in a convenient place in this office, for the inspection of all persons interested, and the public generally. Within the next sixty days, following the date of this notice, protests, or contests against the claim of the railroad company to any tract or subdivision described in the list, on the ground that the same is more valuable for mineral than agricultural purposes, will be received and noted for report to the General Land Office at Washington, D. Be on your Guard.

If some grocers urge another baking powder upon you in place of the "Royal," it is because of the greater profit upon it. This of itself is evidence of the superiority of the "Royal." To give greater profit the other must be a lower cost powder, and to cost less it must be made with cheaper and inferior materials, and thus, though selling for the same, give less value to the consumer.

To insure the finest cake, the most wholesome food, be sure that no substitute for Royal Baking Powder is accepted by you.

Nothing can be substituted for the Royal Baking Powder and give as good results.

Beatrix Randolph.

By JULIAN HAWTHORNE.

At times, too, as the dishes were passed, the lovely speaker would lean toward him, so that her soft white plumage brushed his shoulder. The Marana and Wallie were having a most entertaining conversation. It was not about architecture, and yet Bellingham felt attracted by it. Wallie was smiling and chuckling, and ever and anon making some pithy or arch remark. The diva seemed to be attempting to describe the mental visions which certain kinds of music called up for her. At last she said, "The end is like 'the awful rose of dawn,' and it seems to keep unfolding more and more, but the twilight darkens between, and you can only feel that the great flower blooms at last in the morning of the other world."

At the same moment Mrs. Bright was saying to Bellingham: "In that way, don't you see, the second and third boxes would have just as good a view of the stage as the first, and yet the parquet wouldn't lose anything. Now, isn't that a nice plan?"

Either Bellingham had not heard her or else he didn't think it worth while to answer. He turned to the young diva and said, "That must be Beethoven."

Wallie's eyebrows went up. He had been quietly watching Bellingham, and had been much amused by his evident distraction and final surrender. He asked Mr. Knight, in the second seat on his left, whether it were true that Grant intended to found a college of politics in Mexico, and left the young people to arrange themselves as they liked.

Mrs. Bright turned pale, took up a silver pepper box, and overwhelmed her croquette de volaille with red pepper. Blinded by her indignation, she was on the point of putting a piece of the highly condimented viand in her mouth, when Gen. Inigo, who was on her left, and who had been assimilating his nourishment with knife, fork and forefinger, and vast enjoyment of champing and deglutition, hurriedly set down the glass of sherry he was raising to his lips, and with great good nature arrested the young lady's hand by laying his own fat paw upon it. "My dear madam," he exclaimed with his unctuous Hebraic drawl, "would you commit suicide at a able like this?"

"Oh, I'm awfully obliged," returned Mrs. Bright, really feeling so on more accounts than one, though she had never before been able to endure that horrid free and easy impresario. She overcame her repugnance, and recouped herself for Bellingham's scant courtesy by extracting whole hogsheads of it from the ample reservoirs of her other neighbor. After all it amounted to the same thing. So a woman receives attention, it is small odds whence it comes.

Bellingham and the diva meantime had taken a short cut to a mutual understanding, and would have been astonished, had they stopped to think about it, at the vistas of sympathetic feeling that were opening up before them. Sunshine arose on their way, and they rambled onward at their will. To talk with the prima donna on a subject that attracted her was like drawing harmonies from some exquisite instrument. She responded to the lightest touch, and you could see the promise and invitation of music in her face before you spoke. Bellingham forgot that this was the woman whose adventures and audacities everybody had been discussing for weeks past; she was to him a delicious outlet for a part of his nature which he had heretofore repressed even when by himself; so the seed first discovers itself in the earth, and the flower in the sunlight.

When, half an hour ago, he had been presented to Mlle. Marana in the drawing room he had felt that she was beautiful, but remembered that she must be repellent, and had passed on without a second look. She, on the other hand, had been sensitive to his hostility, told herself that he looked cross and frigid, and thought it fortunate that he was an architect instead of a singer, liable to appear with her on the stage. But now, under the mingled persuasion of happy accident and the genial stimulus of lights, company and the table, their averted regards had unawares turned to accord—an accord which might prove temporary, but was certainly delightful. It was strange to both of them, but with the sort of strangeness that seems like a sweet familiarity till now forgotten. Now they would let air and warmth into the secret chambers of their minds; now they could read the answer to their spiritual riddles in each other's face.

At the other end of the table Mrs. Cadwalader was prospering blithesomely with Mr. Grasmere on one hand and Mr. Barclyffe on the other. The conversation was of an æsthetic cast—would the Wagnerian method of musical composition prevail, and if so, would not music ultimately be chargeable with bringing on the preserves of the other arts? Mr. Barclyffe, propping up his mustache occasionally with his napkin, was of opinion that music was the soul and reconciliation of all the arts, and that a knowledge of music would henceforth be indispensable to enable the painter, the sculptor and the poet to do their work intelligently. "As to architecture," added he, "we all know that in its higher manifestations it has been termed frozen music." "Some of Wagner's music that I have heard," retorted Mr. Grasmere, "was dry enough to be called harmonized hay lofts."

This epigram was overheard by Mr. Damon at the center of the table, and he immediately called out, "There's a portrait of Grasmere down at the club that is said to have been painted to the tune the old cow died of." Hereupon Mr. Bidgood burst into a hearty laugh, and observed that the old cow probably died from feeding on the harmonious hay loft. Mr. Grasmere, who was probably of Scotch extraction, drew himself up to his full height and said to Mrs. Cadwalader, with a gleam from beneath his eyelids, that such men as the last two speakers did more than vice or ignorance to delay civilization. Mrs. Cadwalader smiled with scarlet lips, and said in her small, caressing voice, "The proprietor of the 'Professional Amateur' cannot believe that civilization is delayed."

If there was any further danger of a breach of the peace it was averted by the action of Wallie, who now arose in his place and proposed the health of the guest of the evening. "Though our guest to-night," he said, "she is a host in herself; and if she was born in a foreign land, we all know that some of the truest Americans have never set foot in the United States." The toast having been drunk with much cordiality, Wallie added, "I didn't learn that speech by heart, ladies and gentleman, but that is where it came from."

When the applause had subsided there was a pause, and the prima donna perceived with a beating heart that everybody's eyes were fixed upon her, as if expecting a reply. She cast a dismayed look at Bellingham, but his eyes were cast down, and an expression of coldness had suddenly overspread his face. She drew a long breath, and rose, with a soft rustle of her white dress, and glanced down the table. She heard the clapping of hands, and saw Jocelyn smiling and nodding encouragingly, and Inigo hammering the table and beaming unctuously. The thought passed through her mind, "I am not myself; they are applauding some one else." Instead of disconcerting her, this thought gave her self possession.

"Ladies and gentlemen," she began, "I did not learn a speech; where I came from we did not make them. Sometime I shall sing you my thanks. But I feel now how kind you are. A little while ago I knew nothing of you, and now we are friends! Your belief in me will help me to deserve it. All this seems hardly real to me—as if it were not possible. It is not I who speak to you, but the music, that is the reason of my being here. And yet I should like to have you like me for myself—else I should feel very lonely. I have only my music to take the place of my mother and my father. It is a great deal, I know, but not quite everything. And I cannot help feeling almost as if it stood between me and you. It is a disguise that I must wear, and I know that the disguise is better than what is beneath it."

Here her eye happened to encounter Jocelyn's. He was gazing at her apparently in much anxiety, and his lips seemed to be forming some voiceless words. The prima donna did not know what he meant, but she stopped and reflected that she was thinking aloud instead of making a speech, and that what she was thinking had more reference to the blue eyed man with the brown beard who sat on her right than to any one else in the room; whereupon a blush rose to her face, she murmured something hardly articulate, and sat down. Everybody smiled and applauded and seemed to be much pleased.

"My God, what an actress!" muttered Mr. Beaufort to his neighbor, Mrs. March. "The delicious audacity of that last sentence was inimitable!"

"She must be very clever," returned the lady, veiling her business mouth with the bouquet she carried; "but how very noticeable her foreign accent is!"

"Ach! well, my dear, it has been a long time before I could come to dalk so as one would not know I was German," put in Miss Korner charitably. "Mademoiselle shpeak very well for a beginner."

"They say the Russians are a very superstitious people," remarked Mr. Plainter, putting up his eye glasses; "I must remember to ask Miss Marana whether she has ever investigated any of the phenomena. She looks like a medium herself; I should like to investigate, under rigorously scientific tests, the range and quality of her abnormal capacities."

"Since meeting Mlle. Marana," said Mr. Knight, addressing Wallie, but graciously pitching his voice so as to be overheard by the diva, "I no longer marvel at Russian despotism. I should be a slave myself were I her countryman—nay, my slavery has begun even as it is!"

"By George! old fellow," whispered Jocelyn aside to the general, "hanged if I didn't think for a moment the girl was going to give us away!"

"Don't you believe it," the general mumbled in reply. "She ain't going to give us away, nor give herself away, neither—not to you, anyhow, and don't you forget it!"

The dinner came to an end, the ladies withdrew, and the gentlemen presently followed them to the drawing room. People were already arriving for the reception, and the room was getting crowded. A number of immaculate young gentlemen, in tight fitting evening dress, were reaching over their shirt collars to get a glimpse of the notorious Marana. There was an unintermittent buzz of talk that made it difficult to hear anything that was said. The ladies were numerous and brilliantly dressed, but many of them looked a little uneasy, as if they suspected they were assisting at a somewhat hazardous enterprise. The prima donna wore on her breast a locket set with diamonds that had belonged to her mother.

"Say, Witman," said one of the young gentlemen above mentioned to another, "did you notice the locket?"

"Haven't been able to get up to her yet, confound it! Does she speak English?"

"Pretty well, I believe; I spoke French with her. Full of the devil!"

"What about the locket?"

"Given to her by the czar of Russia, before he came into the business."

"By Jove! Say, does a fellow have to be introduced, or can you go right up and talk to her?"

"Oh, sail in! She won't mind. These women always like to be taken by storm!" So Mr. Witman struggled forward to try his luck as a stormer.

Bellingham, after wandering about restlessly in the crowd trying to keep his back turned toward the diva, and finding himself, nevertheless, constantly brought up within a few feet of her, at length made up his mind to go home. But just as he was on the point of bidding adieu to Mrs. Cadwalader some one struck a chord on the piano, a hush fell upon the assembly, and it became evident that the Marana was going to sing. And there she stood at the piano, the pure loveliness of her countenance looking across the crowd, and looking at him. He folded his arms and stood still, and no one but he knew that she sang to him.

When the song was over there was a great stir of admiration and surprise and comment; for though everybody had expected something very good nobody seemed to have anticipated that it would be good precisely in the way it was; and they all tried to express what they thought in suitable language, with indifferent results. It takes the world some time to formulate its opinion accurately about a new thing. As for Bellingham, whatever he may have thought, he expressed nothing. He simply pushed his way through the throng that surrounded the singer, took her hand, looked in her eyes and said, "Good night!" Strange to say this unceremonious behavior seemed to satisfy her; a glow of pleasure mounted to her face, and thereafter she appeared light hearted and content. Bellingham went away immediately afterward, and without saying good night to any one else.

At the end of the evening Jocelyn sauntered up to Wallie, and putting both hands on his host's shoulders said, "Well, old man, what do you think of her?"

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Luck in Dropping a Collar Button.

A lady who had been staying in Albany was returning to her home in Philadelphia by way of the Hudson river and New York. After spending a night on the boat, her pocketbook, which contained her ticket and all her money, was missing. She was quite sure that it was in her pocket when she went to her stateroom at night, but in the morning the most minute search of the room and of her clothing failed to bring it to light. A fellow passenger lent her sufficient money for her ticket to Philadelphia, and once at home the loss of the pocketbook quickly passed from her memory.

Two years afterward, when again in Albany, she was summoned one day to the drawing room to speak to an unknown gentleman who "had something important to communicate to her." The "something important" proved to be the old lost pocketbook, which the gentleman had just found on a Hudson river boat and which—having in it the lady's name with an Albany address—he had no difficulty in taking directly to her. The account which he gave of the discovery was most amusing. While dressing his collar button had slipped from his hand and, with the total depravity characteristic of collar buttons and other inanimate things, had rolled to the least accessible corner of the stateroom.

In the course of his search for it he had opened wide the half closed door of the stationary washstand and there—in a corner, covered with dust and mold—was the pocketbook, which must have lain in that exact position for two whole years.—Home Journal.

A MIXED ORDER.

The Metaphysical Husband Tries to Carry Out His Practical Wife's Ideas.

"John," said the practical wife to her metaphysical husband, "I wish you would go down street and get me three yards of white lace and two pounds of sirloin steak."

John, who took no earthly interest in anything less abstruse than Kant's philosophy, started off on his errand, repeating his wife's command over and over on the way, lest he should forget it.

"Three yards of white lace and two pounds of sirloin steak. Three yards of white lace and two pounds of sirloin steak," he kept repeating over and over all the way to the store. But before he arrived the steak and the lace were badly mixed in his mind. When he entered the dry goods store, he was repeating rapidly to himself:

"Three pounds of sirloin lace and two yards of white steak. Two yards of white sirloin and three pounds of steak lace."

He was conscious that he was somewhat mixed, but he knew he wanted lace of some kind. So he marched up to the young saleswoman and boldly said:

"I want some lace."

"Yes, sir," she replied. "What kind, please?"

"Sirloin lace, I believe."

"Why, really," replied the saleswoman, "that must be a new variety which we have not yet secured. Are you sure that is the name?"

"No," said John. "I only know I want three pounds of lace of some sort."

"But we do not sell it by the pound," said the saleswoman, repressing the giggle that it racked her immortal soul to hold in.

"Well, then," said John, "I'll take three gallons."

"We do not sell it by the gallon either," she said, holding in the earthquake snicker that was bursting within her. "We sell it by the yard."

"Well, then, give me three yards," said John, "but be sure it is not stale. I always insist upon having fresh food upon my table."

"But lace isn't food," said the saleswoman.

"Isn't it?" asked John innocently. "Well, give me three pounds—er—yards of it, whatever it is, and let me get off."

"But what kind do you want, sir?" asked the saleswoman. "Point lace, applique, beaded, Brussels, Chenille, Cluny, Mechlin, Honiton, Dresden, Valenciennes, Damarascene, antique or Saxony?"

"I don't know," said John. "I guess you better turn them all in the can together, stir 'em round and mix 'em up, and then I shall be sure of getting some of the kind my wife wanted me to get."

The irrepressible giggle here burst forth, and the saleswoman's life was saved.

After she had recovered from her spasm of laughter she said:

"Perhaps you can assist me some in selecting the lace if you will tell me for what purpose your wife wants it."

"Well, she is putting up canned peaches," said John. "Perhaps she wants to put the lace in them."

Here another giggle came to the exploding point, and John turned on his heel and went out in disgust.

Although he went away mad, he resolved to finish his errand as best he could. So he went into the butcher's and said he wanted three yards of steak, but he couldn't remember for the life of him whether it was applique, Damarascene, Valenciennes or antique steak that he was after.

When John arrived home without either his lace or his steak, his wife said, "It is just as I expected."—New York World.

A Possibility.

That there is a mysterious association in some minds between the workings of the different perceptive faculties is not a new observation. In not a few instances the poet's eye has anticipated in its sweep the revelations of the lens of science. The coming man may yet be able to hear a September landscape, with all its changing tints of beauty, as plainly as the rudimentary man now on earth hears the thunder or the rushing of the autumn winds. In that age yet to be evolved the pioneer labors of Gruber will not fail to be treasured up and honored as contributions to the development and well being of humanity.

His Planets.

A young gentleman was passing an examination in physics. He was asked, "What planets were known to the ancients?"

"Well, sir," he responded, "there were Venus and Japiter, and"—after a pause—"I think the earth, but I am not quite certain."—London Punch.

In these days when the severest tests are applied in every department of athletic exercise, walking, running, bicycle riding, tennis, etc., those who share in the contests must provide against emergiences. Harry Brooks, the champion walker, gives the result of twenty years' experience as follows:

"Numerous statements relative to the merits of different plasters having been brought to my attention, I take this opportunity to state that I have used ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS for over 20 years and prefer them to any other kind. I would furthermore state that I was very sick with catarrh of the kidneys, and attribute my recovery entirely to ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS."

NEARING THE GRAVE.

In old age infirmities and weakness hasten to close the gap between us and the grave. Happily scientific research and pharmacal skill have allied themselves in furnishing us a reliable means of ameliorating the ailments incident to declining years, and of renewing waning physical energy. Its name is Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, a widely comprehensive remedy in disease, and an inestimable blessing to the elderly, the feeble and the convalescent. Rheumatic ailments, trouble with the kidneys and lumbago are among the more common ailments of the aged. These are effectually counteracted by the Bitters, which is likewise a prevention and curative of malarial complaints, dyspepsia, constipation and biliousness. It is highly promotive of appetite, sleep and the acquisition of vigor.

DEAFNESS CANNOT BE CURED

By local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure Deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

Not? If Not, Why Not? ?

The Gas and Gasoline Engine is rapidly taking the place of all other small power, and having noticed many inferior machines on the market, poorly constructed, we have been prompted to make a machine of superior merit and workmanship, and do away with all of their objectionable features.

We are constructing these engines of the best material, and using wrought-iron and steel liberally, and not throwing them together, which is the case with a great many other manufacturers of gas engines. Our aim being to excel all others in workmanship.

HERCULES ENGINES

For Simplicity They are The Best! Can be run on natural or illuminating gas.

GAS ENGINES — Our Gas Engines consume about twenty cubic feet of gas per horse-power per hour. Our Gasoline Engines consume about one-eighth of a gallon of gasoline per hour per horse-power.

GASOLINE ENGINES — All Engines fitted with governor attachment, which regulates the supply of gas, according to power used.

GAS ENGINES — The full actual horse power of every engine is guaranteed.

GASOLINE ENGINES — Workmanship the best. Expense does not start until you commence to run the engine.

GAS ENGINES — A boy can start them. They run with a cheaper grade of gasoline than other engines.

GASOLINE ENGINES — They oil from feed-cups, and are almost altogether automatic. Send for catalogue and testimonials.

GAS ENGINES — Have fewer parts, therefore are less likely to get out of order than any other engine now built.

LOVE THAT LOITERS.

They will bring their hoarded kindness
When our ears are deaf to love;
When the grasses wave above
And bewail their present blindness.

When we cannot heed regret
They will waste their shallow tears,
As if such could pay arrears
Or discharge the living debt.

They must know we shall not crave
Sunshine in yon grim retreat;
Gifts of life, however sweet,
Yet they keep them for the grave.

Though the grave has but despair,
And but hollow echoes wait
All who knock at that weird gate,
Still they pour their treasure there.

Let the snowy shaft aspire;
We shall never read the lie;
Grief uprears the marble high,
But remorse can rear it higher.

They will come when we are dead,
When to love our lips are dumb;
Then our laggard friends will come
And strew flowers overhead.

AMADO.

I had not seen Sawyer—"Cal," as we called him—since we parted at Harvard upon commencement day, when, full of fervor and the class punch of '81, we swore to keep one another in sight. Cal went home and into leather, and I to a desk in Wall street. Now, five years later, I had almost run over my old college mate in my nightly mad rush for the L. I seized him by the arm and bore him along, postponing apologies until I had him packed into my little up town flat and introduced to my wife, who was the dearest woman on earth to me still, and who I knew could comfort and console the tall Californian as I could not, for I had already discovered that Sawyer had come east in pursuit of the einige Weibliche.

When dinner was over my wife slipped away to see if the baby was really sleeping as only such "bald headed tyrants" can, leaving us unnecessary and irresponsible men smoking and reminiscencing in my den of 5 by 9.

Suddenly a blow on the door startled Sawyer almost out of his chair.

"His majesty wishes to come in," I said, rising and opening the door.

"What a magnificent brute!" exclaimed Sawyer.

"Not 'brute,' if you please, Cal, but my friend. Amado, kindly shake hands with my old friend here and then compose yourself. You know your are rather pervasive in a room of this size."

My mastiff gravely did as he was bid and then settled himself at my side with a thud that made the things shake on the table.

"That's about the only uncivilized thing about him," I said, laughing. "He still remembers that his wild ancestors had to make their bed in the wilderness and crushed the tangle of vine and root under them."

Sawyer, who was quite as much of an animal lover as myself, knelt down beside the dog, fairly running over his points of beauty and of breeding—his coat of delicate fawn, silvery on flank and shoulder; his breadth of chest and strength of loin, the velvet blackness of his muzzle, the whiteness of his teeth, the clear brown of his eyes, the pure, rich scarlet of his tongue, the black markings of the mouth and the sinewy power of his straight, wide paws.

"Where did you find such a magnificent dog, you enviable fellow?" asked Sawyer as he seated himself and relighted his cigar.

"Dear old chum! He is getting passive and rheumatic. I've owned him now three years, and I've never yet regretted the small fortune I had to pay to get him from the former owner—a person wholly unworthy to possess even a pug. But it is for better reasons than points or pedigree that he is beloved next to the boy, and even the boy can't put his nose out of joint. He was the deus ex machina that gave me my wife."

"Ah! That sounds interesting," said Sawyer. "Tell me the whole story. I've confided to you my plight, and you won't find a better listener."

I had never before felt the least inclination to babble of my own affairs, past or present, but if I could soothe and distract the mind of this old classmate that was plainly my duty. "Very well, then, here goes for it. You will find it as mild as a homœopathic pellet, but it was interesting enough to me." I said this with well affected indifference, but was really eager to begin.

"Margaret—my wife—and I had grown up together in a little town in southern Ohio. You know the kind perhaps—everything pastoral and religious, all church and no chaperons—where the boys and girls were allowed the utmost liberty, a liberty, it must be admitted, they did not abuse, but used and enjoyed with a sort of sturdy sanity and self respect impossible in this sophisticated, crowded city of conventionalities. We—she and I—lived side by side and held long and confidential conversations over the stiff, green wire fence that separated our grape arbor from her bed of tea roses. I saved the last sweet, frosty bunch for her, and at the first chill hint of winter helped her cover her roses with straw, making their tall stalks into queer, angular scarecrows for Jack Frost's terrifying.

"My mother was a New Englander, and the thirst for knowledge of books and men that smoldered in her breast flamed into power for her only son, and so I was sent to Harvard. While still a freshman I came to regard my native town as the vanishing point in the perspective of an inglorious past. With what a lofty smile I should have received the hint that the dark eyed little girl whom I had left to tie her roses alone might one day amply avenge all my slights!

"I concealed my boyish delight in life under the most pronounced and classic 'indifferentism,' and I wonder even now how ever my mother could put up with me. My old friends laughed at my airs and my reformed accent, secretly disliking and envying me. I naturally found it much pleasanter to spend my vacations in the soothing atmosphere of beings like myself, after a brief visit to my mother.

"During these occasions I saw Margaret only once or twice, and always carried away the disturbing impression that she was in no way impressed either by my superior manners or talents. This was slightly annoying, as she was far and away prettier than any girl of my acquaintance, east or west. To be sure, I had made her blush—such an exquisite red—but it was with vexation. Upon my first departure we had written one another quite regularly, but about the middle of my first year I received a letter from her, in which she professed humbly to believe that her western ways were but a burden to such an exalted being as I had become—and wrote no more. Her letters were so fresh and individual that I missed them, but I was fatuous enough to accept her silence as a simple hearted tribute to my worth. I say, Sawyer, when a man is a fool how many different ways he finds to show it!"

"Or when he is in love!" added Sawyer ruefully.

"That stage was to come soon enough. Along the last months of the year I had caught 'winged words' here and there regarding some not impossible she, spending a year in Boston, who had become a creator of contention between various givers of college 'spreads.' You were in '80 and of course not interested. Would this she accept one or all of the invitations showered upon her? Would she like Van Rensselaer's rooms best, filled as they were with old colonial furniture and silver, or would she prefer to linger at Tarrey's, in a purely Bohemian atmosphere, with boxing gloves and burrings?

"The affair promised to be interesting, and I was bent upon being a witness possibly myself not wholly unnoticed. It was therefore with a very bad grace that I read in a letter from my mother that Margaret Burton was in Boston and asking me to see that she was suitably initiated into the preciousness of things Harvardian. And yet I was piqued enough when in answer to my formal note—I had dispensed with the needful call—I received a closely worded little note saying that she had already accepted for 'spreads' at Weeds and Halworthy. I had of course supposed that she knew nobody, and had been by no means averse to act the modern mentor to a fair Telemacha. Of course you've guessed the end. Even an expert detective would have a clew by this.

"But I was as unsuspicious as only a foregone conclusion can make one, and when I sauntered into White's rooms at Halworthy and saw Margaret surrounded by 'the superlatives,' as we call them, smiling, gracious, witty and wholly at ease, I was dumfounded, overcome, ecrase. Whether it was that my nativity spoke for me, or as I think now, from pure womanly kindness, Margaret neither scorned me, as I deserved, nor froze me, as she well knew how. She gave me her hand in its long yellow glove, made a place beside her, and then seemed to quite forget me.

"I've made a lengthy preamble, but the denouement is at hand. Suffice it that the next year I was her slavish shadow. I climbed awkwardly down out of the rarefied air of my superiority, content to be in the same world with her. She perhaps suspected the truth of one of my own epigrams—that it is only an unrequited love that makes a man good and keeps him humble. She was sweet and frank and charming, but she had no blushes to hide from me. There were no quarrels to make up, and while I got as many smiles as the rest—and the rest were many and ardent—I was never given a confidence nor made trembling witness of a tear.

"Wherever Margaret went I followed, usually on a later train, as I was always forbidden if I stated my intentions. Now comes the crisis, modestly dramatic! Margaret had gone to Narragansett for a week. After two days I found the town insupportably hot, and getting off late arrived at the hotel about 11 o'clock. There was dancing in the ballroom, and as I registered at the desk through the wide doors I could see the lights and the moving figures. As I hesitated there, making up my mind, as there was no chance of a dance with her, to grumble crossly off to bed and a lover's dreams, a child, almost a baby, dashed suddenly out of the side corridor and ran, screaming shrilly, through the doors and down the aisle made by the dancers, who were beginning the lancers.

"Behind the child came an enormous mastiff, his eyes blazing, a length of red tongue showing between his dripping jaws. I do not know to this day how I got there, but an instant later I stood in the middle of the ballroom holding the child high in the air. Then the child began to pound my head and face, kicking violently. The dog stood by my side wagging his tail. A roar from the men and a heartless giggle from the women began to enlighten me. When the child's mother took him from me and began resentfully to smooth down his tumbled laces I quite understood.

"The dog was the pet and victim of this enfant terrible, and I the hero of a—comedy. Cruelly mortified and deeply disgusted, I turned to go. Somebody stepped out of the group nearest me. It was Margaret. She held out her hand to me, and in her eyes I read something sweeter than pity. I bought the dog, who was of course Amado."

At the sound of his name the mastiff opened one eye sleepily and beat with his great tail on the floor.—Dorothea Lummis in Chicago Inter Ocean.

The Loftiest Hotel.

A new hotel now being erected at the corner of Fifth avenue and Fifty-ninth street, New York, will be, when completed, the loftiest hotel in the world. The depth of the excavation for the foundation ranges from twenty-two feet to forty feet. This has been necessary so as to have a rock basis, the rock being blasted so as to render it even. The new hotel will have seventeen stories and will be 225 feet high. The site is 100 feet on Fifth avenue by 155 feet deep on Fifty-ninth street. The building will cost about $1,000,000 and will take two years to construct.—Yankee Blade.

LINCOLN'S HAT.

A Veritable "Joint of Stovepipe" With a Very Romantic Brim.

IT WAS USED FOR MANY PURPOSES.

Its Liveliest Experience was When it Served for a Football for Ladies—It was Fully a Foot High.

There are enough of funny incidents reported of Mr. Lincoln's hat to make it "fabled in song and illumined in story." For example, it served as a football on the night of his election to the presidency, when the ladies at the old homestead testified their glee over his good fortune. The scene would have done credit to the great game between Yale and Princeton on Manhattan field. This is the story as told by an eyewitness:

"A few of us ladies went over and helped Mrs. Lincoln prepare a little supper for the friends of Mr. Lincoln, who had been invited in to hear the returns. Every half hour or so we would pass around coffee and cakes. About 1 o'clock in the morning enough had been learned to warrant the belief that the rail splitter had been elected. I think it was when we heard the news from New York. The men rushed on Mr. Lincoln and shook his hands, while some of the women actually hugged him, and—I might as well admit it—I kissed him.

"Then some one went into the hall and took from the rack the old silk hat that he wore, and which was as long as a joint of stovepipe and about as shapely to my mind, and it was thrown up to the ceiling. As it came down some one gave it a kick, and then the women joined in the fun, and we played football with that hat until it was an indistinguishable mass. We were simply beyond control. What a ridiculous scene it would have been to one looking in without knowing what prompted it!

"It was all the more so, so far as I was concerned, for originally I had been a Seward woman. While the convention was in session in Chicago we were waiting to hear the news. It had been arranged in case Lincoln received the nomination to fire a cannon. My nearest neighbor was a Mrs. Dubois, with whom I had several friendly spats during the campaign preceding the nomination. I heard the cannon shot, and the next moment I saw Mrs. Dubois running across the street. She had been making a shirt for her husband, who was about the size of the late Judge David Davis, so you may have some idea of the size of the garment she was waving. She rushed into the house and flaunted it in my face. It made me mad, and I sat down and began crying. The good woman put her arms around me, begged my pardon and kissed me, and from that time we were Lincoln women. She took part in the football match."

As if not content with his 6 feet 4 or 5 inches of gaunt stature, Lincoln had his now historic hat made fully a foot high, with a brim almost as big as a southern sombrero. It seemed to have been a combination of all styles then in existence, and in this respect it reflected his own early experience in having been a storekeeper, soldier, surveyor and finally a solicitor. It was a veritable "joint of stovepipe," and its remarkable and romantic brim made it alike serviceable in rain or shine. It might have been called with propriety a "plug ugly," after the name of the mob in Baltimore that threatened him in his journey to the capital.

During Lincoln's great debate with Douglas the hat fairly loomed into space. The smallness of the latter's stature caused him to be nicknamed "The Little Giant," and when Lincoln stood beside him with his hat on the difference between the two seemed all but immeasurable. Curiously enough, when Mr. Lincoln came to be inaugurated at Washington and took off his hat on the stand preparatory to making his inaugural address Douglas held the high hat so that no careless person might put his foot in it.

Representative Springer, who hails from Lincoln's old home, knew the hat well, and in speaking of it recently said: "Mr. Lincoln's high hat was the most indispensable thing of his whole outfit. In it he carried all his valuable papers, in fact, it was a sort of file rack. Here were all the briefs of his various law cases. Curiously enough, he carried the accounts in his head, and that is why he lost so much money. Had he reversed the process and kept his accounts in his hat and the cases in his head, he would have been better off. His hat served for his satchel on a journey, and all that was needed besides this were his saddlebags and his horse. It was large and capacious, and a great many documents and data could be crowded into it without seriously discommoding the wearer."

But Mr. Lincoln had still a better use for his valuable tile, which seems to have had more virtues than those rehearsed in the nursery tale of "Jack and the Beanstalk." When he was postmaster at New Salem, his hat became a most important part of his office equipment. As soon as the mail was received each day the young postmaster would put the letters in his hat and take a stroll through the village. The villagers knew that he was a peripatetic postoffice, and of course everybody was anxious to know the contents of the hat, which seemed to promise as much to them as a hat in the hands of a sleight of hand performer.—Washington Cor. St. Louis Republic.

Forced to Confess.

A curious point in Swedish criminal law is that confession is necessary before a capital sentence can be carried out. If, however, the culprit persists in protesting his innocence in the face of overpowering evidence, the prison discipline is made extremely strict and severe until the desired confession is obtained.—Popular Magazine.

COURAGE AND COWARDICE.

The Man of Abject Fear May Be a Nervous Invalid.

There is an old and often told story of the officer who claimed more credit for his own conduct under fire than for that of his men. "They were not afraid, and so they stood steady," he argued, "but I didn't run away, although I was most damnably afraid." The reason of that contention is one that is generally admitted, and the world is not slow to acknowledge the virtue of the constitutional coward whose courage lies in his force of will, for there is such a thing as constitutional cowardice, and it can be conquered if a man's spirit is greater than the tremor of his nerves.

When the natural tremor is the stronger and overcomes his will, then we write him down a coward. But what can be said of the man who makes no effort at all and cares not in the least whether he be called a coward or not? As yet one cannot believe that there are many such men, but at the same time it is impossible to ignore the fact that instances of this weak surrender are growing more plentiful, and that there is the same tendency to palliate cowardice that now seeks to palliate drunkenness and crime. In the old days the drunkard and the thief were not overtenderly handled. It was held that they sinned through what the American calls "cussedness," and it was judged that cussedness could best be cured by being whipped or put in the pillory or otherwise strongly repressed.

Now it has been discovered that the poor sinners are afflicted with mental disease, and serious doubts are cast on the humanity of forcible restraint, even though that restraint takes the mild form of short terms of imprisonment. With much more truth might it be represented that the coward cannot command his nerves, and that as a nervous invalid he rather merits pity than contempt. Such a view may be more humane and charitable, but it is far from being expedient. By all means let us hold it, if we will, with regard to a particular coward here and there, but heaven forbid that we should ever hold it with regard to cowardice in general! It is not in the least likely that we ever shall do so, for the results would be so immediate and so deplorable that a healthy reaction would very soon set in.—London Spectator.

Hadn't Missed His Car.

The wind was blowing a gale, and the rain was pattering against the window panes at the home of a prominent Camden physician. The clock had just tolled the hour past midnight, when the physician was aroused by the ringing of his door bell. He jumped out of bed, put on his dressing gown, went to the window, raised the sash and saw a man, muffled to the ears, standing on his front step. He asked:

"What do you want at this late hour?"

"I'm Mr. Carr," was the answer.

"Well, go home. I am not responsible if you did miss a car. Why did you stay out so late?"

The window went down with a bang, and the doctor went back to bed.

The bell rang again, the doctor put his head out of the window and saw the same man on the step.

"Doctor, doctor! I'm Mr. Carr."

"Well, if you did miss your car, what have I to do with it?"

"Carr, doctor, Carr. Don't you understand?"

"What do you take me for, a conductor?"

"No, no, doctor. Mrs. Carr, my wife, your patient, is very ill and requires your services."

"Oh, that's you, Carr, is it? Wait a minute and I'll be with you."—Philadelphia Press.

Effect of Salt Water Upon Bricks.

Bricks made upon seacoasts must be carefully guarded from salt air or water during the manufacturing process. They are by far more durable if made some distance inland. The brackish water of the coast induces speedy disintegration, unless the bricks are completely covered by a coating of practically impervious cement to keep air and moisture from them. When thoroughly vitrified, bricks made with fresh water will endure sea air for a long time, but even then protection and occasional patching up pay well for the trouble.—New York Ledger.

Growing Heads.

"Head's grown, sir," observed my hatter one day to me, manipulating the interior of my topper with a foot rule, and when I indignantly disclaimed the soft impeachment he added, "All my customers' heads grow, sir, up to 65, excepting the ecclesiastical gents', and theirs don't grow after 25." Herein doubtless lies the reason why clerical headgear is so characteristic of the man beneath, for never was a greater fallacy than the adage that "it is not the cowl that makes the monk."—London Globe.

Chance.

A wagon loaded with black powder, moving on a perfectly level road near Wenatchee, Wash., exploded last week, while on Wednesday a wagon loaded with dynamite, drawn by a four horse team, went over the grade not far from the same spot and rolled 100 feet, no damage resulting. Fate performs some peculiar freaks with which to mystify the inhabitants of this terrestrial sphere.

SOME LARGE VANS

How They are Used for Long and Short Distance Moving.

TRAVEL BY TRAIN AND STEAMBOAT.

The Business of Moving Day Reduced to Science.—Time and Trouble Saved by These Large Vehicles.

The estimator for a storage and van company will walk into a house or a flat and estimate within a cubic foot of how much space the contents will take up packed, and he doesn't make any elaborate computations either. He just walks in a leisurely way through a house from roof to cellar or through a flat from end to end, and when he is through he knows. Houses vary greatly. One three story house might have in it three van loads. The house just like it next door might have six, but the estimator rarely makes a mistake. He might get half a van load out of the way in estimating a six load house, but this would be quite unusual. He would be much more likely to hit the mark.

The contract price for moving means for moving from any floor to any floor. If it is desired, the company will send barrels, boxes and packing materials and men to pack crockery, bronzes, books, bric-a-brac, and so on, at 75 cents a barrel or its equivalent in space. The time for loading and for starting the vans would depend somewhat on where the goods were going. If they were going 40 miles into the country, the vans would be loaded the afternoon before and would start at 2 o'clock in the morning. They would arrive at their destination at about 10 o'clock the same morning, the horses would be put up and the vans unloaded, the start on the return would be made at about 2 o'clock the next morning, and the arrival in the city would be at about 10.

Vans are specially constructed with large bodies and low wheels for transportation by steamboat or railroad. Whether horses are taken on such trips depends altogether on the distance the vans are going. If to a nearby point, the horses go along; if to a distant point, it is cheaper to hire horses there. If vans were going to Newport, for instance, they would be shipped on a freight propeller, whose derrick would pick them up like great boxes of goods and land them on deck. On such a trip horses would not be taken, but hired in Newport for the hauling there. Horses would meet the vans at the dock upon their return here. Vans go west at least as far as Louisville, south to Baltimore and Washington. In transfers, say to Long Branch and other nearby points, the horses go with the vans.

Fifty miles would ordinarily be about the limit of the distance that vans cover on their own wheels, but they sometimes go greater distances. Forty miles would be not at all unusual, and trips of 30 miles and less are common. The drivers know the roads within 50 miles around New York well. They know where the paved roads are and those that are most nearly level, and where the poorer or more difficult roads are, too, and so they know what sort of an outfit to take. Where the roads are good to destination the vans would be drawn by four horses. On bad or hilly roads they would take six horses. It is interesting to note, as the result of the drivers' observations, that the roads around New York are better than they used to be, and that they are steadily improving. Not infrequently the van companies move people from one point to another outside of the city. For example, a gentleman who lived in a town near Bridgeport, Conn., who was about to move to a place near Tarrytown, in this state, contracted with a van company of this city to move him. Three vans went up from the city on this expedition. The work took about two weeks. Here the distance to be covered was so great that it was impossible to make it in a single day, and the vans halted at night and went on in the morning. They went to and fro in this way until the work was completed. The bill for this job came to nearly $1,300.

The van companies move goods between points in the city as well as to and from it, and besides moving household goods they will estimate on and contract to remove the contents of a store or a building to another store or building. A recent moving job in this city came to about $1,200. Goods moving in vans on their own wheels are not insured. In transit by rail or boat they are insured at the request of the owner. The cost of moving by vans depends, of course, largely on distance, and it varies somewhat according to season and circumstances. It is cheaper between seasons, and the nature of the roads to be covered might have something to do with it. To Morristown, N. J., distance about 30 miles, the price in the busy season would be $35 a van and expenses, the expenses being ferriage and tolls. To a point, say, 12 miles from the city, in the busy season, the rate would be $20 a van and expenses.

The storage and van business has increased greatly in New York in recent years. The population of the city and its suburbs has increased rapidly, and there are now more moving days than formerly. Many leases now run from April or October, besides those that run from May, so that the business is more distributed through the year. The number of those who go out of town for the summer has increased greatly. Many persons regularly every year move household goods enough to furnish or partly furnish a house at the seashore or in the country. There are many persons who give up their rents in spring and store their effects and go away until fall.—New York Sun.

A Lawrence (Kan.) man recently received a letter which was mailed in Chicago about twelve years ago. It was "accidentally discovered" in a ventilator shaft with a package of other mail.

Women with No Children.

The fact that the total population of the United States has fallen below the popular estimate of 64,000,000 is likely to call attention to the fecundity of American women. Not long ago a newspaper took a census of the children in certain fashionable quarters in New York city and brought to light the fact that comparatively few children gladden the spacious homes of Murray hill, and that the birth rate there was alarmingly low. The last state census of Massachusetts brings out some interesting facts in relation to the percentage of married women having no children. Here is a table compiled from the Massachusetts census showing the percentage of native and of foreign born women having no children:

	Native born.	Foreign born.
The state	20.18	13.27
Barnstable	16.95	14.77
Berkshire	17.93	9.94
Bristol	19.61	18.08
Dukes	20.00	14.89
Essex	19.43	13.78
Franklin	19.33	11.20
Hampden	20.80	11.98
Hampshire	20.23	12.61
Middlesex	19.92	13.52
Nantucket	17.26	27.03
Norfolk	17.63	11.67
Plymouth	18.58	13.23
Suffolk	23.89	14.04
Worcester	20.03	10.99

Here we find that one-fifth of the married women of Massachusetts are childless. It is said that in no country save France can a similar condition of affairs be found. On the other hand, instead of over 20 per cent., only 13.27 per cent. of the foreign born women of Massachusetts are childless. What is true of this state is undoubtedly in a greater or less degree true throughout the country. The time has come when we must face the fact that the increase of population by birth is decreasing—that the tendency of the times among well to do Americans is to small families, and that one-fifth of our native married women are childless.—Chicago Tribune.

Bicycle Mail Delivery.

In an interview Postmaster General Wanamaker, in the Indianapolis Journal, says:

Free postal delivery in the rural districts is coming some time. The government does not give the farmer his share of the benefits of the mails. In another year, I think, the postoffice department will be self sustaining, and I think the time will then be ripe for the inauguration of the free delivery of mails in the rural districts. The plan, however, is feasible only where there are good roads, because it involves the use of bicycles. I am glad to know your state is beginning to show an interest in good roads.

It is quite possible, with roads passable at all seasons of the year, to operate the rural delivery system, and also collect the mails from the boxes placed along the road. There are some parts of rural districts near Philadelphia which might have the delivery now if there were money to equip such service. We are using bicycles in Washington with good success in deliveries as well as collections. It is entirely feasible and also proper to extend every advantage of our mail service to the farmers.

Breaking Up a Square.

A discussion seems to be going on as to whether an infantry square can be broken by a charge of men on foot or on horseback. To the nonmilitary mind this would seem impossible, provided that the square is properly formed. But I read the other day that the French in Dahomey cast melinite bombs into an intrenchment of the enemy, with the result that the assailants themselves had to fall back in order not to be destroyed by the suffocating fumes.

Is this a fact or an effort of the journalistic imagination? If the former, what is to prevent melinite being fired into any dense mass of men on a battlefield, whether in square or in any other formation, and emitting such fumes that the square would cease to exist? Admitting the truth of the statement, it seems to me likely to render war so exceedingly dangerous a pastime that few sane human beings will be willing to engage in it.—London Truth.

Royalty's Reception Room.

The grand reception room at Windsor castle is at present in the hands of the workmen, who are executing a process of redecorating and regilding. This magnificent chamber is one of the state apartments, but last year it was used as a greenroom for both opera comique and grand opera, when various companies by royal command gave entertainments in the Waterloo chamber.

There are six superb pieces of old Gobelin tapestry on the walls, illustrating the story of Jason and the golden fleece, and in the fine gothic window which overlooks the home park and Eton college stands a huge vase made entirely of Russian malachite, which was presented to the queen by the Czar Nicholas of Russia. The ceiling and the cornices are richly carved and gilded, and the room is lighted by four enormous candelabra of ormolu and cut glass.—Paris American Register.

Two Hundred Years Ago.

There was celebrated recently in the the town of Danvers, Mass., the 200th anniversary of the death of Rebecca Nurse, who was hanged in Salem in 1692 on account of her religious convictions and because she would not confess to being a witch. Her body was stolen from the gallows by her sons and hidden in an unmarked grave. It is only recently that some of her descendants have unveiled a memorial tablet in honor of the forty persons who maintained her innocence before the New England court that tried her.—Harper's Bazar.

A COLONEL'S SCAR

A Souvenir of a Chance Meeting in the Yellowstone.

LIVELY ROW WITH LOTS OF BULLETS

Horse Thief Methods Which Didn't Work Successfully.—An Important Part Taken by Roaring Harry.

Colonel Jim Struthers, alias Montana Jim, yawned a few times, and in the process of pulling himself together, combed his hair with his fingers, thus lifting it from his brow and exposing a long and lurid scar which started on the right temple and traveled backward till it got lost in hair.

"Hello, colonel! Come out of this, and tell me how you got this scar," said the prospector for facts.

"This scar? Oh, yes, I recollect. Well, I got that mark from being too game. I was living on a ranch near Pease Bottom, Mon., and after the regular fall windup three of the boys, Catfish Johnnie, Roaring Harry and Yellowstone Joe, proposed that we take a trip through the Yellowstone park.

"After a long and delightful trip we came within the shadow of the Yellowstone mountains and camped. It was a delightful spot. On one side ran the tracks of the Northern Pacific, and every few hours trains rushed by. On the other side a little stream babbled and sparkled. It was about noon when we halted.

"After dinner we sat near the railroad waiting to see the overland express dash by, when from the brush down the track three men came out. They strolled along in the direction of our camp. We were a good many miles from a station, and it was an unusually suspicious circumstance to see these fellows tramping along the ties. They were bad visaged, and their general appearance did not impress us very favorably. As they got within about 100 yards of us they hallooed in familiar wild west style and approached us civilly enough. The spokesman said that one of their horses had either strayed or had been stolen, and he wanted to know if we had seen any horse answering the description which he gave. Of course we had not and invited the strangers to eat dinner with us.

"They told us that their camp was down the track in a ravine about a mile distant and said that they would be glad to have us take dinner with them on the morrow. We promised to do so. However, there was some sneaking suspicion down in the subcellar of our minds that something was crooked about the whole business. This suspicion was not calmed in any way by the calculating glances which the party bestowed on our armament and stock. That afternoon it was decided that we should picket our horses and stand watch by turns throughout the night. It is a very common practice with expert horse thieves to simply swoop down and stampede the stock of an outfit in true Indian fashion, but this programme will never work where the stock is picketed. In a case of this kind the depredators simply sneak around the camp like coyotes and cut the ropes.

"In our outfit we had one very wild horse. He was as wild as a mountain goat. He would run if you'd point your finger at him. The only restraining influence which he acknowledged was that exercised by another horse. The wild horse was so absolutely stuck on his four footed friend that he would eat and drink with him and never seem satisfied without being in his company. True, he would fly off at a tangent, but he would come to his mate, wagging his tail behind him. We picketed all the horses excepting this one. It was between 12 and 2 o'clock when Roaring Harry, whose turn it was to stand guard, entered the prairie schooner and turned us all out quietly with the remark that something was up. The wild horse had run up alongside his gentle friend and was puffing and snorting in a perfect fever of fright.

"We reasoned that the thieves had approached the camp and run on the untamed animal. They would conclude from this that the stock was at large and would most likely attempt to stampede it. With this theory in mind, we took positions along the trail which the thieves would follow should they swoop down. My perch was under an overhanging bowlder, where I could not be seen for the gloom, and from where by the faint light of the stars I could see pretty clearly all that went on on one side of the wagon. It was snowing and blowing and otherwise unpleasant. We had been on guard this way for perhaps an hour. Everything was dead still but for the howl or cry of some wild beast in the timber. We thought that we heard something which sounded like hoofs away up the trail. Nearer they came, and more distinctly they sounded as they struck the frozen ground, from which the snow had been blown away. Then the sound ceased. The party of horsemen had halted. We knew what was about to come, and every man took a firmer hold on his winchester and took good care that the hammer was up. Then there was a sharp clatter and a rush. Down the trail the thieves were dashing full tilt.

"As the squadron emerged from the shadow of the pines their outlines could be seen. Bang, bang! Whizz! Click, click! Bang, bang! Two horses dropped and one rider bit the dust, as they say in the novel, and his steed pressed by. Others of the party rode by in a hurry. One of the horses dropped directly opposite my station. Evidently his rider was full of life and hope, for he arose on his knees, and I knew instinctively that his gun was going to his shoulder, when my trusty rifle flashed out. The blaze of my gun was the signal which located me to him. He replied as quick as thought. There was a blinding flash in my face; I felt a whiff of cold wind; something warm streamed over me; I knew that I was falling, and then all was blank.

"The next day I opened my eyes and saw strange people about me. I tried to think, but couldn't. Things gradually grew less strange. As soon as I had thoroughly regained consciousness the boys explained what was wrong and told me that I had had a close call. Then they pointed to three grewsome objects ranged side by side on the edge of the trail, with their ghastly features concealed by blankets. This scar is where that horse thief's bullet ripped open my scalp and plowed a long furrow down my skull."—Washington Star.

President Reinhart of the Atchison Topeka and Santa Fe railway company has resigned on account of the recently developed scandal, in which he is charged with overstating the earnings of the company $7,200,000 in the last four years. The resignation will take effect on September 1st.

The great aerolite of July 27th will go down to history as the corkscrew meteor, everybody having testified that its trail was like a spiral bla'e as it passed through the skies. This is an age of crockedness and it would seem as if the heavenly bodies themselves are not wholly exempt from it.

There is no parallel in California's history to Governor Markham's letter as to how he suppressed the railroad strike, except John Poenix's account of the celebrated rough and tumble fight in the San Diego Herald office between himself and Judson J. Amos. "I held the judge down" said Phoenix, "by means of my nose, which I inserted between his teeth for that purpose."

The engineers and conductors who did not go out on a strike recently because General Superintendent Fillmore said to them, "If you stay by us we will stay by you," now threaten to strike because, though they stayed by the Southern Pacific Company, that company did not stay by them, and has refused to pay them their wages for the time of their enforced idleness during the July tie-up.

The fact that the people are rather familiar with the history of the Sutro tunnel is probably the reason why so few are subscribing for the stock of the 5-cent railway. Mr. Sutro said he would build that road for the people; he now asks the people to build it for him. If he thought it would be a paying investment it is not likely that he would "let others in" on it. Mr. Sutro is a philanthropist, of course, but not where business is concerned.

There is quite a difference between the Japanese and the late, but not lamented, Dennis Kearney. That gentleman said "the Chinese must go," and if Japan is to be believed she thinks they won't come. All the exclusion bills in the country are just so much waste paper, if Japan can keep up her lick and maintain the speed she struck about ten days ago. If she can do that for a year longer, there will be no more Chinese to come over to America; and washing and ironing will go up to $1 a dozen.

Some comment is being excited by the fact that the captains of the Britannia and Satanita tried to "jolly" the Vigilant in the last yatch race over the English course. There is nothing extraordinary in this. English sportsmen are very fond of claiming that they are devoted to fair play but, as a matter of fact, John Bull very rarely indulges in that article, and this is true from a prize fight to a yatch race. Away back in 1860, when Heenan went over to England to fight Sayers, the English bullies broke into the ring cutting the ropes and stopping the fight. Yachting men ought to be a huckleberry above that kind of a persimmon, but it seems that they were not, at least in this instance.

The United States could if it would, profit by the example set by France in the trial of the wretched assassin of President Carnot. It has been but about six weeks since his deed of crime, and already he has been tried, convicted, sentenced, and gillotined. In this case, the trial was shortened somewhat by his refusal to appeal to a higher court, but the promptitude with which France tries her red handed murderers is to be commended. How different in this country, where an assassin is allowed to seize every opportunity of the technicalities of law and every loophole to avoid the punishment of his crime. In France the "insanity" plea is rarely considered, and they sentence a murdering criminal in short order, not dragging the legal net for "extenuating" circumstances, but promptly try, convict and execute.

ALIAS SUMMONS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE County of Inyo, State of California.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the County of Inyo, State of California, and the complaint filed in said County of Inyo in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

Victor Trepier Plaintiff, vs Jaques Jalberique and Manasese Louca, Defendants:

The people of the State of California send greeting to Jaques Jalberique and Manasese Louca, Defendants:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the County of Inyo State of California, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this Inyo County, or, if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain the judgment of this Hon. Court dissolving the partnership heretofore and now existing between yourselves and the Plaintiff, under and by virtue of an agreement made and entered into by you on the 30th day of October, 1893, and that the title to the mines or mining claims described in said agreement may be adjudged freed from all the conditions thereof and restored as follows: That the Plaintiff is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "American Flag Mine;" that Defendant Jaques Jalberique is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "French Flag Mine" and that Defendant Manasese Louca is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "Mexican Flag Mine," as said mines are described in said agreement and the complaint of file herein; Together with the costs of suit.

Said plaintiff alleging that you have utterly failed, neglected and refused to in any manner whatsoever comply with the terms and conditions of said partnership agreement, or to perform any of the duties imposed thereby, since on or about the 27th day of January, 1894; as will more fully appear by reference to the complaint on file herein.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, said plaintiff will apply to Court for the relief demanded in said complaint.

Witness my hand and the Seal of said Superior Court of the County of Inyo, State of California, this 27th day of June, A. D. 1894.

[SEAL.] D. J. HESSION, Clerk.
P. H. MACK, Attorney for Plaintiff.

Get ready for the Fair.

Fred Holbert spent several days in town this week.

Web. H. Walker came up from Olancha yesterday.

A. E. Janvier will teach the Georges Creek school next term, beginning Sept. 25.

John Fichman, of Keeler, spent a few days in town during the early part of the week.

Mr. and Mrs. Al. Staulinger were visiting in town during the week, returning home on Wednesday.

Democratic Primaries will be held on Saturday, Sept. 1, and the Convention at Bishop, on Tuesday, Sept. 11.

Frank K. Andrews came down from Bishop on Wednesday's train and is spending several days in this vicinity.

S. W. Austin and Miss Matilda Meysan will teach the Lone Pine school next term beginning the first Monday in September.

Mr. and Mrs. F. E. Densmore and Misses Rosa Roeper and Cora Craig are on a camping trip in the Onion Valley country.

A. J. Davis is prospecting in the Alabama Hills. The most encouraging reports have been coming in lately from this district.

Special train passed through to Keeler yesterday and returned this morning, having on board Supt, H. M. Yerington and wife and Asst. Supt, R. J. Laws.

The Carson & Colorado Company's assessment this year has been fixed by the State Board of Equalization at $230,000 for that part of their road in California.

Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Eibeshutz started for San Francisco on Thursday's train, where they will remain about a month Mr. Eibeshutz will attend the Democratic State Convention.

Mrs. W. F. Matlack has been awarded the privilege of giving the Annual Fair Ball of the 18th Dist. Agricultural Association, her bid being $71. We wish the enterprising lady every possible success.

News was received from Lone Pine last evening to the effect that Mrs. Holmes, of Inyo, who is with a camping party in the Kern River country, had been seriously injured and that Dr. I. J. Woodin had gone over the mountains last night to attend her. No particulars have been received.

In this issue will be found the announcement of P. P. Keough of Bishop as a candidate for the office of Assessor. The same good judgment and knowledge of business affairs that have made Mr. Keough successful in private life will enable him to become a good and useful officer. It is the poorest kind of public policy to elect any man to office because he is an utter failure at everything else.

A. E. Janvier, of Independence, is a candidate for the office of Superintendent of Schools and is certainly entitled to the support of the people. In all matters pertaining to schools and education party politics should not enter, and Mr. Janvier's action in announcing himself subject to the will of the people is certainly to be commended. He is a thorough educator and possesses every qualification to thoroughly fit him for the position to which he aspires.

The Assessment Suspension,

"Senator Perkins and Congressman Caminetti send us the official text of the bill suspending mining assessments. It is as follows:

An Act to amend section numbered twenty-three hundred and twenty-four of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to mining claims.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That the provisions of section numbered twenty-three hundred and twenty-four of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which require that on each claim located after the tenth day of May, eighteen hundred and seventy-two, and until patent has been issued therefor, not less than one hundred dollars' worth of labor shall be performed or improvements made during each year, be suspended for the year eighteen hundred and ninety-four, so that no mining claim which has been regularly located and recorded as required by the local laws and mining regulations shall be subject to forfeiture for non-performance of the annual assessment for the year eighteen hundred and ninety-four: Provided, That the claimant or claimants of any mining location, in order to secure the benefits of this Act, shall cause to be recorded in the office where the location notice or certificate is filed on or before December thirty-first, eighteen hundred and ninety-four, a notice that he or they in good faith intend to hold and work said claim: Provided, however, That the provisions of this Act shall not apply to the State of South Dakota.

SEC. 2. That this Act shall take effect from and after its passage.

Approved July 18, 1894.

It will be observed that the bill is similar to the one passed last November for '93. It originally exempted the second Congressional district of Colorado. It will this year operate more generally in the lines intended, being passed four months earlier than last year."—Min. & Sci. Press.

Rather Cool.

The Inyo Republican Central Committee by a unanimous vote resolved that Inyo shall have the nomination of the Assemblyman this year. This is rather cool, very cool, considering that Inyo had the Republican candidate two years ago, and defeated him most shamefully, the Democrats thereby securing the one majority to elect Senator White. Had the Republicans of Inyo lived up to their professions as those of Alpine and Mono did, a Republican U. S. Senator might have been elected. Do they want to nominate a candidate for the purpose of slaughtering him again? Inyo should not put on airs because she is a little ahead of us in votes, as we may have a large one two years hence. There should be no wrangling over the Assembly nomination this year. There should be a joint convention and the merits of the several candidates impartially considered, and the best and strongest man selected whether he be Coleman, Bennett, Keables or any other man, so long as he is a good one for the position; nor does it matter from which county he comes, but it is folly for any county to say he "should," or "shall" come from a particular section. If the several counties will elect delegations of staunch Republicans who will try to find the best man to nominate, this Assembly muddle can be quickly cleared, and a Republican sent to the Legislature, otherwise, otherwise. This alternating ought to be stamped out—it is a dangerous fire-brand. —Chronicle Union.

Democratic Committee Meeting.

A meeting of the Democratic County Central Committee was held at Independence on Monday evening. The time for holding the Democratic primaries was fixed for Saturday, September 1st, between the hours of 1 and 6 p. m., at the places and under the supervision of officers as described in the advertised call. As the voting test the following was agreed upon: "Will you support the ticket nominated by the State Democratic Convention." It was ordered that the nominating convention be held at Bishop on Tuesday, September 11, 1894, at 2 o'clock p. m. The following apportionment of delegates was resolved upon: One for each precinct, one for each ten votes cast for Democratic Presidential Electors at the last general election, and one for each fraction of five or more. On motion it was ordered that Hon. P. Reddy be indorsed for Governor. The resignation of A. W. Eibeshutz as Chairman of the Central Committee was accepted and E. Robinson elected to succeed him. J. A. Lank was selected to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Mr. Eibeshutz. Whereupon the Committee adjourned subject to call of the chair.

The Senate Bill Passed,

WASHINGTON, Aug. 13.—At the Democratic caucus today Speaker Crisp introduced a resolution to the effect that the House agree to the Senate amendments to the Wilson bill and that the House shall at once proceed to the consideration of seperate bills, placing sugar in all its forms, iron ore, coal and barbed wire on the free list.

This resolution was adopted by an overwhelming vote. After speeches by Crisp and others a vote was taken and the motion wae carried by a vote of 182 to 105. Twelve Democrats voted against the bill.

The separate bills providing for free iron ore, free coal, free sugar and barbed wire were then introduced and passed, after which the House adjourned until Wednesday.

Inyo's Assessment for 1894 shows a decrease of $48,878 from last year. This is not a good boom showing.—Index.

Last year the Board of Equalization cited a large number of tax-payers to appear and show cause why their essessment should not be raised, and did make a considerable raise in taxable values. This year the Assessor not profiting by the lesson of last year, dropped back into the old notch, and assessed a few favored individuals at a ridiculously low figure.

W. J. Lake announces himself as a candidate for Supervisor for the Third district. Mr. Lake has been a resident of Inyo County for many years He has been successful as a business man and county affairs would receive careful and equitable administration at his hands. There are "no strings" on Billy Lake and if elected he can be depended upon to do his duty without fear or favor.

J. G. Dodge was up from Lone Pine yesterday.

Beatrix Randolph.

By JULIAN HAWTHORNE.

"I think a great deal," Wallie replied. "You saw her abroad, didn't you?"

"No, the general did. Why?"

"Nothing," said Wallie, quietly fixing his gray eyes upon the other's dismayed visage, "except that I saw Mlle. Marana last year in Vienna, and I think her greatly improved."

CHAPTER VII.

HER FRIENDS, HER ENEMIES, AND HER LOVERS.

"You can have that check," said Inigo.

Within the next few days everybody in New York could quote a more or less authoritative opinion as to the merits of Mlle. Marana; for the guests at the Dinsmores' dinner and reception had been so selected that their various reports could reach all sections of polite society. The verdict on the part of both sexes was almost universally favorable, and every one consequently made preparations to extend further invitations to her. The only noteworthy dissentient voice was that of Mrs. Bright, who affirmed that the great prima donna was underbred and presuming. Even this critic, however, admitted that she had redeeming traits.

"In her proper place she is very well. She is a professional singer; and, though she is very professional, she is really a very good singer, too."

Mr. Barclyffe, the amateur composer, contributed an able article to a leading journal, in which he attempted to assign Mlle. Marana her place among the great singers of the last forty years.

"To the culture, the vivacity, and the subtlety of the present," he wrote, "our Russian guest unites the training, the knowledge, and the solidity of the past. Rooted in the soil of the best traditions of her predecessors, the flower of her genius blossoms in the new sunshine of today. The grandeur and dignity of her method are vivified and sweetened by rare personal charms of manner, and by that seeming artlessness of execution which is the finest triumph of art. Her appearance among us is another proof, not only of the reputation which we of the western world have attained of being the final tribunal in matters of musical tast and judgment, but of the great fact that real genius is always unique.

"Mlle. Marana recalls no other singer; she is herself! and to say this is (as those who have heard her will testify) to pay her the highest compliment. She does not accentuate an epoch—she makes one. Of her dramatic capacities we have yet to judge, but simple and unassuming as is her bearing in private society it is easy for the initiated to discern in the grace, effectiveness and precision of her gestures and carriage the results of that long training upon the stage and command of its resources which alone can make the poetry of movement a second nature. Our only misgiving is," added the writer, "that the ordinary repertoire of operas may fail to afford Mlle. Marana an adequate opportunity for the manifestation of her powers. While yielding to none in our reverence and admiration for the operatic productions of the great composers, from Mozart to Wagner, we may be permitted to wish that some new work might be forthcoming, essentially modern in its scope and quality, and thereby answering more completely to the requirements of modern culture. It would indeed be a matter of congratulation were such a work to claim an American origin!"

Those who knew the authorship of this article made merry over the peroration, and inquired archly whether Barclyffe had at last found somebody capable of appreciating his musical accomplishments. But by the majority it was accepted with becoming docility; and the impresario, it is needless to say, was enchanted with it. The allusions to the Marana's familiarity with the stage were especially grateful to him.

"I'll just tell you how it is," he said to Jocelyn; "you play off a little game on the public, and you feel nervous because there's one or two weak points in it. Well, sir, by Jupiter! those weak points are just the very ones the public swallows the quickest. Now, here's this girl—she can sing; we all know that; but she's a born American, and she's never been on the stage. Well, sir, there was old Lucretia March at the dinner, who said she could hardly understand her on account of her Russian accent; and now Barclyffe comes out and swears she must have been born behind the footlights! The next thing'll be we shall have some woman turning up and vowing the Marana has run off with her husband and a hundred thousand dollars!"

"Are you aware, Moses," inquired his friend, "that Wallie Dinsmore has seen the real woman in Vienna, and knows this one to be a fraud?"

The general set down the cocktail with which he was about to celebrate his good fortune. "Are you lying, or what's the matter?" he demanded brusquely.

"I had it from the man himself, you old blackguard," rejoined the other composedly.

"Does he know who this one is?"

"If he doesn't he probably will before long."

The general reflected. At last he said: "Well, I ain't scared. What should he make a row for? It ain't going to hurt him, and what's more, he's taken up the girl himself. It may tickle him to find out the facts, but he ain't a fellow to talk. If it was you, now, I might want to buy you off; but he's another sort." And Gen. Inigo tossed off his cocktail with renewed serenity.

"I'll bet you you're mistaken," said Jocelyn.

"I don't bet with you, my good friend," replied the impresario, shaking his head and chuckling sardonically. "I'll tell you what I will do, though," he added, after a moment. He took from his pockets a check book and a Mackinnon pen, and wrote a check, which he showed to Jocelyn. It was $10,000, and was drawn to Jocelyn's order.

"You can have that check," said Inigo, "and be fingering the bank notes in half an hour from now, on one condition."

"Go on," said Jocelyn.

"On condition that you take yourself out of the whole business, and leave me to deal with the girl direct. It's a damned shame, by Jupiter, that you should be putting 30 per cent. of her money into your pocket every time she sings, and making her think I pay her that much less than I do. I'll buy you out for $10,000, cash down, today, and take the risk of her bursting up, and everything else. I'm talking money, that's what I'm doing; and there it is! Will you do it?"

"You may go to the devil!" said Jocelyn, pushing back the check book, though not without an effort. "I'll have you to know that money's not the only thing I'm after. I've got my own views about the girl, and I'll manage the business my own way."

The impresario detached the check from the book, and having rolled it into an allumette lit his cigar with it. "That's all right," said he, crushing the burnt remnant under his foot, "only don't you talk to me no more about betting! I know a man when I clap eyes on him, and I know a woman, too, and I guess you'll have time to grow to be a bigger rascal than you are before you rope in my prima donna! She's meet for your betters, my boy, and they're not far to look for!"

Jocelyn contrived to maintain a contemptuously indifferent demeanor, but it is certain that whoever made money out of the impresario was obliged to earn it in one way or another.

Meanwhile Miss Beatrix Randolph, or the Marana, as all the world now called her, was in more cheerful spirits than she had been before her reception at the Dinsmores. She liked the Dinsmores; she was inclined to like almost everybody. She tried to take a charitable view even of the young gentlemen in high shirt collars who complimented her so badly, and said things which she knew were witty only because they laughed at them. She reflected that she knew nothing of the freemasonry of modern society, and that probably the young gentlemen intended only to be polite and entertaining. Mrs. Bemax, when appealed to on the subject, said they—Mr. Witman and the rest of them—were wealthy and well connected, and that it was desirable for a lady connected with the stage to cultivate their acquaintance.

"A little social relaxation is an excellent thing for you, my dear mademoiselle," declared this worthy lady, "and a capital way to get rid of that little frigidity and stiffness you have brought with you from the country. Ladies connected with the stage have to work hard, but, en revanche, they are allowed more freedom in social intercourse than other people. It will be quite proper for you to let Mr. Witman drive you home from rehearsal in his brougham if I am along, or even without me at a pinch. All the others do it. You will not let him take any liberties, of course; but don't betray any timidity: he wouldn't understand it."

"It is one thing for me to do as I like," replied mademoiselle, "and another thing for me to let other people do as they like. I don't mean to be stiff, but there is no reason why I should be bothered either."

"It will be no bother when you are used to it," Mrs. Bemax replied; but at the time she did not advocate her view any farther.

The finishing touches were being put to the theatre, and Geoffrey Bellingham was constantly on hand to oversee the work; consequently he and the prima donna must needs meet occasionally. He said very little to her, and was generally very busy when she might have entered into conversation with him; but she had an impression that he kept his eyes upon her often when she was not looking at him; and his appearance at the theatre was generally coincident with the hour of her rehearsals. One day after she had been singing a grand scene very effectively she happened to catch his eye in the stage box, where he stood leaning against the curtained partition, abstractedly knotting and unknotting a piece of tape. His gaze was so earnest, and at the same time so melancholy, that the prima donna, obeying an impulse that was partly curiosity, but partly something else, went round to the box when the scene was over, and met him as he was coming out.

"How unhappy you looked!" she said. "Was anything wrong?"

He stared at her for a moment, and said ironically, "Oh, you're a great artiste!"

"I mean to be," she answered smiling.

"A great actress, too! I should like to see you when you are yourself."

"I am myself now," replied Mlle. Marana. Then she remembered that she was not telling the whole truth, and blushed and looked down.

"Then you must be a remarkable woman! But you probably don't know that you always appear to me like a fresh and innocent American girl. I can't see anything foreign or—stagey in your talk or manners. Extremes meet, I suppose, and, like Paul, you are all things to all men."

This speech made the young diva feel that the world was very wide and very cruel, and tears came into her eyes. She was alone; there was no one to answer for her or to protect her. She would not have minded so much what most people thought of her, but it would have been a great comfort to her if this man, at any rate, had by some divine faculty of vision been able to see through the disguise that veiled her from the rest of the world. He did see through it; but he did not believe what he saw. He thought that his discovery was her deception, and the more she was frank and simple, the more she was her real self, the less would he believe in her. It was a dilemma between intuition and reason; and, with a man of the world, reason, in such cases, is apt to have the best of it.

It would have been easy for the prima donna to have enlightened him, and under certain circumstances she might have been tempted to do so. But now it was a matter of pride to her, if nothing else, to say no word that could lead him to infer that his sympathy was anything to her one way or the other. But she was at liberty to resent an insult, and she felt that to do so would help her to preserve her composure.

"You probably don't know, sir," she said, imitating his phrase, "that to call even an opera singer the extreme opposite of fresh and innocent is not polite. I am not so contemptible a thing to all men as I seem to be to you!"

"It was a brutal thing to say, and I did not mean it," he replied in a low voice. "But I can't say what I wish to you. There's no middle way." And before she could make up her mind what this meant he passed by her and walked heavily away down the corridor.

The prima donna fell into a deep and not altogether painful revery. She seated herself on a bench behind the scenes and followed out her musings with her chin on her hand. The rehearsal was going forward in front, the duets, the quartets and the choruses, but she was lost in thought. "There's no middle way." What was in his mind—in his heart—when he said that? There had been something very potent in his eyes, that she was sure of. What eyes he had! What a stern, resolute face, with nothing mean or commonplace in it! He was not like the others, either in aspect or in manner. His very carelessness and roughness were more high bred than their best behavior. Though he might go among other men, he would always be apart from them; he was lonely, like herself, but, unlike hers, his was a voluntary and a noble loneliness. And he despised her because—because some other woman was despicable! That was unjust, and yet perhaps there was inadvertent justice in it. Perhaps, if he knew the truth, he would despise her no less on other grounds. But again there was some other feeling beside contempt at work within him. What could that be? The girl raised her head slightly, with a doubtful, musing smile on her lips.

There was a stealthy step behind her which she did not hear until it was close upon her. Then suddenly a pair of hands were pressed over her eyes, and her head was drawn back. For a moment she was too much amazed to resist; besides, she thought it must be—could not but be—some one who had a right to treat her so—her father, or even her brother Ed; no stranger would dare! Any impossibility was more possible than that. The next moment she felt kisses on her cheek and mouth—clumsy, offensive kisses. She was not a screaming woman, but she gave a passionate outcry of disgust, twisted herself free, and sprang to her feet.

The Advance of Coeducation.

Dr. Chaney, president of Bates college, illustrates the progress of coeducation by telling the story of how a man in 1865, on being asked how many students were attending the college, answered, "Forty-three students and a nigger and a woman," and adds, "Now there are forty women in the classes."

"FLY BY NIGHT."

Joe Jefferson Gives an Amusing Story of Its Origin.

I presume that most people who visit the theater have heard the term "fly by night" applied to minor and unstable theatrical companies, but I believe there are very few, if any, who understand the meaning of the term, and among even the present generation of actors there is probably none who knows how the term originated.

It was in the days when old Sol Smith, dead and gone these many years, had a strolling company which played in only the smallest and queerest of all the small queer towns in the south and west. Smith and his company were playing a varied repertory, as every company had to do at that time, of which "Macbeth," with all of Locke's original music, was a prominent feature. But the public proved unappreciative, and the times were hard. Soon old Sol and his company were at low water mark, and at length found themselves stranded in a little Kentucky town, from which a flinty hearted landlord refused to permit them to remove their baggage until they had liquidated his claim against them for board.

Smith felt that he was equal to the emergency, having "been there" often before, and he cast about in his mind for some means of deliverance. At length he hit upon a plan. He engaged a countryman to bring a strong wagon, drawn by a pair of sturdy horses, under the window of his room at the back of the tavern at a certain hour on the following night. The members of the company were let into the secret, and it was arranged that on the night in question they should throw the landlord off his guard by assembling in the parlor and practicing one of the witches' choruses composed by Locke for "Macbeth" and entitled "We Fly by Night," in which those words are repeated over and over again. Meanwhile old Sol and his most trusty henchman were to lower the trunks from the window to the countryman, who was waiting below to receive them.

This programme was carried out to the letter. The company was singing "We Fly by Night" for dear life in the parlor, while Smith and his man Friday were letting down the trunks with as much celerity and quietness as possible, but, alas! not, as they fondly thought, into the hands of the countryman who was to convey them to a place of safety, but into those of the landlord, who had somehow or other got wind of the scheme.

At length the work was completed. Old Sol and his companion, with a great load lifted from their minds, joined the company in the parlor and united with them in singing "We Fly by Night." But just as they had sung those words for the third time the door opened, and the landlord, entering, said, with a winning smile, "Excuse me, ladies and gentlemen, but you won't fly this night, for I still have possession of your trunks."

From that to the present all queer dramatic and musical companies have been known as "fly by nights."—Joseph Jefferson in New York Herald.

Not? If Not, Why Not?

The Gas and Gasoline Engine is rapidly taking the place of all other small power, and having noticed many inferior machines on the market, poorly constructed, we have been prompted to make a machine of superior merit and workmanship, and do away with all of their objectionable features.

We are constructing these engines of the best material, and using wrought-iron and steel liberally, and not throwing them together, which is the case with a great many other manufacturers of gas engines. Our aim being to excel all others in workmanship.

HERCULES GAS ENGINES GASOLINE ENGINES

For simplicity They are The Best!

Can be run on natural or illuminating gas.

Our Gas Engines consume about twenty cubic feet of gas per horse-power per hour. Our Gasoline Engines consume about one-eighth of a gallon of gasoline per hour per horse-power.

All Engines fitted with governor attachment, which regulates the supply of gas, according to power used.

Workmanship the best

A boy can start them.

They oil from feed-cups, and are almost altogether automatic.

Have fewer parts, therefore are less likely to get out of order than any other engine now built.

Our Marine Engines are double cylinder, very compact, with the weight below the water line.

The full actual horse power of every engine is guaranteed.

Expense does not start until you commence to run the engine.

They run with a cheaper grade of gasoline than other engines.

THE CATTLE BELLS.

Far down the brown autumnal haze—
High on the peak is snow—
Cattle that smell the winter days
Tinkle their bells as they go.

Out of a thick veil drawn to save
The sky's face from the blast,
Those tiny bells, as fairies wave
Their wand, evoke the past.

That music once before I heard,
But then the notes were glad,
Caroling like a careless bird;
Ah, why now is it sad?

Upon this brow now crowned by care
My love a garland laid;
We heard the bells, now here, now there
Dead are the leaves and maid.

Mayhap for happier maid and man
The tender music swells,
And I will smile while yet I can
List to the cattle bells.

A PEDDLER'S PERIL.

The sun sank behind the western mountain peaks, and the short twilight of southern latitudes came on apace. After a time the man of the house came in. He was tall and thin. Two ferret-like eyes gleamed sharply upon the peddler from amid a shaggy tangle of white hair and beard.

He placed his long rifle in a rack over the door, unslung his shot pouch and then seated himself and gazed gloomily into the fire, without vouchsafing either a greeting to the stranger or a word to his own family. Nan, passing by, whispered to the peddler:

"Don't ye mind uncle; he's got one of his bad spells on now, but if he ain't bothered it'll pass off by and by."

The peddler nodded, and began a tale concerning one of his adventures in Texas. He was soon interrupted by Aunt Viney.

"Sit up, stranger," said she. "We hain't got much to eat, but such as it is you're welcome."

The old man ate his supper in solemn silence, after which he took his hat and abruptly left the cabin. Aunt Viney saw fit to explain.

"Mose, my old man, hain't been exactly like hisself since the revenoo men carried his son John off five year ago last April."

"'Stillin I s'pose?"

"Yes, 'nd top of that he shot one of 'em while they were tryin to take him, 'nd they put him in pen'tensh'ry at Nashville for ten year."

The peddler remained silent for a moment or two. But when the dishes were washed and put away he again entertained the two women by relating sundry reminiscences of his own career, and also describing the wonders of certain great cities he had visited.

After awhile Mose again stalked silently in and took a seat in a far corner. While the peddler talked he continued to eye him closely, as if suspicious that the stranger was not just what he should be.

"Speakin of the telephone," continued the peddler, "some folks in these mountains don't believe that people can talk to each other, 'nd them a hundred or more miles apart, but I tell ye it's a fact. I've seed it done myself."

"I've knowed of men hollerin across from one mountain to another," said Aunt Viney dubiously. "Mebbe they could make themselves heard a matter of two miles. But a hundred"— she shook her head disapprovingly.

"It's so all the same, though. I'v sot 'nd heard 'em talkin jas' as we be now."

"That's as big a lie as ever was told," exclaimed old Mose, rising and making for the door.

He seized his rifle as he passed, threw a menacing glance at the peddler and once more left the cabin.

"Old man's a little touched in the head, ain't he?" asked the peddler, who seemed to take no offense whatever at the old man's rude behavior.

"Ever since John was took off he's had queer spells that come over him every now and then. I must say he's more'n apt to be 'spishus of strangers when they come around. He's always thinkin of revenoo spies. I dessay that's what makes him act so toward you. But you musn't mind him. I never know'd him to succeed in hurtin any one yet."

It was Nan who replied, for Aunt Viney was making preparations to retire for the night. When the girl and the peddler were left alone the latter seemed somewhat curious about this son John, who for so many years had been under the ban of the law.

"John was always good to Uncle Mose and Aunt Viney, 'nd that's one reason Uncle Mose takes it all so hard now."

"I s'pose, bein as you're kin to 'em, you must 'a' felt powerful bad when they took him off?"

He eyed Nan closely as he spoke, and the girl blushed slightly.

"I ain't no real kin to 'em," said she. "My folks is all dead, 'nd they raised me from a little gal, but John 'nd me was always good friends."

"Nothin more?"

The girl looked at him reprovingly.

"It's about bedtime," said she coldly. "Shan't I show you were you're to sleep?"

The peddler rose, took up his pack and followed her into the little shed room. There was an open window by the bed, through which the full moon was shining.

"You won't need no light, I reckon," she remarked. Then, bidding him good night, she returned to the main cabin and went to bed herself.

But for some reason she failed to sleep. The bright moonlight, the rasping cry of katydids from the trees without and the discomforting nature of her thoughts kept her awake. She felt vaguely uneasy about Uncle Mose. Where was he? Very likely at the little moonshine still up Bear hollow, half a mile away. He often spent the night there engaged in his illicit toil. She remembered his unfriendly treatment of the peddler, whose heavy breathing could now be heard through the thin partition wall. He had once laid in wait, rifle in hand, for a passing drover, whom he had set down for a spy. Only Aunt Viney's prompt appearance had prevented a probable murder. Uncle Mose, though a good man enough when in his right mind, was a dangerous, uncertain personage when stirred by the memory of his son into a spirit of half insane hostility against all the world.

So uneasy did Nan become that at last she rose, slipped on her dress and stole out into the moonlight. An impulse she could not control impelled her to peep in at the peddler's open window. She was prompted by an indefinable fear. What she saw there caused her to start back, clasp her hands and gasp for breath. Then, trembling in every limb, she looked again.

"My God!" she faltered. "Am I dreamin? Surely it can't be—'nd yet I must believe my own eyes."

Acting under a new impulse she turned and fled along the trail leading to the mill. Arrived there she found the place silent and deserted. There was no fire in the furnace and nothing to be heard but the cries of the whippoorwills upon the mountain side.

Full of painful forebodings she retraced her steps and once more crouched beneath the peddler's window. There she waited until her limbs became cramped and the night air chilled her to the bone.

"I might as well lie down again," she thought. "I reckon uncle's gone down the valley, for he 'lowed today as he'd have to go after coffee right away. I could wake the man up, but somehow I dassn't. He might think I was forward."

But a second trial of the bed was no better than the first. The peddler's heavy breathing was ever in her ears, and her thoughts reverted constantly to the sense of peril that vaguely, yet persistently kept her upon the tenterhooks of anxiety.

"I wish mornin would come," she said for the hundredth time. "Lord, what a meeting there'll be then!"

The sound of a stealthy footfall upon the gravel without brought her to a sitting position at once. Her heart beat loudly as she listened breathlessly. Yes, it was moving around the house. Now she heard it no more. Could she have imagined it all? No; there it was again—in the back porch.

Then—then—she heard a gentle creaking sound. Ah! The shedroom door! She sprang out of bed, and a hasty bound brought her to the door leading into the back porch. She wrenched it open just in time to catch a glimpse of a tall shadow that disappeared within the shedroom.

"Good Lord, help me!" she faintly ejaculated as she sprang forward, nerved to desperation by this dreadful fulfillment of her fears.

She entered the room. There lay the peddler, slumbering heavily in the white glow of the moonlight. His face was strangely altered, for the heavy beard had fallen off, leaving exposed a clean shaven, youthful face. But the white bearded old man bending over the prostrate form with uplifted knife saw nothing distinctly. To his morbid imaginings only the form of a hated spy lay helpless before him. A spy in the service of the detested "revenoos," who had robbed him of his only and well beloved son.

"Uncle!" screamed Nan, dragging him back. "Uncle! You shall not. Can't you see? It's John—our John—your John!"

The peddler woke and stared upward in a bewildered way. The knife fell to the floor as Mose, his eyes almost starting from his head, stared at his son's white face. Suddenly he comprehended, and the effect descended upon him like a thunderbolt.

Uttering a low, quivering cry he sank to his knees by the bedside, and his head fell forward. Nan's and John's eyes met in a mutually recognizing glance; then they turned their attention to the old man. As they laid him upon the bed Aunt Viney, awakened by the noise, came in. She fell as though confronted by a ghost.

"John!" she exclaimed. "Yet it can't shorely be!"

"Yes, it is, mother. I didn't know how you'd all take my bein so long in the pen, so when the governor pardoned me out I 'lowed I'd come home as a peddler 'nd in disguise till I found out if you all cared for me any more."

While John was speaking Mose opened his eyes, and tears blinded them as he gazed.

"My son, my son!" he murmured brokenly. "And I might have killed him! My mind's made up. There'll be no more 'stillin done in Bear holler after this."

"Do you reckon Nan cares for me any more, father?" asked John, while his eyes sought those of Nan.

"Of course she do. Hasn't she been grievin herself away ever since you was took. She never looked at another man."

Nan's confusion seemed to sanction this.

"There's only one thing to be done," interrupted Aunt Viney decisively. "They've just got to go over to the circuit rider's next Sunday 'nd git married. After that's over 'nd done with, Mose, I do hope you'll behave yourself in futur'."

"Hain't I said I weren't a-goin to 'still whisky any more?" said Mose. "'Stillin's been at the bottom of all our troubles."

While the old folks talked John took Nan's hand in his, and they steathily kissed each other.—William Perry Brown in Philadelphia Times.

Children and Young Animals.

The playfulness that is characteristic of children is no less so of kittens, nor is their imitativeness more typical than that from which the word "to ape" has been derived. Curiosity, inventiveness, dislike of ridicule, love of being fondled, craving for attention, with the resulting jealousy and anger when such attention is refused, are types of more complex emotions common to intelligent animals and children. Indeed the terms of familiarity so often found and so easily established between children and their pets cannot but be based, in part at least, upon a deep sympathy and community of emotional life.—Joseph Jastrow in Popular Science Monthly.

A CLEVER TRICK.

How Linemen String Wires Where People Don't Want Them.

THEY ARE VERY SELDOM DETECTED.

Some of Them are so Skillful That They Can Run a Line Almost Under Your Nose Without Being Seen.

On the roof of a lofty building in the business district two brawny linemen were toiling among the network of wires fastened to a high series of cross arms. One bent his ear close to a tiny telegraph instrument connected with a wire, while the other, under his direction, busily twisted two wires together.

"Hold on," cried the man listening at the instrument. "They want to measure resistance. We'll have to wait awhile."

The two descended, and behind a huge chimney lit their pipes. Asked a young man, who had been watching them with interest:

"Suppose you wanted to string a wire from this to that building opposite, how would you do it?"

"That's against the law, young man," responded the taller of the two linemen. "Telegraph companies never break the law."

"But suppose you wanted to?"

"Young man, if I wanted to carry a wire across the street from here I'd let you go down on the sidewalk and watch, and while you were watching I'd get the wire over and you'd never know it. How? Well, that's a business secret, but I don't mind telling you that I've known men to perform the feat several ways. If I wanted to do it I might take that pilot wire, for instance, that is composed of two or three strands. I might twist a bunch of wires to go across the street till they exactly resembled the pilot wire to an observer on the sidewalk. I might cut the pilot wire, hitching on my bunch, and keeping it taut by main strength my man opposite would slowly haul it over.

"You wouldn't know it was moving. When he had wire enough I'd shake out the wires I wanted from the bunch and leave the rest to make good the gap in the pilot. If I couldn't find a pilot wire on the particular roof I'd take the biggest gauge single wire there and hitch two small wires twisted together to it, make a fine joint, and my assistant would haul them over. One would serve to make up the break in the big wire, the other would be mine. If I were driven to it and had to get a rope across the street I'd work either early in the evening or early in the morning, when I have heard there are only a few policemen around, and those either asleep or champs that wouldn't know what I was doing.

"I knew a man on Dearborn street who had one wire in his office and had to have another. An enemy swore he shouldn't, and hired a man and a policeman to watch the corners of two buildings on opposite sides of the street and the sky to see that no wire was strung. While they were looking the wire went over. It was a little, two strand cable, just the size of the single wire, and after it was fastened to the latter and the joint nicely soldered it took an hour to pull it slowly over."

"If you were to undertake such a job wouldn't you be liable to mistake the wire—get the wrong one? There are a good many on the roof tops."

"Yes, there are thousands of them—telegraph, telephone, electric light, signal, fire alarm, public and private, dead and secret—but there are scores of linemen that know every one. I can put my hands on a dozen men, any one of whom you can take blindfolded on any roof and he'll tell you the name, number, ownership, use, destination, origin and age of every wire in the biggest rack you can find. It's kind of a natural knowledge. You either know it or you don't. I know a man who can't read or write, but he can break open a thirty two strand cable and pick out the wire he wants.

"It is always a fellow who knows the wire geography of the roofs," he continued, "that makes the taps. Are there many taps? You don't hear of a fraction of them. It is natural that sometimes people would try to catch the secrets worth thousands of dollars that go over telegraph wires, ain't it?"

"I was after a tap the other day and found it in our own office tower. It reminded me of another in the days of the hottest war against the bucket shops. A certain shop was getting quotations. We made a dozen tests and tours and found nothing. Finally, by accident, I discovered the operator in a certain hotel had his instrument near a telephone, and shouted quotations out too loudly. I looked at that telephone and found that it was kept in circuit by a little wooden peg under the lever, which was apparently with the earpiece hanging in it. That was a good dodge, but the tappers made it a beautiful one by taking that telephone wire all over town and actually breaking open a telephone cable, running it through that a piece, then into another cable and finally taking it through a central tower, all to disarm suspicion. We located its other end in an office in a high building on Clark street, and there sat a telegraph operator, the phone to his ear, catching the shouted quotations of the other operator and telegraphing them over a secret wire to the bucket shop.

"In another case they left a blind lead for us in the shape of a wire half concealed running into a hole in a brick wall, while they broke open the linen covered line wire, fastened their tiny copper threads to it and ran them down holes bored in the insulator into a chimney. In another case they tapped every wire of a certain company and rigged up a battery of their own, thus making themselves independent, and bade defiance to that company for four weeks, till it dropped on the taps in its own office. In another case they went on a certain roof, the owner of which swore he would shoot any man found there stringing more wires, and kept a guard to do it, and while the guard was on hand they tapped the wire they wanted. Of course we didn't think of looking there, and didn't go up there till we had to, fearing we'd be thrown off. Oh, there are tricks in all trades—but ours."—Chicago Tribune.

THE APPARENT GROWTH OF GOLD.

Instances That Make a Thoughtless Man Believe in the Myth.

Of the many myths prevalent regarding gold the greatest one of all is its growth. Of course there are many interesting instances where ancient worked out galleries in mines are slowly closing up by the incrustation process, so that space long ago excavated is being filled with an accumulation resulting from the percolation of water through the adjacent wall rock. This water has in chemical combination such minerals as iron, copper, sulphur and the precious metals, which are deposited in the open crevice, making for a second time a mineralized body which will show by analysis the above named and many more minerals.

In fact, I have had this actual experience resultant on the examination of an old gold mine in Honduras, Central America, that had been worked some time prior to any history we have of that country. This circumstance gave to the natives the idea that gold grew, and they so express themselves, while it seemed in the case of one individual a transmutation idea had permeated his head, for he explained that the green carbonate of copper was undergoing a change into silver, while the silver in turn would develop into gold.

In India I found a caste of mining people who believed that gold grew in the bottom of the large lakes situated in that country. They expressed no practical reason other than fairy tale superstitions. And even in this country there are converts to the idea. I was much amused and interested some years ago to hear an intelligent acquaintance maintain in strong and not altogether religious terms that "the stuff grew and he knew it." His experience was based on the fact that in a certain pile of tailings, resulting from the milling of heavy sulphureted gold ores, he had treated at one time several tons with no result.

Again, in three years time, he discovered by a pan test that the same pile had gold in it, whereupon he treated several tons with the approximate result of one dollar per ton. After this last treatment he declared the tailings were barren of gold so far as he could detect by the mechanical means at hand. In order to convince him I selected an average sample, which on assay gave two pennyweights, twenty grains gold per 2,000-pound ton. This was considered not worth the working. But my friend maintained that the gold would grow again in two or three years.

True to his word, in two years he was at the pile again, and by his crude but sure method was saving one dollar per ton from the ore that would yield nil by his methods two years before. Again I took samples for assay and was somewhat surprised to find the value had increased just 50 per cent., as the result of my determination was five pennyweights, sixteen grains per ton. On investigation I found the sulphurets to be of a character readily decomposed by the elements; in fact, to such an extent that, as I afterward calculated, over one-half of the pile must have been decomposed or washed away, so that with the decomposition a certain rapid concentration was maintained by the action of heavy rains, and the natural advantage this particular ground offered causing the gold to remain behind while the oxides were carried away in suspension by the water.

My explanation has failed to convince my friend of the pick and shovel. As the gold in the tailings has become about exhausted, his last attempt to make pay was a failure. He remains strong in the conviction that a few years will grow it again.—Richard Eames, Jr., in Science.

Mrs. Carlyle at Home.

Mrs. Carlyle looked like one of the grand ladies our father used sometimes to take us to call upon. She used to be handsomely dressed in velvet and point lace. She sat there at leisure and prepared for conversation. She was not familiar, but cordial, dignified and installed in her corner of the sofa by one of the little tables covered with knickknacks of silver and mother of pearl.

Almost the first time we ever went to see her we had walked to Chelsea through the snow, and across those lanes which have now become South Kensington, and when we arrived, numb and chilled and tired, we found in the dining room below, standing before the fire, two delicious hot cups of chocolate already prepared for us, with saucers placed upon the top. "I thought ye would be frozen," said she, and the hot chocolate became a sort of institution. Again and again she has sat by, benevolent and spirited, superintending our wintry feasts, inviting our confidences, confiding in us to a certain degree.

She used to tell us many of the stories which have since come into print. She was never weary of discoursing of Carlyle, of his genius, his dyspepsia, of quoting his sayings. "If you wish for a quiet life," she used to say, "never you marry a dyspeptic man of genius." I remember she used to tell us, when he first grew a beard, how all the time he had saved by ceasing to shave he spent wandering about the house and bemoaning that which was an ass in the universe. As children we did not have much of Carlyle's company; if he came in and sat down in the armchair which was his on the opposite side of the sofa, we immediately went away, but the sense of his presence overhead in the study distinctly added to our enjoyment while he remained up stairs.—Anne Ritchie in Macmillan's Magazine.

The Greatest Stickler for Etiquette.

Dr. Thompson, master of Trinity college, Cambridge, was an exceedingly cold and austere man, never taking much notice of the undergraduates under his care. On one occasion a Trinity man happened to be out walking and was caught in a storm. He ran across a field and took shelter beneath a large tree. When he arrived there he found, to his horror, that Dr. Thompson was beneath it, seeking protection from the rain. For some time both stood silent, watching the clouds, till at last the undergraduate, growing desperate, ventured to remark that he thought it was clearing up a little.

"Sir," said the doctor haughtily, frowning upon the wretched youth, "all communications to the master of Trinity must be made through the tutors."—Exchange.

The Price of a Painted Ass.

"In an art exhibition of London," wrote the shah of Persia in the journal he kept during his last visit to Europe, "we were looking at a painting representing an ass. I asked, 'What is the price of this painting?' The director of the exhibition, who was a corpulent man with a white beard, looked up the price list and said, 'One hundred English pounds,' which are equal to 250 Persian toman. I answered, 'The price of a live ass is at the most five pounds; why should this be so dear when it is only the picture of an ass?' The director replied, 'Because it causes no expense and eats neither hay nor oats.' I said, 'Although it causes no expense, it can on the other hand neither carry burdens nor give a man a ride.' We both laughed."

EMBLEM EXPERTS

Wise People in the Matter of Fraternity Pins and Badges.

A VERY FASCINATING BUSINESS.

A Bowery Man Who Makes These Things a Feature of His Pawnbrokers Sale Shop—Different Designs.

On the Bowery not far from Broome street is a pawnbroker's sale shop, the proprietor of which makes a specialty of dealing in college fraternity pins and badges. You may examine every other pawnshop and sale store on the Bowery and find not more than five or six such emblems in all of them, but in this shop, occupying a conspicuous position in the show window, there is always a velvet covered tray on which a dozen or more pins of different secret societies are displayed. The place is getting to be known among college men, and people who have lost fraternity badges go there as the first step to finding them.

Every few weeks the proprietor of the place goes on a tour of the pawnshops looking for badges, and in his long experience he has picked up a fund of information about college fraternities that would put the average graduate to the blush. There is not much money in that particular branch, he says, but he has become interested in it and made it a sort of study. Not only does he know the emblems of every fraternity in this part of the country, but he is a perfect encyclopedia of information regarding their relative size, importance and the peculiar characteristics of each society and of the colleges in which each has its chapters. One would be certain that he himself is a college man but for certain peculiarities of speech that proclaim the east sider and his positive assertion that he has never been inside the doors of a college and has never even seen any but the local colleges from the outside.

A reporter in search of a lost badge which he thought might have found its way, as many lost articles do, into a Bowery pawnshop went into this store to look over the stock of fraternity pins. He didn't find his badge, but he found many others. The proprietor had some interesting things to tell about some of his pins.

"There ain't many things in this line that's fun," said he. "A man wouldn't go into it for his health. But this secret society pin business is mighty interestin. Of course you understand it's only a side lay—not my regular trade. How did I get into it? Why, the funny letters on the pins used to catch me when I was on the lookout for stuff in the hockshops, and I began pickin 'em up. Then I got interested more by an old gent from the University club that was up on that line and used to tell me things about the badges and their different organizations. He came into my shop one day to look at a badge. That's how I got to know him. He used to send me books and magazine articles on fraternities till I got to know as much about it as he did, and now I guess they ain't many college societies in this part of the country that I don't know enough about to surprise the members if I wanted to tell it.

"They ain't a college fraternity in the east but what I've handled one or more of its pins. I'm keepin tab on the hockshops all the while, and whenever I find a badge I nail it. Usually I get 'em cheap, for they ain't any demand for 'em to speak of. Occasionally a man brings in a pin to me, or I see one on a bum's coat and buy it, but it's mostly the pawnshops. How do I s'pose they gv' there? Well, most of 'em are lost, I think. I know enough about 'em to know that the last thing a college man'll hock is his society pin. When they do hock 'em, though, it's down here, and not up town, where they think other college fellows may go in and see 'em. They get mighty little on 'em, for the hockshop men are dead leary of things they don't understand. Of course the pin itself has a good deal to do with it. If it's heavily jeweled, a man may get half its value on it. Then pins that are a marked design hock well, because they sell well. The T pin of the Delta Psis, and the star and crescent of the Alpha Delta, and the crosses like the Alpha Tau Omega or Delta Phi will find a market easier than the plain monogram pins or the diamond shaped.

"Now, here's a pin," continued this erudite student of fraternities, taking a small, plain Psi Upsilon pin from the case, "that I've had here for 18 months, and not an offer for it. I got it in a queer way. I was in a hock shop down by Canal street chewin the rag over a couple of badges that the proprietor had, when in came a young woman about 26 or 28 maybe and pretty, too, only she looked kind of half starved. She unpinned the pin from her dress and asked:

"'How much will you loan me on this?'

"Her voice trembled, but she was game and kept a steady face. The man offered her $1, and she turned to go out, when I said I'd give her $3 for it.

"'I don't want to sell it,' she said. 'I want to get it back some time.'

"'Well, I'll keep it six months for you,' I told her and gave her my business card. She took the money, and she kissed the pin before she handed it to me. I never saw her again. There's nothin on the pin but her name."

The speaker handed the pin to the reporter, who looked on the back and saw engraved the one word "Lizzie." He returned the pin to its place, and it is probably there now if any Psi U wants to go Bowery hunting for it.—New York Sun.

Had to Do It.

She—Why, there's Charley Van Beet. Don't you remember his going to California some time ago with his fiancee?

He—I should say I did. He wrote me he didn't have money enough to get back. How do you suppose he managed it?

She—Why, he married her out there.—Life.

Mrs. Logan's Faith in Men.

A woman who is intimately connected with Mrs. John A. Logan in charitable enterprises tells the following story, which is a good illustration of Mrs. Logan's tact and diplomacy:

Mrs. Logan had given the use of her house and grounds for a garden party in aid of the Garfield hospital, with which institution she has been identified since its establishment. The committee of ladies and one or two gentlemen friends were as busy as possible with the thousand and one arrangements which such an entertainment requires, and Mrs. Logan was everywhere. Nothing could be done without appealing to her.

A loan of tents had been obtained from the war department, but the soldiers sent from the barracks with them had not been ordered by their commander to set them up when delivered.

The bulky mass of canvas and the poles were heaped on the grass, while the men lounged under a tree in idle content. It grew late, and the ladies became correspondingly anxious. No one liked to order men who wore the blue of their country's service to go to work, for fear of breaking some iron clad military rule.

Suddenly Mrs. Logan said, "I will set the tents up myself," and off she went across the lawn at a quick pace.

She had a big apron tied over her black dress, and a pretty white sunbonnet on her equally white hair, for the day was very hot.

Her associates looked on in wonder while she surveyed the ground in a businesslike way, marked several places with pegs, and finally took up a spade and began to dig.

The soldiers were at first amazed, then recovering sprang to their feet, and offered to do the work. Mrs. Logan thanked them in the charming way natural to her, relinquished the spade and returned to the ladies. A chorus of voices arose:

"Oh, Mrs. Logan, is there anything you can't do? How did you learn to set tents?"

"Sh! Sh!" was the response. "Not so loud! I don't know anything more about putting up tents than you do, but I felt sure those men wouldn't be willing to see a woman doing it."

Was Man Once a Bear?

Speaking of his theory as opposed to that of the descent from apes, Professor F. G. Gherke says:

An ape has none of the characteristics of a man. An ape imitates; a man reasons. An ape has four hands, all of which are unlike either the hands or feet of man. Apes are idiots, something that cannot be said of the very lowest orders of mankind. I say that man has descended from bears, and I can prove it. In a museum at Paris I saw the skeleton of a cave bear, which I examined very closely. I was convinced at the time that the animal had a partially developed kneepan, and since that time I have given the matter much study. I went over in my mind to a time beyond the history of man. I remembered that skeletons of primeval man had been found in caves with bears. Another thing, nearly all skeletons of primeval man are of gigantic size. The bear is nearer the size of a man than the average ape, and could have gotten rid of his little fragment of a tail much more easily than an ape could of his.

My idea is that the earlier bears came down from the north, probably through Behring straits, and drifted toward the tropic shores of Asia on icebergs. As these melted the bears easily found shelter on islands and along the coast of the mainland. In the course of ages great floods came and the bears sought shelter in caves. In the meantime great changes had been going on; the bear had been gradually shedding his heavy coat as a result of exposure to tropical heat; he had also learned to walk on his hind feet. In the caves, in the dry, warm atmosphere, other changes took place. The connecting link was a kind of hairy, indescribable man, who lived and died in these caves beside his elder brother—the bear.

The Demands of Literature.

Artist, author, actor, singer, inventor, politician—become a remarkable person of any sort, and you will have a remarkable time of it. Even quite third rate people have remarkable times; what sort of times must the truly great ones have? If you desire to win your way in literature you must do something else besides write—a great deal more. Some journals of declared high standing are beginning to make a rule of publishing certain matter not only over the signature of the author, but under his portrait. It is no good sending work to them, however good, unless you are prepared to make your features public property. You will receive applications for a few "biograpical details." The applicant will resent it if you decline, and if you have balked his desire to construct a "par" at your expense, will possibly express his sense of your "discourtesy" in good, clear print. He will be safe to "bag" you either way.

You will receive requests for your autograph from persons whom you do not know, and do not want to know. If you do not send it they will be amazed. They "inclosed" a stamped and addressed envelope and a blank sheet of paper. Do you want a pen and ink as well? Everybody sends his autograph nowadays. The great Blank sends his—always, to every one. The impertinence of such a nobody as you declining! But these are but minor worries of the third or fourth rate map, the actor at £20 a week or the [illegible] of the latest shilling [illegible]. They are nothing to the worries of the truly great.—All the Year Round.

A Journalist on the Rampage.

Rousseau, the originator of the "Comic Tribunals," amused himself of an evening, along with a few friends, in pulling down the signboards and changing their places. Next day he would write in the papers, "When will the prefecture of police rid us of the gang of ruffians that disturb the public peace and annoy our worthy shopkeepers?" The authorities, thus put on their mettle, set a few extra detectives at work, with the result that Rousseau himself was arrested and taken before the commissaire.

"Your name?" inquired that functionary.

"Rousseau."

"Your profession?"

"Actress at the Odeon."

"What did you say?"

"Actress at the Odeon."

"My dear sir, this is not the place to carry on the silly jokes you have been practicing in the streets; you might have to smart for it, you know."

"Monsieur le commissaire," said Rousseau, "the pretty women at the Odeon theater are not to be prevailed upon to take the parts of old ladies, and the manager has decided to engage a few gentlemen for the purpose, and I am among the number. I was therefore quite correct in saying that I am an actress at the Odeon."

And the commissaire gravely wrote down, "M. Rousseau, actress at the Odeon."—Magazin des Familles.

WHALE HUNTING.

The Old Time Spear has Been Succeeded by Surer Weapons.

THE WAY IN WHICH THEY ARE USED

Combination Dart and Bomb That Raises a Commotion in the Interior of the Biggest Whale Encountered.

Not the least interesting of the articles disgorged by the whaler of today are the weapons with which the blubber hunters slay the leviathans of the deep. Whalers who keep pace with the times use neither the old harpoon nor the heavy bomb throwing gun that succeeded it. A combination of both enters into the latter day weapon, and its use requires such muscle, nerve and accurate judgment that something of the glory and emoluments of the ancient harpooner are once more attached to the successful boat header.

Two weapons are employed in killing. Whalers call the first one a "darting gun." It is a queer looking contrivance, mounted on a wooden shaft from eight to ten feet long, and bearing more resemblance to a clumsy three tined fork, with the tines of unequal size and length, than anything else. The central tine is the gun, and the others are respectively the harpoon and the trigger. But the harpoon is not called a harpoon; it is a "toggle iron," a slender iron pike some 2½ feet in length, with a loop near the butt to which the whale line proper is made fast. Half a dozen inches from the point a hinge is set in by a rivet. When closed for penetrating this hinge presents a sharp, cutting edge and a gradual slope that offers no impediment to the iron's movement through the blubber.

The slightest resistance from the rear, such as a pull on the line, opens this hinge or toggle joint to right angles, and the lower end of the hinge presents a broad concave surface that holds the iron from being withdrawn save by tearing a path out through the flesh equal to the length of the hinge—some five inches. This iron penetrates much deeper than any other portion of the "gun," and by it the whale is held in leash and followed in event the bomb fails to do its work.

The central tine of the huge fork is the gun proper, and a queer looking gun it is. A copper cylinder an inch to an inch and a half in diameter firmly fastened to a little square metal box on the end of the shaft is all that is visible of the mechanism, and there is nothing to suggest gun about either cylinder or box. There is a little door set in the box, however, and when that is opened a lock and trigger are disclosed, which connect with the third tine. On the inside of the box the trigger fires an ounce of powder in the butt of the cylinder, and this propels the bomb from the mouth of the cylinder at the same time that it ignites a five second fuse leading to the chamber of the bomb.

The bomb looks more like a brass railroad spike without a head than an implement of destruction. It is slightly larger than a railroad spike, however, and is charged with tonite. It is usually strong enough to create a fatal commotion in the interior of the largest whale afloat.

An understanding of the simple method of the cumbersome affair is not a matter of difficulty. The bow is the location of the whaler who plays the part of the harpooner of old. His object is to bury his ponderous weapon just back of the fin. Twenty-five feet is considered a long cast, but there are a few much sought after giants who can add ten feet to this distance without losing anything of their accuracy of aim. The keen toggle iron, pushed by the weight of the other hamper, penetrates the soft blubber to a depth of four or five feet before it releases itself from the loose rings used to hold it to the head of the wooden shaft.

The "gun's" penetration amounts to just sufficient to steady it before the third tine or trigger performs its part. This trigger is a blunt iron rod of just sufficient length to come in violent contact, end on, with the whale's hide when the copper cylinder serving as a gun barrel is directed fairly against the target. The pressure on the rod touches off the trigger; this explodes the powder charge, and the powder charge speeds the bomb after the toggle iron into the whale's vitals, the five second fuse burning as it is dragged through the outlying blubber.

The damage up to date is trifling, speaking from a whale's standpoint, but when that explosion of tonite occurs in his inner consciousness it is usually sufficient to put any thoughts of future existence out of his head. Not always, though. The bomb may not go near a vital spot or the fuse may not ignite the tonite, and there is an anxious minute or two while the monster goes below, impelled by the shock of his wounds. If he comes up in a "flurry," as whalemen call the death agony, well and good, but if there is an intelligent vigor in his movements, betokening a desire for revenge or escape, there is another bomb waiting for him. This one is from a 24-pound gun, for which the head killer in the bow has exchanged his darting gun. The latter, by the way, is all recovered but the bomb. The powder charge rids it of the bomb and the toggle iron and the gun and the trigger remain fixed to the boat en shaft, which is covered with line.

A whale line is fast to the toggle iron, buried deep in the monster's fat, and it goes whirring out of its tub to such limitless lengths that there is no possibility of the whale's dragging the boat down with him. It is a light line, but tough, and a whale could tow a boat around by it all day without fear of its breaking.

The guns reserved for the finishing bomb are of two patterns. One is an extremely heavy affair, bordering on being a young cannon, and is mounted on a swivel in the bow, while the other is a large edition of the cutoff shotgun, with a cushion of rubber in the stock to save the shoulder of the man who fires it. The bombs are of the same character as those used in the hand propelled darting gun, but are larger and more symmetrical in shape, and are feathered with rubber, arrow fashion, to insure their voyaging end on.

A bomb costs about $1.75 loaded, and the whaleman doesn't care if it takes half a dozen of them to kill if they only get the bowhead. The bowhead's jaw contains 1,250 pounds of bone on the average, so that there is a profit over the cost of an extra bomb or two, especially when bone is in demand at six dollars per pound.—San Francisco Examiner.

For the last forty years China has been drawing from this country from ten to twelve million dollars a year. That is, what she sells us is worth about $17,000,000. what we sell China is worth between four and five million dollars. If the war were only kept up until we could unload about $15,000,000 worth of ships and guns and powder and canned fruit and bacon and flour into China. it will be a welcome change from a rule which has been prevailing for the last forty years.

The arrest of the President and Secretary of the Newark steel Manufactory for attempting to defraud the Government by furnishing castings with plugged blowholes is the right kind of a move. If the Government has been deliberately swindled, the men who swindled it ought to be in jail whether they are millionaires or paupers. If one of the workmen had swindled the Government there would be no hesitation in ordering his arrest and prosecution. The same kind of law ought to be administered to the Carnegies, the Fricks, the Illingworths and other rich offenders who have been caught in the act.

One of the handsomest publications of its kind that has ever come to this office is the souvenir issued by the Sacramento Bee, under the title of "Where California Fruits Grow—Resources of Sacramento County." it is a volume of 200 large-sized pages and is as hansome as letter press and engraving can make it. The illustrations are profuse and the accompanying descriptive matter is interesting to the utmost to all who care to learn of the resources of this matchless State. The people of Sacramento have set a good example in liberally patronizing a home institution and enabling the publication of such a volume, which is certainly an invaluable advertisement for their community. The Bee is to be congratulated upon this latest and best proof of its enterprise.

The nature of the miserable logic which sustains anarchy is shown by the fact that the only country in which the dogma at present thrives is republican France. It may be safely stated that no nation in Europe now affords the people a better government than France. Liberty and equality there blossom and fructify in all their modern splendor. And yet the anarchists have lately murdered its President and are are now plotting against its Prime Minister. It is quite true that the Government has for some time been making it warm for the anarchists, but that was because they began the trouble. The devotees of anarchy are afflicted with a species of mental irresponsibility not difficult to understand. They may fitly be called the mad dogs of society. There is no occasion for their madness, unless the climate or the condition of the planets has brought it about, but they are nevertheless stark insane. Professedly their wrath is directly against the Government, but really it takes the form of individual revenge. The gentle Carnot was murdered because he had officially approved the sentences inflicted upon other anarchists. Presumably the plot recently discovered for taking the life of Premier Dupuy was hatched for the same reason. Even the anarchists must have long since seen that killing the rulers of republics does not overthrow them, and it is quite probable that individual revenge is the leading motive. It would seem to the thoughtful observer that the soil of republics ought not to be fruitful for anarchy, and yet that appears to be the only soil upon which it thrives and reaches maturity. If there are any anarchists in Russia, Germany, Austria, England, Italy, Spain, Turkey, they do not often manifest themselves. It has been a long time since the nihilists of Russia have managed to assassinate a high official. But in the United States and France. where every man may do as he pleases, within a decade these mad dogs have dispatched two Presidents, the Mayor of one large city and any numbers of policemen. The plots that have been broken up are innumerable. So far as anarchy is concerned evidently Republican government is a failure.—S. F. Post.

ALIAS SUMMONS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE County of Inyo, State of California.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the County of Inyo, State of California, and the complaint filed in said County of Inyo in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

Victor Trepier Plaintiff, vs Jaques Jalberque and Manasese Louca, Defendants:

The people of the State of California send greeting to Jaques Jalberque and Manasese Louca, Defendants:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the County of Inyo State of California, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this Inyo County, or, if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain the judgment of this Hon. Court dissolving the partnership heretofore and now existing between yourselves and the Plaintiff, under and by virtue of an agreement made and entered into by you on the 30th day of October, 1893, and that the title to the mines or mining claims described in said agreement may be adjudged freed from all the conditions thereof and restored as follows: That the Plaintiff is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "American Flag Mine;" that Defendant Jaques Jalberque is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "French Flag Mine" and that Defendant Manasese Louca is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "Mexican Flag Mine," as said mines are described in said agreement and the complaint of file herein; Together with the costs of suit.

Said plaintiff alleging that you have utterly failed, neglected and refused to in any manner whatsoever comply with the terms and conditions of said partnership agreement, or to perform any of the duties imposed thereby, since on or about the 27th day of January, 1894; as will more fully appear by reference to the complaint on file herein.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, said plaintiff will apply to Court for the relief demanded in said complaint.

Witness my hand and the Seal of said Superior Court of the County of Inyo, State of California, this 27th day of June, A. D. 1894.

[SEAL.] D. J. HESSION, Clerk.
P. H. MACK, Attorney for Plaintiff.

COURT NOTES.

Geo. M. Gill, Superior Judge.

FRIDAY, Aug. 17, 1894.

Fred. Callsen vs. J. W. Claussen et al—Filed complaint.

The Board of Education has been in session all the week.

Mr. and Mrs. W. M. Richards, of Keeler, were in town early in the week.

Mr. and Mrs. Ed. M. Clarke of Bishop syent the week at Independence.

Upton Tracy and L. D. Maupin were dewn from Fish Springs yesterday.

F. E. Densmore has been elected Chairman of the Inyo County Board of Education.

Mrs. P. A. Chalfant and Miss Mabel Chalfant of Bishop were visitors in town this week.

John Clarke came down from Bishop on Tuesday evening, returning early Wednesday morning.

Buck Burnside is a candidate for Sheriff of Mono county. Buck has many friends down this way who wish him success.

J. Tucker has reduced the price of hair cutting to 25 cts. Pompadour, 50 cts. Consultation tickets for shaving now on sale.

The "Independence Glee Club" is the latest institution which promises to enliven matters and entertain visitors during Fair week.

There was a Populist meeting held at Independence on Saturday evening last. Several speeches were made and an organization effected.

A lot of new machinery for roasting and refining soda has been put in at Keeler and the capaciy of the works will be greatly increased.

Mrs. Norah Winslow, daughter of Mrs. J. Vinson, arrived at Independence last Monday and is visiting with her uncle Mr. E. Robinson.

Attention is directed to the change in the cards of Attorneys P. W. Bennett and P. W. Forbes, the firm of Bennett & Forbes being dissolved.

Independence is fast acquiring all the conveniences of a metropolis. The Salvation Army has been holding forth here in full blast this week.

Mr. and Mrs. Reeves and two daughters and Mrs. H. W. Blanks started for Los Angeles on Wednesday, going by way of Keeler and Mojave.

James F. Sanders and Carl Fadder of Bishop were in town yesterday on land business. Several parties are exxpected from Bishop to-morrow for the same purpose.

The Republican primaries will be held in the several precincts in the county to-morrow, to elect delegates to the County Convention which meets Sept. 4th at Big Pine.

There are seven horses in training at Independence for the Fall races here. There are four at Lone Pine, and quite a number at Bishop. There is promise of great sport.

H. P. Nelligan has about finished the painting of the interior of the Court House. He went to Bishop on Wednesday but will return and begin work on the outside next week.

Lowell A. Eugley returned to Big Pine yesterday from a trip through the southern end of the valley. Mr. Eugley will be a strong candidate for County Clerk before the Republican Convention.

The Mono county papers are having a "difference." It will be edifying for the Chronicle Union man to dig up that nice little lecture of his in regard to Inyo journals and peruse it carefully.

The Inyo Academy will begin its fall term on September 10th. During the several years the Academy has been in existence it has accomplished a great deal of good. The course of study has been perfected year by year until it now ranks with any similar institution in the State.

Mrs. J. Brown has instituted a sewing class at Independence, at the residence of Mrs. Bunney. All kinds of plain and fancy sewing taught, a specialty made of children. For terms and other information call upon

MRS. J. BROWN,
Independence, Cal.

A Fortune in Silver

The impression which prevails that silver mines do not pay to work at this time is rather disproved by the assertion made by C. W. Maxson, who returned from Keeler a few days ago. From him it is learned that D. C. Lane of Pomona purchased the Sorba mine last August, since which time he has actually put in the bank $35,000 and now has 100 carloads of ore on the dump worth $1000 a car. He has done this while developing the property, with no real intention of working the mine. Mr. Maxson says this is a fact which can be proven. It shows a pretty rich condition of silver ore, certainly. It is in this same district where Bellshaw & Beaudry took out $17,000,000. That was away back 20 odd years ago. Remi Nadeau, for whom the hotel in this city is named, also made money out of the camp by hauling ore and bullion to the nearest shipping point. At present, however, nothing but the richest ore is shipped, as it costs $8 a ton to haul it to San Francisco and another $8 to treat it after it reaches the smelter.—L. A. Herald.

Putting Up Fruit, Cold Process,

Get fresh fruit, wash it clean; put it in three or four gallon earthen jars, and press it down as closely as you can without injuring it; then take two ounces of compound extract of salys (you can get this from any druggist); dissolve it in four gallons of boiling water. When cool, pour on enough to cover the fruit. The salys prevents fermentation, and the water keeps the air from the fruit. Twenty gallons of strawberries, 23 gallons of raspberries, 10 gallons of peaches, 17 gallons of grapes, have been put up, and not a single gallon lost. Every jar kept perfectly fresh. The fruit looked and tasted just as it did when picked. It is much finer than canned fruit. It is strange that everyone does not put up fruit in that way, as it is certainly elegant, so cheap and healthy.—Philadelphia Methodist.

Notice.

From and after this date I will deliver hay at Independence at seven dollars per ton.

C. A. WALTER.

Aug. 24, 1894. Camp Independence.

Republican Primaries will be held throughout this county next Saturday afternoon for the selection of delegates to the nominating Convention to meet at Big Pine on Tuesday, Sept. 4th. In these days of rings, slates and combinations, it is perhaps too much to expect that unpledged delegates will be selected, or that they will be at liberty to work or vote for others than those in whose interests they are chosen. Politics is queer.—Index.

By the above we are reminded of an incident that occurred on one of our leading race-tracks. A certain veteran of the turf, and a jolly good fellow, had been "in" on every "combination" for twenty years. One day the boys concluded to let him "guess" a little and accordingly he dropped a few dollars. And how he did kick, and "go for" anybody who would be mean enough to put up a job. Verily, brethren, politics is queer—especially when you're "not in it."

CLAY HAMPTON of Bishop announces himself this week as a candidate for superintendent of Schools, subject to the action of the Democratic Convention. Mr. Hampton has had sixteen years experience as a school teacher, in Tuolumne, Mono and Inyo Counties. He holds first grade certificates for the Counties named, also a California life diploma. Mr. Hampton has had experience in the duties of the office, having served a term as superintendent of Mono County, and will make an able and concientious officer.

H. H. Howell of Bishop is a candidate for the same position. Mr. Howell has taught school in Inyo County for many years, and has served as a member of the Board of Education. He has made a thorough study of the public school system and is therefore well qualified to fill the position of superintendent

Constable Murphy went to Big Pine Wednesday night and arrested Arthur Mateer on a charge of perjury. Last Monday Mateer had three boys arrested on a charge of highway robbery; they were examined before Justice McDonald at Big Pine and discharged. The parents of the boys are determined to prosecute Mateer and have employed counsel to assist in the prosecution.

E. Robinson of Independence announces himself as a candidate for Supervisor for the Third District. Mr. Robinson's strongest recommendation for the position is his past record. He served the County for years in this capacity and always well and faithfully. He will be a strong candidate and if elected a good officer.

George Watterson came down from Bishop yesterday afternoon, returning to-day. He says the country about Benton is vrey dry and unless we have early fall rains the sheep will suffer.

All parties desiring to vote at the next election and whose names are not on the Great Register should see notice published by County Clerk in this issue.

County Clerk Hession returned last evening from a visit through the northern end of the county.

Notice to Voters.

Section 1083, of the Political Code as amended March 9, 1893, provides as follows:

SECTION 1083. Every male citizen of the United States, every male person who shall have acquired the right of citizenship under or by virtue of the Treaty of Queretaro, and every male naturalized citizen thereof, who shall have become such ninety days prior to any election, of the age of twenty-one years, who shall have been a resident of the State one year next preceding the election, and of the county in which he claims his vote ninety days, and in the election precinct thirty days, and whose name shall be enrolled on the Great Register of such county fifteen days prior to an election, shall be a qualified elector at any and all elections held within the county, city and county, city, town, or district within which said elector resides.

Beatrix Randolph.

By JULIAN HAWTHORNE.

The offender stood before her, evidently not at all convinced of the enormity of his outrage. His visage was wrinkled into a waggish laugh, in which he seemed to expect the prima donna to join. It had already been made apparent to her that the man had been drinking, but the mist of wrath in her eyes kept her for an instant from recognizing in him the newly engaged musical director, Herr Plotowski. She felt that if she had had a weapon in her hand she could have killed him on the spot. And he was laughing!

"Aha! my beautiful ma'm'selle! I catch you fair dat time!" he exclaimed jovially. "Oh! dose beautiful lips! I haf often long to salute dem!"

"If you ever come near me or speak to me again"—began the prima donna; but she checked herself. She would not condescend even to threaten such a wretch. Besides, what power had she to carry a threat into execution? Herr Plotowski had been engaged at great expense; he was considered a valuable acquisition. No one could lead an orchestra more ably than he. If she complained of him her complaint would be put off or disregarded; nor could she bring herself to confide the outrage to a man like Gen. Inigo. He would be sure to laugh, and answer with some coarse, good humored jest. In this new world she had entered into everybody seemed to make a jest of everything. There was no one to defend her; she must submit if she could not defend herself. But, as her glance fell upon Herr Plotowski, she told herself she would rather die than submit to such another insult.

Her passionate indignation must have made itself perceptible through the callous hide of the director, fortified though he was by whisky. The wrinkled laugh gradually faded from his countenance, and gave place to an expression of absurd solemnity and irritation. "You be angry dat I kiss you, eh?" he cried in a harsh voice. "Let me tell you, ma'm'selle, I kiss all ze ladies vot sing by me. Zey dake it as compliment; if not, I make it verse for zem, eh? Plotowski kiss all he please, and dat all right, ain't it? You ask ze general, and you find out! Now den!" And he stalked away haughtily.

This incident would perhaps have affected her somewhat less poignantly if it had not occurred immediately after her interview with Bellingham, and while her thoughts were full of him. The revulsion was almost unendurable, and made her feel as if the pollution could never be removed. Her bosom heaved, and bitter tears ran down her face. A woman is helpless enough at best, but she more than the rest, because she was fighting under a false name and reputation. Nevertheless, she could not retreat now nor give up the battle. She knew that her father had incurred pecuniary obligations to Inigo which could only be repaid through her. Besides, should she let her career be destroyed at the outset because a creature like Plotowski had insulted her? Should she not rather persevere until she had won such position and such power as should enable her to protect herself against all the world? There was a proud, unconquered spirit in her, which asserted itself in her forlornness and distress more than it had ever done in her security and happiness.

And, after all, she was not without friends. At the worst she could apply to her father; and then there was Hamilton Jocelyn, who, although rather worldly and absurd, was really a good man, with her interests at heart, as was proved by his having obtained for her this splendid engagement, and there was Mr. Dinsmore, who seemed kindly and a gentleman; and Mr. Barclyffe, who had written all that praise of her in the newspaper; and there, too, was Geoffrey Bellingham; whatever his opinion of her might be, she did not believe that he would have stood by and allowed Herr Plotowski to insult her. No; things were not so hopeless, after all.

Mme. Bemax had been out to make a few purchases on Broadway. She now returned, carrying her little bundles by loops in the strings that tied them. She hoped mademoiselle had not been delayed or inconvenienced. Mademoiselle replied that she had not been delayed; but something prevented her from telling Mme. Bemax about the adventure with the director. She feared madame would say something about the benefits of a little social relaxation and about getting used to it; and she did not wish to feel an aversion toward the good lady, who was in many respects agreeable to her. So she held her peace and hid her secrets in her heart; but she could not forget them.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE SUCCESS AND GLORY OF HER CAREER.

On the day appointed for the selling of tickets for the first performance the extent of the popular interest that had been aroused was indicated by the length of the "cue" of buyers, who made a line from the box office all the way round the block, and who began their session, or station rather, upward of twenty-four hours before the office opened. Accounts of their nocturnal experiences, their jokes, and their good humor appeared in the morning papers, together with plans of the interior arrangements of the opera house, the precautions against fire and panic, the unequaled splendor and perfection of the scenery, and the cost of the whole enterprise. The usual safeguards against the imposition of speculators were taken, and met with the usual success. By five in the afternoon the house was sold from ceiling to cellar, and the impresario, leaning in an insouciant attitude against the bar of the hotel, with his hat on one side and his face broader than it was long, treated his numerous friends to drinks and received their congratulations.

This was on a Saturday. On Monday the performance took place "before the most fashionable, cultivated and appreciative audience ever assembled on a similar occasion in the city of New York." So recent and eminent a triumph is not likely to have been forgotten by those who witnessed it. The opera selected was "Faust." It is perhaps the most satisfactory one for a first appearance, not only because of its musical merits, but because everybody is familiar with it, and can estimate the comparative success of the newcomer in "creating" afresh the immortal character of Marguerite. There had been a great number of rehearsals, and Mlle. Marana had grown somewhat weary of the repetitions, and latterly had begun to fear that when the great night came she would, if not unnerved by stage fright, at any rate be unable to go through the part otherwise than mechanically. All spontaneity of action and sentiment would be gone from her.

She staid in her apartment all day on Monday, refusing to see any one, and even dispensing the greater part of the time with the presence of Mme. Bemax. She wished to dismiss the whole subject of the opera from her mind, and to aid herself in doing so she fixed her thoughts upon her brother Ed, and recalled all his ways and escapades and the happy times they had spent together. She pictured him and herself running races, and climbing trees, and finding birds' nests, and tending their red and white roses, and going on hunting expeditions after woodchucks and squirrels, and she brought back to her memory the talks they used to have together, when they would lay out before themselves the course of their future lives—what they would do and what they would be. How different from their anticipation it had turned out! But he was her brother just the same, and she loved him none the less than she had ever done; on the contrary she loved him more, for he had given her an opportunity to show her love by repairing an injury which he had done.

It was pleasant to think that, when he

"Thank you," she said, "and thank you for these flowers."

returned home, expecting to meet only distress and reproaches, he would find instead prosperity as great, if not greater than before extravagance began, and all owing to his own sister! If he had done wrong, his sister thought, the discovery that she had worked to repair it would be more certain than anything else to make him henceforward do right. Then she began to speculate as to what sort of wrong he had done—whether it were anything more than thoughtlessness and extravagance. A few weeks ago she would have said that it could be nothing more; but she had been forced to see and hear certain things of late which made her hesitate. She had seen what some young men, possessed of money and freedom, were and did; why might not her brother Ed be like them? She put the thought away from her; she would not believe evil of her own brother. He was a Randolph and a gentleman. He might be selfish and reckless, but he would never do anything wicked or disgraceful. It was more to be feared that he would deem her to have disgraced herself in stealing another woman's name and reputation. It was all very well to plead that she had been persuaded into it half ignorantly, half against her will; the fact that she had done it remained. Well—it was too late to turn back now!

The long hours passed on, and as the evening approached she found herself thinking not of Ed, but of another person, who had come into her mind, not by her own invitation, but involuntarily; or possibly he had been in the background all the while, and advanced as the other receded. She had had no conversation with Bellingham since that day at the theatre, but they had met several times and exchanged a few words, and there had been something in his manner that had strengthened and reassured her, she knew not why—something that seemed to show that intuition was acquiring more weight with him than reason. And yet he had not seemed happy nor at ease; but his uneasiness was of a kind that soothed and inspirited her. It was like the trouble of a cloudy dawn, out of which the sun at last rises clear. He was not treacherous nor intangible, like so many men; his qualities were large and firmly based; he could not play monkey tricks, and talk one thing while he thought another. The process of his feelings was honest and open; he was reserved and reticent precisely because he could not be insincere.

The prima donna longed with all her soul to be as frank and undisguised as he. She felt that could she be so all would be well between them; but that until then all would not be well. And she said to herself, how perverse a mishap it was that this disguise of hers should have become necessary just when they met; had she met him at any other time of her life he would have known her as she really was, and his intuition and his reason would have been at one. But then, again, her pride arose, and she vowed that if he did not care enough about knowing her to discern her real self beneath the false disguise he should never know her at all. But did what she called her real self exist any longer? Had not the disguise destroyed it? And, if so, could she expect him to discover what was no longer there? She pressed her hands over her eyes and breathed heavily.

The time of waiting was now over, however. Mme. Bemax was knocking at the door, and coming in with mademoiselle's cloak and bonnet in her hand, and saying that the carriage was ready and that they must drive to the theatre at once in order that mademoiselle might have time to put on Marguerite's dress before the curtain rose. The prima donna stood up, and the realization of what lay before her came sweeping over her mind like a storm. She was slightly tremulous and felt cold and feeble. Mme. Bemax made her drink a glass of wine, and conducted her down to the carriage. She seemed hardly to know where she was, she could speak only with an effort; a benumbing preoccupation had got possession of her. At the carriage door a gentleman was waiting, clad in evening dress, with a light overcoat. Her heart beat for an instant, then became oppressed and tremulous again; it was only Jocelyn. He helped her into the carriage, and got in after her and Mme. Bemax. He began to say various things in a caressing, encouraging voice; she exclaimed sharply, "Don't speak to me! I must think my thoughts!"

The rattle of the wheels on the pavement agitated her; she could not keep her hands or her lips still. Sometimes she fancied they had been driving for hours; sometimes that they had scarcely started. When at length they arrived at the theatre everything seemed at once familiar and strange; she had seen it all scores of times before, but never with the eyes she saw it with now. Several persons addressed her, but she walked on to her dressing room without appearing conscious of any one. The room was small, but prettily decorated; there were two full length mirrors in it, and it was fragrant with flowers. On the table was lying a bunch of Marguerites, tied about with a narrow blue ribbon.

The knot by which the ribbon was fastened caught the prima donna's eye; she had seen something like it before. It was not an ordinary knot, but one such as sailors make. She took up the little white and golden cluster and looked them over; there was nothing to show whence they came—nothing but the knot. While she was putting on her dress her mind occupied itself with this little mystery, and the oppression of her heart was relieved. She put the Marguerites in her girdle, feeling kindly disposed toward them, for they had done her good. Then a desire suddenly took possession of her to go out and see the audience. The overture was still in progress, and she might cross the stage and look through a peep hole in the curtain.

Mme. Bemax assented, and accompanied her. The stage was dimly lighted, and a number of people were moving hither and thither upon it; the scene shifters were giving the last touches to the arrangements. Mlle. Marana, with a light shawl over her shoulders, glided unobserved up to the great curtain and looked through.

The spectacle was like nothing else she had ever seen or imagined. The house was brilliant with light and alive with movement and murmur. But the thousands of faces, row after row and tier above tier; the glance of innumerable eyes, all turned toward her; all come there to see her!—it was astounding and terrifying! Those innumerable eyes—nothing could escape them, nothing be invisible to them. They were overpowering, hostile, exterminating! All impression of individual human beings was lost, and the audience seemed to be a sort of monster, without sympathies and responsibilities, immense, incontrollable, omniscient—a merciless, multitudinous inquisition! How could a single girl contend against them? By what miracle could her voice and presence reach and subdue them? Rather her spirit would evaporate from her lips before them and leave her inanimate.

As she stood gazing there some one crossing the stage from the wings passed near her. She knew the step, and turned. Yes, it was Bellingham. He recognized her and paused, apparently surprised to see her there, but his expression could not be discovered in the shadow.

"Does the house satisfy you, mademoiselle?" he said, approaching her. As he did so he glanced at the flowers in her girdle. The glance did not escape her, and then she knew where it was she had seen the knot before. It was that day of their interview in the corridor; his fingers had been busy idly tying and untying a bit of string.

"I didn't know you would be here," she said in a whisper. "I am glad."

"They expect a call for the architect," he replied, "and I must make a bow."

"Will you be in the audience while I sing?"

"Yes. Why?"

"Show me which seat is yours."

He stepped to the peep hole.

"You see that chair half way down the center aisle? That is mine."

"Thank you," she said; "and thank you for these flowers. I feel made over anew! Now I can sing."

She put out her hand and Geoffrey took it in his.

A Kentucky Miracle.

JUDGE JOHN M. RICE TELLS HOW HE WAS CURED OF RHEUMATISM.

Crippled for Six Years With Sciatica in its Worst Form. He Expected to die but was Saved in a Marvelous Manner.

(From the Covington, Ky., Post.)

The Hon. John M. Rice, of Louisa, Lawrence County, Kentucky, has for the past two years retired from active life as Criminal and Circuit Judge of the sixteenth Judicial District of Kentucky.

He has for many years served his native county and state in the legislature at Frankfort and at Washington, and, until his retirement was a noted figure in political and Judicial circles. The Judge is well known throughout the State and possesses the best qualities which go to make a Kentucky gentleman honored wherever he is known.

About six years ago the bodily troubles which finally caused his retirement at a time when his mental faculties were in the zenith of their strength, began their encroachment upon his naturally strong constitution. A few days ago a Kentucky Post reporter called upon Judge Rice, who in the following words related the history of the causes that led to his retirement. "It is just about six years since I had an attack of rheumatism, slight at first, but soon developing into Sciatic rheumatism, which began first with acute shooting pains in the hips, gradually extending downward to my feet.

"My condition became so bad that I eventually lost all power of my legs, and then the liver, kidneys and bladder and in fact, my whole system, became deranged. I tried the treatment of many physicians, but receiving no lasting benefit from them, I had recourse to patent remedies, trying one kind after another until I believe there were none I had not sampled.

"In 1888, attended by my son John, I went to Hot Springs, Ark. I was not much benefited by some months stay there when I returned home. My liver was actually dead, and a dull persistent pain in its region kept me on the rack all the time. In 1890 I was reappointed Circuit Judge, but it was impossible for me to give attention to my duties. In 1891, I went to the Silurian Springs, Wakeshaw, Wis. I stayed there some time, but without improvement.

"Again I returned home, this time feeling no hopes of recovery. The muscles of my limbs were now reduced by atrophy to mere strings. Sciatic pains tortured me terribly, but it was the disordered condition of my liver that was I felt gradually wearing my life away. Doctors gave me up, all kinds of remedies had been tried without avail, and there was nothing more for me to do but resign myself to fate.

"I lingered on in this condition sustained almost entirely by stimulants until April, 1893. One day John saw an account of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People in the Kentucky Post. This was something new, and as one more drug after so many others could not do so much harm, John prevailed upon me to try the Pink Pills. It was, I think, in the first week in May the pills arrived. I remember I was not expected to live for more than three or four days at the time. The effect of the Pills, however, was marvelous and I could soon eat heartily, a thing I had not done for years. The liver began almost instantaneously to perform its functions, and has done so ever since. Without doubt the pills saved my life and while I do not crave notoriety I cannot refuse to testify to their worth.

The reporter called upon Mr. Hughes the Louisa druggist, who informed him that Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, have been very popular, since Judge Rice used them with such benefit. He mentioned several who have found relief in their use.

An analysis of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People shows that they contain, in a condensed form, all the elements necessary to give new life and richness to the blood and restore shattered nerves. They are an unfailing specific for such diseases as locomotor ataxia, partial paialysis, St. Vitus' dance, sciatica, neuralgia, rheumatism, nervous headache, the after effects of la grippe, palpitation of the heart, pale and sallow complexions, all forms of weakness either in male or female, and all diseases resulting from vitiated humors in the blood. Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are sold by all dealers, or will be sent post paid on receipt of price, (50 cents a box, or 6 boxes for $2.50—they are never sold in bulk or by the 100) by addressing Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Schenectady, N. Y.

A Cyclone's Queer Work.

Nothing could withstand in places the terrible force of the wind on that fatal day of the 29th of April, 1892, on Mauritius. It will be for scientific men to explain how trees firmly planted more than a century back, and of eight to twelve feet diameter, were felled to the ground; how the ironlike teakwood branches were snapped and cut and broken as mere brushwood; how girders of iron eighteen inches thick were indented and twisted so as to become useless, as in the case of the great pulley ladders of a sea dredger; how, in fine, a column of stones, each weighing more than a ton and fast riveted with iron girders and with cement, was thrown down like a pack of cards, and it will be for meteorologists to explain how an island thirty-three miles by thirty-one in extent, through which the center of a cyclone is passing, can escape at all from a wind so violent as the above denotes.—Blackwood's Magazine.

Murder Does Not Always Out.

The old adage that "murder will out" is, after all, more or less of a fiction. Scores of murders go unpunished every year throughout the civilized world, largely for lack of proof against the murderers. The resources of civilization are open to criminals as well as to officers. It is possible for a murderer to commit his crime and then be whirled hundreds of miles away before the deed is discovered. He knows just what methods will be used to secure his capture, and he may have planned how to outwit such attempts before they are made.

Murder is often and even usually discovered and punished, but there are many such crimes that have had no explanations, and it is possible that the Fall River tragedy may be one of these.—Boston Advertiser.

The Laureate's Birthhouse.

Lord Tennyson's birthplace, Somersby house, has been sold by auction. It is a beautiful property, with lovely grounds, and then there are its associations, for it was there that as a child the laureate made unconsciously his first line of poetry as he ran down the garden with his long curls flying in the breeze and called out, "I hear a voice that's speaking in the wind."—Ladies' Pictorial.

INTERESTING TO LADIES.

It has been generally remarked that no class of articles at the Midwinter Exposition received more attention than the various indispensible, and to the masculine mind, mysterious adjuncts to the toilettes of our fair ladies. Manufacturers from every part of the globe were represented, and the products of America, France, England and Germany competed for the honor of the first award at the great Exposition. The points of competition were: freedom from all injurious or deleterous substances, efficiency in producing the desired results expected in a preservative of the complexion, chemical skill in preparing and compounding, and finally, elegance of appearance and general style. Upon all these points, "Camelline" was awarded highest position, and received the unusual distinction of a special honorary diploma of merit, a result not only eminently gratifying to the manufacturers, Messrs. Wakelee & Co., the manufacturing chemists of San Francisco, but an endorsement of the good judgment of the ladies of the Pacific Coast, who, long ago, pronounced in favor of the superior excellence of "Camelline," which may be obtained at any drug store upon the Pacific Coast.

"JUDGE."

This comic paper has some inimitable cartoons. But no one of them is more forcible than this testimony of its proprietor, W. J. Arkell, to the value of ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS. He writes:

"About three weeks since, while suffering from a severe cold which had settled on my chest, I applied an ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTER, and in a short time obtained relief.

"In my opinion, these plasters should be in every household, for use in case of coughs, colds, sprains, bruises, or pains of any kind. I know that in my case the results have been entirely satisfactory and beneficial." W. J. ARKELL.

There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease, and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven catarrh to be a constitutional disease and therefore requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from 10 drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials. Address F. J. NEARING THE GRAVE.

In old age infirmities and weakness hasten to close the gap between us and the grave. Happily scientific research and pharmaceal skill have allied themselves in furnishing us a reliable means of ameliorating the ailments incident to declining years, and of renewing waning physical energy. Its name is Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, a widely comprehensive remedy in disease, and an inestimable blessing to the elderly, the feeble and the convalescent. Rheumatic ailments, trouble with the kidneys and lumbago are among the more common ailments of the aged. These are effectually counteracted by the Bitters, which is likewise a prevention and curative of malarial complaints, dyspepsia, constipation and biliousness. It is highly promotive of appetite, sleep and the acquisition of vigor.

BEYOND THE SEA.

Beyond the sea, beyond the sea
My heart is gone far, far from me;
And ever on its track will flee
My thoughts, my dreams, beyond the sea.

Beyond the sea, beyond the sea,
The swallow wanders fast and free.
Oh, happy bird! were I like thee,
I, too, would fly beyond the sea.

Beyond the sea, beyond the sea
Are kindly hearts and social glee;
But here for me they may not be,
My heart is gone beyond the sea.
—Thomas Love Peacock in Novel Review.

A NARROW ESCAPE.

"Come home at once. Urgent business."

So ran the telegram which I received at the Crown hotel, Manchester, from my father, a Liverpool merchant. I had just completed a long day's business, and had intended to proceed to Oldham and several other surrounding towns before returning home. However, I made what haste I could and reached Liverpool about 8 p. m. I drove rapidly home, and found my father in the dining room, pacing from one end to the other, as was his habit when anything troubled or perplexed him.

"I am glad to see you, lad," he exclaimed, greeting me in his hearty, affectionate manner. "Something has happened in the office which has caused me the greatest uneasiness. Soon after you went away I drew from the bank about £700 in notes. I placed this in the safe in my private office, and locking it in came home. The next day—Thursday—I opened the safe and found, to my astonishment, that not a penny of the money remained. I informed the police of the affair, and it has been placed in the hands of a man named Bingley. He seems a shrewd fellow enough, but so far has reported nothing to me. I expect him there this evening. It is not so much the loss of the money that I mind as the fact that I must have about the office an untrustworthy servant. Who it is, I must confess, I have not the remotest idea."

"But surely, father, you took the number of the notes," I queried.

"That I did," he replied; "but here is one of the strangest parts of the whole affair. On referring to my pocketbook the next day I found this slip of blank paper," and he held out to me a thin sheet of such paper as I had observed him using on previous occasions for the entry of the numbers of bank notes.

"And who saw you deposit the money in the safe?"

"There was no one in the room except old Richardson and Tom Hall," he answered, "and to suspect either of them seems impossible."

"Where did you enter the numbers?" was my next question.

"As I sat at my writing table."

"On what did you place the paper?"

"As well as I can remember, on my pocketbook," he answered. "Stay, now I call it to mind, there were several other pieces of paper exactly like it lying on my desk. After entering the numbers I doubled up the paper and put the money into the safe."

"Leaving your pocketbook on the desk, I presume?"

"Yes," he replied.

"Then that is one step gained. The thief took the numbers away and inserted one of the blank sheets of paper."

A sudden pallor came over my father's face. To accept the truth of my inference was to believe in what he had declared impossible of credence.

"Who was nearest the table," was my next query, "while you placed that money in the safe?"

"Tom Hall stood within about three yards of the table, and Richardson was close to me when I locked the safe!" answered my father in a shaky voice. "It looks black for Hall," he went on more slowly. "I almost wish I had not called in the police. I would rather lose the money altogether than break his poor mother's heart."

Just at this moment a stranger to me was announced and entered the room. He was indeed a shrewd looking fellow and well known in his profession as a skillful tracker of criminals.

"Any news?" asked my father when the detective was seated.

"Yes," he answered. "I must confess it was rather a puzzling case, but it is clear enough now. As you placed the matter in our hands with instructions to prosecute I have arrested Tom Hall and he is now in Dale street safe enough."

"You must be mistaken, Bingley," said my father. "Hall cannot have done such a thing. It will kill his mother."

"Unfortunately, sir," the detective replied, "the evidence is only too strong; and as to his mother—well, criminals are not given to thinking of the feelings of their relatives till the crime has been discovered."

I begged my father to be seated, that we might hear fully what the evidence was upon which the detective had arrested Hall.

"It added to the difficulty of my task that the numbers of the notes were missing," the detective went on. "However, I shadowed Hall, and Richardson was watched by another member of the force. On Sunday evening I met Hall with his sweetheart, and noticed that she wore a splendid diamond brooch which had evidently been given her by Hall, as they were talking about it, and walking behind them I overheard every word. She was urging him to be more careful of his money, and he laughingly replied: 'Oh! never mind, there's plenty more where that came from!' Yesterday I obtained a search warrant and found this."

He handed to my father a bankbook, which showed that Hall had deposited nearly £400 in one of the local banks on the Friday preceding.

"But £400 is not the amount taken," ejaculated my father.

"But it is part of it," replied the detective, "and the rest may be elsewhere. When charged with the theft, Hall seemed dumfounded, and on receiving the usual caution, simply replied, 'I am perfectly innocent.' He will be brought up tomorrow and probably committed for trial to the assizes."

The detective then took his leave and my father and I remained silent, thinking for some time. At last I said: "Will you let me have your pocketbook, father, and the key of your private office and safe? I shall probably be there for some time, so do not sit up for me."

My father complied with the request, and in less than half an hour I was in the office. Certainly there did not seem much hope of Hall being innocent, but I was determined to probe the matter to the very bottom. I had known him from a lad, and in fact in our boyhood we had been school fellows in the Liverpool institute. Open as the day, though somewhat reckless, he seemed the last man to turn out a thief. I sat down and carefully examined the pocketbook my father had given me. I thought the matter over on every side, and suddenly an inspiration flashed across me. My father always wrote with a good pencil, and if he placed the thin paper upon his pocketbook I might find traces of the numbers. Hastily taking from my own desk a small microscope I carefully examined the leaves of the book. Here was what I sought. The numbers stood out plainly, and I carefully copied them into my own pocketbook. So much of the difficulty being solved, I next turned my attention to the safe.

The question had still to be answered, "How had the thief opened the safe?" I obtained as good a light as I possibly could and made a minute examination of the safe. There seemed to be no marks of rough usage, and it was evident that it had not been forced open. A duplicate key then must have been used. But as nothing further seemed capable of being found out from the safe itself, I locked it and proceeded to examine the desks of Richardson and Hall, which were in an adjoining room. In the latter I found a few loose slips of paper—"Nightshade, 20 to 1. Everett," "Eagle's Wing, 30 to 1," etc. What did these mean? Evidently it was connected with betting. I folded them up and put them in my pocketbook beside the number of the notes. There seemed to be nothing else which would throw any light on the affair in either my father's room or that of the two chief clerks, so I turned out the lights and went home.

The next day Hall was brought up before the magistrates, and the evidence of the detective having been given, he was committed for trial to the assizes, bail being refused. He reserved his defence and was removed to jail. I asked for and obtained permission to see him. He seemed very much cast down and troubled by the thought of the pain his arrest must have caused to his mother and sweetheart. "But, Mr. Meredith," he said to me, "I am utterly innocent of the theft. I hope you, at any rate, will believe me. The matter of the money standing to my credit in the bank can be easily explained, though I felt that I could not urge it in my defence today. In fact my solicitor advised me not to bring it forward, as at present there is only my own unsupported evidence for it. The assizes come on in a week, and by then I hope further corroboration will be available.

"I received certain information about a fortnight ago that Nightshade, a rank outsider, as he was considered, stood a good chance for the St. Leger. I know that I was foolish for betting on the race, but events proved that I was rightly informed. It was my first bet, and shall be my last. Everett, the great betting man in one of the local clubs, offered to lay 20 to against Nightshade, and I backed the horse for twenty pounds. On Thursday last he paid me £400, the greater part of which I banked on the next day."

I immediately called to mind the slips of paper in my pocket, on one of which was "Nightshade 20 to 1. Everett." It seemed clear to me that Hall was speaking the truth, and I promised to do all I could to obtain the evidence of Everett on the point, and to supply him with a good counsel at the trial.

The next day I was called away to Leeds on business of importance connected with the firm, and on returning in the evening found myself in company with Mr. Nelson, a Manchester merchant, well known to me. We were alone in the compartment and could converse freely. He had seen the report of the robbery in the papers, and opened a conversation on the subject. I spoke freely to him and told him the main facts of the case. When I had finished he said, "Is this Richardson's name Henry?" "It is," I replied.

"Is he a native of Bury, in Lancashire?"

"I believe so, as he has property there."

"What firm did he come to you from?" was his next question.

When I gave him the name of the firm he sat in silence for a second or two and then began: "Well, it is rather a serious thing to say, but Richardson must be the same man who as a boy was dismissed by my father for dishonesty. He had posted numerous business letters and kept the money he received for stamps. At last complaints reached us of letters arriving without stamps and the culprit confessed. This was not the only case of his dishonesty, and he was summarily discharged."

Our conversation then branched off to other topics, but from Manchester to Liverpool I had much food for thought. The fact that Richardson was standing nearest my father when he locked the safe might be merely a blind intended to throw suspicion on Hall. He would have sufficient time to change the papers and go to my father's side before the safe was locked. It evidently needed investigation.

On the following morning I made my way to Bingley's private office, and I asked to see the man who had watched Richardson.

"Why, what do you want with him?" said Bingley. "Do you suppose that it was a put up job between Hall and him?"

"I do not," I replied. "But I am rather inclined to think that Hall may be entirely innocent and Richardson the sole culprit." And then I told him what had come to my knowledge, both with regard to Hall's betting and Richardson's shady past.

He merely raised his eyebrows, and then after pondering over the matter for a few seconds said, "Well, you may be right, and I will do what I can to find out the truth."

By this time Rawlins, Bingley's assistant in the business, had put in his appearance. The only fact of importance we gleaned from him was that Richardson had been to Bury on the Saturday. Discovering that the latter had property in the town he had attached little importance to the visit, especially as both he and Bingley had all along regarded Hall as the probable culprit. I fancied I could detect a shade of annoyance on Bingley's face, perhaps caused by the fact that he had possibly arrested the wrong man, and perhaps a little piqued that he had to thank me for the information, though I had gained most of it accidentally.

Two or or three days passed, when one evening as I sat with my father in the dining room Bingley was ushered in. He had prosecuted his inquiries about Richardson to some purpose. It seems that he had visited Bury to pay off a mortgage on his property which had become pressing, and the mortgagee had retained the numbers of the notes he had received. These exactly corresponded with what I had discovered from my father's pocketbook and clearly indicated the real thief.

Tom Hall was discharged from custody soon after, but I believe he kept the promise he made me about betting, and is still in my father's office in his old post. He was married soon after his release, and has one of the prettiest and happiest homes in Liverpool. Richardson was convicted on overwhelming evidence, and is now being provided for out of the imperial taxation.

The money was recovered, but my father's forgiving nature would not allow him to see the family of even a dishonest servant in want, and he assisted the Richardsons largely as long so they needed it.—Max Meredith in Pittsburg Dispatch.

THE UNDERSTUDY

Sub-actors Who Must be Ready to Take Principals' Places.

A GREAT DEAL OF STUDYING NEEDED

They May Go Through an Entire Season With no Chance to Show Their Powers —Billy Crane's Mishap.

After two years of patient waiting and study a young actress, who was an understudy in one of the principal stock companies in town, gave up her position the other day because during all that time she never got an opportunity to display her talents before the public. She was on the salary list of the company, and as wages are paid 52 weeks in the year by that particular organization it seemed rather like quitting a good thing, but it was not a question of finance with her. She is an actress of recognized ability, and understudying was not particularly suited to her taste. She had part after part in new plays and reproductions, but the principal somehow or other managed to get through without being ill, or never suffered any mishap, so it seemed as if the actress was destined to become a permanent understudy. This instance is only one of numberless similar experiences showing the trials and tribulations of understudies.

All the big stock companies are well supplied in the matter of understudies, and while they are required to keep a certain number of professionals on hand they have innumerable applications from amateur aspirants for histrionic honors, who are only too willing to serve as understudies on the chance that some accident will take them to the front. Most of these come from the different schools for the training of actors. The understudies receive their parts almost at the same time they are delivered to the principals. They are rehearsed regularly with the company and are presumed to be as well prepared for the first night of a play as the principals.

Manager Charles Frohman's company is probably one of the best equipped organizations in the country in the way of understudies. Eight of these are employed as regular members of the company the year round, and while they are probably not seen more than once or twice during a season they are always ready for any emergency that may arise. Augustin Daly's and A. M. Palmer's companies are also well supplied with understudies, and both have long lists of amateurs ready to go on at a moment's notice in case of sickness or other necessity.

Every big traveling organization generally carries two understudies while on the road. Some companies dispense with their services, however, by requiring the members of the company to make themselves proficient in two or more parts. Thus if the first comedian should suddenly be incapacitated the second comedian jumps in, and so on all through the cast. The understudies who travel regularly with the company are usually a man and a woman. The former understudies all the actors, while the latter is perfect in all the feminine roles. Their salaries and expenses are on a par with those of the principals.

Although many of the stars now conspicuous in the theatrical firmament began their dramatic career as understudies, it is not often nowadays that the stars themselves are understudied. It is generally assumed by the managers that the star is the attraction for the public, and to substitute somebody else is to practice a deception which is injurious to the show. In some instances, however, where the star has had to be replaced by an understudy, the latter has made even a better hit than the star.

Billy Crane was an understudy in the beginning, and Manager Joe Brooks tells an amusing anecdote of the actor's first experience as an understudy. He served in that capacity with a company that produced "The Daughter of the Regiment" in this city some years ago. Among the parts which Crane had to commit to memory was that of the notary. It was a particularly hard part because the notary had to begin by declaiming a long legal notice. Crane got the part pat, but in order that there should be no possibility of his making a break he copied the process into a book which the notary was supposed to carry. The notary wore a robe that trailed on the floor. In making his entrance Crane's foot became tangled up in the robe and he pitched headforemost on the stage. The book with the prompt lines flew across the stage. Crane pulled himself together in a moment, and without losing his presence of mind began firing the process off. He went through without a break, and his original entrance made a hit with the audience.

One of the most notable instances of understudying was that furnished while Denman Thompson was in the midst of his long run with "The Old Homestead" at the Academy of Music. Walter Gale, whose characterization of Happy Jack, the tramp, was supposed to be inimitable, was ill, and at the eleventh hour the manager heard of the trouble. The part was a most important one in the cast, and nobody could be found to take it among the members of the company. Finally a young Irishman named James Fitzgerald, who was acting as dresser to Thompson, astonished that actor by declaring that he would take the part. It seems that he was understudying Gale right along unknown to anybody. Fitzgerald went on that night and imitated Gale to a dot in everything except the latter's soul racking cough. Young Fitzgerald made a hit and played Happy Jack many times, but his career was brought to an untimely close by an attack of pneumonia, to which he succumbed.—New York Sun.

A Wet Performance.

One of Miss Rose Coghlan's most unique experiences occurred at Pittsburg.

There was to be an al fresco performance of "As You Like It" in the grounds of the Kenmawr, a swell east end hotel. Miss Coghlan was to appear as Rosalind, with Joseph Haworth as Orlando and William Muldoon as Charles the Wrestler.

On the evening set for the occasion the rain poured in torrents, so that the play was postponed until the following evening. The next day elusive showers and delusive sunshine pursued each other from hour to hour. At 6 p. m. there was a rattling fall of rain, but the sky promptly cleared and the evening promised well.

A goodly audience of the cream of Pittsburg society filled the uncovered amphitheater which had been erected, but just at 8 o'clock a fine, drizzling rain began to fall. Up went umbrellas, and the gorgeously attired ranks of people good humoredly showed not the least intention of giving up the ship.

For an hour that fine, persistent rain fell upon the grassy stage below the seats, but at last, finding the Pittsburgers could not be drowned out, it ceased. Rugs were spread here and there over the grass, new leaves were scattered around, and, arrayed in "gums" and goloshes, the actors went through the play. A stage stride is a great thing anyway, but the way those unfortunate players covered the ground between the rugs was a marvel.

Miss Coghlan never made such strides in her profession before or since, and she says it is the only time she ever wore "rubbers" on the stage.—New York Recorder.

Entertaining an English Bishop.

It is told of a well known bishop, who is somewhat addicted to the style of dress worn by English bishops, especially the bell crowned silk hat, that he was once the guest of a family of great wealth, in what particular city need not be indicated. His host and hostess were charmingly kind and gracious in their hospitality, and knowing the bishop's liking for things Anglican, were especially anxious to entertain him in accordance with what might be the custom in England. The fair hostess, in her zeal, had even instructed the butler and the footman to address him as "My lord," but the more democratic master of the house happily vetoed that idea before it was carried out.

In many other ways, however, they tried to make the good man forget that he was in the states, though it must be confessed that their zeal in this respect was at times greater than their knowledge. But in the opinion of the bishop the climax of unconscious absurdity was reached when, as he was about to retire, his hostess said to him: "Bishop, I am afraid your miter must have got real mussed up in the sleeper last night; John always says it spoils a plug hat to take it into a train. So I have given orders to John's valet to do it up for you. He has never seen a miter before, but I guess it's all right, as he used to work in a hat store."

And to this day probably the kind woman doesn't know what a miter is. At any rate the bishop was too courteous to set her right.—New York Tribune.

A Dream of Childhood.

In the summer of 1863 we were spending a few months at Dunkerque. The English consul at the time was Sir John, then Major Pringle. We saw a good deal of the family and one day during a walk over the dunes, after we had been talking of those "bodings, unsanctioned by the will, which teach us to beware," Major Pringle related the following curious fulfillment of a dream: When a boy of fifteen he dreamed that he met with a strange accident—that he had fallen, in fact, into the crater of an active volcano and was only rescued from his perilous position by means of ropes with great difficulty after many hours, it seemed, of durance.

The dream was so very vivid and circumstantial that it made a great impression on the boy's mind, and he mentioned it to several people. Years passed away, when Pringle chanced to be in Sicily, and here he joined a party of young Englishmen in making the ascent of Mount Etna. They attempted too close an examination of the crater. Pringle lost his footing and was precipitated into a cuplike depression from which it was impossible for him to extricate himself. In this terrible predicament the recollection of his dream flashed upon him. For years he had never thought of it, but now the horrible nightmare was reproduced in all its fearful realism. After a long and anxious delay he was rescued by means of ropes, precisely as he had been in his dream.—Temple Bar.

A Government Appointment.

At Nijni Novgorod, where the authorities and physicians were making a strenuous attempt to stifle the cholera, a merchant led a violent agitation, which was directed against the doctors. He circulated reports that the physicians were burying patients alive, and endeavored to influence the people against them. The governor general of the province caused the merchant to be arrested, and after an examination was convinced that the charge against him was true. "I am going to give you a government appointment," said the governor, "as a reward for what you regard as your exercise of public spirit." "A government appointment?" said the man delighted. "Yes, I appoint you a nurse on the floating cholera hospital in the river. There you will have an opportunity to see whether there is cholera or not, and also to observe whether any persons are being buried alive." The man was sent, therefore, to take care of cholera patients. It is unnecessary to say that he was not highly pleased with his "appointment."—Manchester Times.

The Bank of St. George, Genoa.

The Bank of St. George, of Genoa, for 700 years held an unrivaled position in the world, and combined the qualifications of the Bank of England with those of the East India company. During all this period it was in direct communication with England, and thousands of unedited documents, tending to throw light on the history of commerce, are there awaiting a successor to Rawdon Brown. Certainly they are as rich as the archives of Venice, if not richer. Within the past ten years an attempt has been made to put them in order, and to index them. Imagine the task. There are now 37,000 packages of papers dating from the Tenth century to the end of the last, each containing several thousand documents.—National Review.

Pope's Nickname.

General John Pope was called "Saddle bag John." When he first took command of the Army of Virginia he found everything in confusion, which he set to work to straighten out. Consequently, when asked where his headquarters were, he replied, "In the saddle." His men said that headquarters were "in the saddle on the move," and their location liable to be in dangerous proximity to the enemy's fire during an engagement.—Washington Star.

ABOUT THE MULE.

An Animal That Always Keeps up With American Progress.

HIS MANY REMARKABLE QUALITIES.

A Dispised and Neglected Creature That's not Appreciated by Even the Men Who Receive his Good Work.

He is not handsome. His ears are too uncompromisingly in evidence. His legs are queer and pinlike. His meager, tufted tail is neither picturesque nor beautiful, and his voice is not melodious; but considering his advantages he is a good deal better in his queer way and humble place than many a nobler animal would be. No horse ever possessed his doggedness of purpose and termination to overcome obstacles. No dog was ever more intelligent, no ox so docile.

In this part of the world the mule is not only despised, but his actual usefulness is greatly overlooked. Even in the southern states, where the animal is more highly esteemed than here, and where beautiful specimens of the kind are raised and used, even for fashionable carriage teams, the horse is more highly honored and considered more desirable.

Our cousins, the English, also make but little use of them, but in oriental lands and some parts of Europe and in South America the mule is appreciated for his full worth. Kings and princes ride upon them. In the days when chariots were used mules were yoked thereto. They are still used, we are told, to draw the carriages of the Italian cardinals and other ecclesiastical dignitaries, and the mules of certain districts of Spain and Italy are as distinctly sought after by admirers of the creatures as are California or Kentucky bred horses by lovers of the noble animal.

There is a good deal of work in rural California to which the mule is far better adapted than is the horse. He is smaller than the horse, lighter, defter and more careful in his movements, besides being stronger than the average horse of his weight. All these points render him peculiarly useful in orchard and vineyard work, while in these hard times, when the farmer counts every dime of outlay, the fact that the mule will do his work on less food, and that of a coarser quality, than the horse can live on, should be a weighty consideration with the thrifty.

"But Jack is stubborn and vicious, bad tempered and intractable," say most people. Stubborn, yes, and it is that very quality that makes him so useful. Nobody ever saw a mule balk. Hitch one of them up to the side of a house and give him the word, and he will pull until something gives way or he drops from exhaustion. Even then, if he can get to his knees, he will continue to pull in that position. Stop him on a steep hill, with a heavy load behind him, and he will not let that load go back one inch. If he is vicious and bad tempered it is because harsh treatment, which is more often than not his only experience, has made him so, and intractable he certainly is not. He has the patience and docility of that most tractable beast of burden, the ass, with the superior intelligence and willing spirit of the horse. If anything, the mule is superior to the horse in intelligence. He is less affectionate, and is less apt to possess that unbounded confidence in his rider or driver that characterizes the well bred horse.

The horse will usually go where his driver commands him, even though it may be into peril, but not so Jack. Experience has not taught him that any one is going to look after his hide and legs if he doesn't take care of them himself, and he is consequently careful where he steps. He will not go down into a wayside ditch to turn out for another team. He will not cross a bridge, as I once had a horse do for me, with nearly every other plank missing, washed away by a freshet, and he is reluctant to ford a stream or travel through deep mud before which a horse would not hesitate, but he will patiently climb mountain sides and crawl along narrow trails and creep around perilous ledges that the horse, less sure footed and keener in nervous organization, would never venture upon.

"He kicks like a mule" is a comparison far less fraught with meaning than those who use it imagine. The mule that is kindly treated and given no occasion to kick will never do it. If he learns the trick when young, it is because he has resorted to it in self defense or revenge, and even then he learns it less readily than a colt or filly would under the same circumstances.

The mule is not a speedy steed. He will probably never be a record breaker, but then no one wants him to be. We read occasionally in oriental literature of fleet mules, but the fleetness of the oriental mule, like that of the Arabian horse, is a quality more literary than actual. The average cow pony of the plains would be ill equipped for his work if he could not travel considerably faster than the pure bred Arabian horse.

What the mule lacks in speed, however, he makes up in endurance—a fact which enables him to out travel the fastest and strongest of horses. A friend of mine once rode a mule 100 miles in thirteen hours, stopping at noon for a brief rest to give the animal a drink and a handful of cornmeal, all the food he had for him, and a mule used on a stage route in San Diego county once took fright just as he was being unhitched after a day's work and ran away. Twenty-four hours later he turned up at his old home, 250 miles away, but he was a badly used up mule, and it was many weeks before he was able to do any more work.

Mules are more apt to take notions than are horses. I knew one once that never could be got to enter a certain stall in the barn. He would go readily and contentedly into any other, but not even when blindfolded could he be got into that one. What made his antipathy more curious was that, so far as anybody knew, he never had been in that particular stall. Equally curious, but far more inconvenient, was the whim of a team of these creatures owned by an acquaintance of mine. These animals would never drink away from home. They would go into town, fourteen miles distant, with a heavy load on a hot, dusty day and come home with their tongues lolling from their mouths and evidently suffering from thirst, but not a drop of water could they be induced to touch until their own familiar trough was reached.—San Francisco Call.

Mustard.

"From beef without mustard, from a servant who overvalues himself, from a woman who painteth herself, the good Lord deliver us," says an old English proverb. This calls renewed attention to the value which epicures have always placed upon mustard. In the household account books of the sixteenth century the annual supply of mustard is laid down as an important item. While this stimulant to the digestive powers can undoubtedly be abused, yet, where used in moderation, it is most wholesome and excellent. The French mixtures of mustard are among the best we have. These mustards are usually mixed with tarragon vinegar. About a saltspoonful of cayenne pepper is added to every two ounces of mustard, and about half a clove of garlic, minced fine, and a teaspoonful of mushroom catchup. The mixture must be made a day before it is used, for the ingredients to become thoroughly amalgamated, and it may be varied by using a vinegar flavored with capers, anchovies, basil, burnet or celery in place of tarragon vinegar. In an old list of Parisian bonbons there is mention of no less than 28 mustards of different flavors. It was a custom in old times to use wine in mixing mustard.—New York Ledger.

Saved His Reputation.

Before 1800 no political mission from a European nation had visited the court of Persia for a century, but the English had fame as soldiers from the report of their deeds in India. An officer of one of the frigates which conveyed Sir John Malcolm's mission, who had gone ashore at Abusheher and was there mounted on a spirited horse, afforded no small entertainment to the Persians by his bad horsemanship. The next day the man who supplied the ship with vegetables, and who spoke a little English, met him on board and said, "Don't be ashamed, sir; nobody knows you bad rider. I tell them you, like all English, ride well, but that time they see you, you very drunk!" The worthy Persian thought it would have been a reproach for a man of a warlike nation not to ride well, but none for a European to get drunk.—Boston Herald.

BEDROOM CARS.

The Very Latest Novelty Added to Sleeping Car Oddities.

HAVE ALL THE COMFORTS OF HOME.

It has its Advantages at Night, but May be a Lonely Place in the Day—Discussed in the Smoking Car.

A thought that doubtless occurs to many who travel frequently on our railways is that the leading trunk lines are consciously or unconsciously making long distance railway travel very like steamship travel, but only for the men. One of the great roads throws a sop to the women in the form of a ladies' or waiting maid who is a fixed part of the crew of each train, but it is the men who appreciate the growing similarity to steamship travel. They can move to and fro between their staterooms and the smoking room, where they may smoke, play cards, drink or chat. The three meals a day in the dining cars bring as many more breaks in the routine, but these visits to the "diner" are the only refreshing changes for the women, who grow more and more numerous in the cars.

The newest thing in railroading takes the form of bedroom sleeping cars of great magnificence but uncertain promise that one company now runs between New York and Chicago on the fastest fliers. These cars carry a strong suggestion of being English, and a still stronger resemblance to the old Mann boudoir plan of car building. They differ from the Mann patent in having the rooms on one side as far as the middle of the car, where the hallway turns across the car, and the rest of the bedrooms are on the other side of the car. The bedrooms are comparatively large, and each one contains an upper and a lower berth, a washstand with running water, and the main appurtenances of the retiring room that are found in the cars of older style. The beds are bigger—that is, wider—than the old sleepers, and if two friends or a married couple secure one of these rooms they are certain to enjoy a better night's rest and more comfort generally than ever came to them in the old style open saloon sleepers. Women can undress in their rooms with the doors shut, without fear of intrusion, and with plenty of room for the operation, and so can men. Once in bed there is no danger of any one's falling in upon the sleepers as a curve is turned and some luckless pedestrian is flung through the curtains. Each room can be ventilated as desired, and the snores and baby's cries and bedroom odors of the old style cars are all shut out of these private rooms.

But in all probability the average traveler will never know, until he gets in one of these new cars, how much he liked the chance the old style cars gave for looking at the other passengers. The other passengers lightened the journeys. They were interesting and amusing, and enduring friendships were often made between men and men, and women and women, in the open saloon sleepers. Now the traveler gets into one of these new flying bedchambers and understands at once that he may only see out of one side of the car and may only look at whoever has the other berth in the same room. He sees the other man's bag and umbrella on the other seat and wonders what sort of a man he will prove to be, for whatever sort he is that man and he must sit knee to knee all the time they are in their stateroom.

"Suppose," said one of four passengers who met in the smoking car of such a train going out the other night, "suppose your roommate happened to be a maniac, like the fellow I met in a Pullman car in Virginia a few weeks ago, what then?"

"Oh, Lord!" gasped No. 2.

"But suppose," said the third man, "that it was a woman with a baby, such as I met on the way to Buffalo not long ago, when—by gracious—the baby took the most strange liking for me and would sit on my lap by the hour and wound up at night by yelling blue murder until I took it into the upper bunk, where it fell asleep with one arm around my neck."

"But, heavens!" said No. 4, "surely they don't put women into a closed bedroom where a man has the other berth. Oh, I say, conductor, what do you do if a woman has one berth in one of these bedroom cars and a man has the other berth?"

"Well, that don't often happen," said the conductor. "The ticket agents try to guard against that by selling uppers and lowers together to separate single women who apply."

"But suppose it does happen?"

"Well, then, we manage somehow. It happened tonight, but luckily I found a place to put the man in another car, and I gave the whole room to the lady."

The passengers plied the conductor with questions. They asked what happened if a drunken man or a lunatic got into one of these new cars, and he said nothing happened, because such people aren't allowed on the trains. All the same, one of the passengers told of a trip he took in the far west, when one of the passengers was a young English millionaire with a silver plate on top of his head where the dome of his skull ought to be. The young man had a doctor traveling with him, principally to see that he got nothing spirituous to drink. Whether he got any spirits or not he made the acquaintance of a young lady and her mother in the Pullman car, and in the course of the day he insulted the girl grossly. A man who had been watching the chap leaped at him with a view to giving him a thrashing, but the doctor begged for his patient and so came to tell of his misfortune. He had been thrown from a horse and had his head crushed; hence the silver plate. That night the lunatic sought the berth into which the girl had retired, and going down on his knees in the passageway begged to be forgiven. The amiable girl forgave him, in a frightened voice, through the crack of the curtains, and then the lunatic insisted upon a kiss to bind the bargain. The girl screamed, and several men rolled out of bed and tore the lunatic away from her berth, while the guardian doctor snored, oblivious of all that went on.—New York Sun.

When a Man Is of Age.

It is a rule of law de minimis non curat lex, the law does not notice trifling matters. Of course a person is of age immediately at midnight of the day preceding his twenty-first birthday; therefore, as the law doesn't care about the last second of that preceding day, he is of age at any moment of that day, and so at the earliest moment of the day. The rule goes no further, however, which is just as well, for if carried to its logical conclusion it would make a person of age on the day of his birth.—New York Sun

FRIDAY, AUG 24 1894

Every day the telegraph brings news of reviving business, now that the tariff question has been determined, and it sounds desperately foolish to read in the editorial leaders of the McKinley press gloomy prognostications of the starving and despair that await the people because the government is reducing the taxes that have so long been put on the necessaries of life in the interest of the manufacturing monopolists.

The railroads of the United States have a gross annual income that exceeds the aggregate income of the federal, state and local governments by $285,000,000. Herein lies their strength, for great wealth carries with it great influence. Strip C. P. Huntington of his wealth tonight and tomorrow there would not be one so poor as to do him reverence. in view of his wealth, is it any wonder that he controls so many millions who promptly do his bidding? His executive ability, combined with his moneyed power, places him in a position where he can say to tens of thousands of his fellow creatures, "Do this," and it is done. Not content with this he dictates to the government with a degree of success too well known, especially to the people of the Pacific coast. It will stand the people of the whole country well in hand to be on the alert and regard with suspicion every move made by the railroads in a legislative or judicial direction. Eternal vigilance in this case is surely the price of liberty.

There has been much talk about compulsory arbitration between capital and labor, but the trouble is that there is no way to bind a laboring man except that he be reduced to slavery. It is now suggested by Wm. H. Mills that labor organizations be incorporated the same as the organizations of capital and thus have a responsibility fixed. He suggests that the directors of such organizations have powor to bring actions in court to compel the payment of fair wages. If this were done there would be no use for compulsory arbitration; in fact the words "compulsory" and "arbitration" will not go together. If it is compulsory it is not arbitration. If, however, a labor organization should be incorporated, and a small amount of each laborer's wages put into it so as to bind in some pecuniary responsibility the penalties imposed for a violation of the order of arbiters or the court, the laboring man could easily ask that the other side be made to do right.

ALIAS SUMMONS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE County of Inyo, State of California.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the County of Inyo, State of California, and the complaint filed in said County of Inyo in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

Victor Trepier Plaintiff, vs Jaques Jalberque and Manasese Louca, Defendants:

The people of the State of California send greeting to Jaques Jalberque and Manasese Louca, Defendants:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the County of Inyo State of California, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this Inyo County, or, if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain the judgment of this Hon. Court dissolving the partnership heretofore and now existing between yourselves and the Plaintiff, under and by virtue of an agreement made and entered into by you on the 30th day of October, 1893, and that the title to the mines or mining claims described in said agreement may be adjudged freed from all the conditions thereof and restored as follows: That the Plaintiff is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "American Flag Mine;" that Defendant Jaques Jalberque is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "French Flag Mine" and that Defendant Manasese Louca is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "Mexican Flag Mine," as said mines are described in said agreement and the complaint of file herein; Together with the costs of suit.

Said plaintiff alleging that you have utterly failed, neglected and refused to in any manner whatsoever comply with the terms and conditions of said partnership agreement, or to perform any of the duties imposed thereby, since on or about the 27th day of January, 1894; as will more fully appear by reference to the complaint on file herein.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, said plaintiff will apply to Court for the relief demanded in said complaint.

Witness my hand and the Seal of said Superior Court of the County of Inyo, State of California, this 27th day of June, A. D. 1894.

[SEAL.] D. J. HESSION, Clerk.
P. H. MACK, Attorney for Plaintiff.

COURT NOTES.

Geo. M. Gill, Superior Judge.

MONDAY, Aug. 27, 1894.

Estate of John McFetridge deceased,—Entered decree of settlement of final account.

Estate of E. L. Smith, deceased—Entered order approving sale of personal property.

WEDNESDAY, August 29, 1894.

E. H. Edwards vs. A. C. Stevens—Filed original summons.

L. Wood is treating his store to a fresh coat of paint.

Rob't. O'Neal spent a few day in this vicinity early in the week.

A. L. McGee of Bishop spent several days in town this week.

The Democratic Primaries will be held in the various precincts to-morrow.

Harry Robinson of Lone Pine is fitting up a string of flyers for the coming fair.

Mr. and Mrs. A. L. Conklin of Black Rock spent a couple of days in town this week.

P. H. Mack Esq. and O. I. Mairs went to Los Angeles last Monday going south via Mojave.

W. H. Russell of Benton spent a few days in town and vicinity recently on mining matters.

Kansas farmers are just now selling 35 cent wheat to buy $1 potatoes to feed the thrashing hands.

Experience teaches the argiculturist that the hardest thing to raise on a farm is the money to run it.

A. W. Eibeshutz is having his store building painted throughout. H. P. Nelligan is doing the work.

J. J. Gann is fitting up a camp about four miles south of town and will soon be at work on the big canal.

A. C. McDonald came down from Big Pine on Wednesday's train and expects to return home to-morrow.

Ben. F. Hudspeth of Chico has been engaged to teach the Independence school for the coming term which opens on Monday, September 24th.

The Republican County Convention meets at Big Pine next Tuesday. Several people will inhale the pure air of Inyo with greater ease after that day.

The officers of the American Railway Union have issued an address asking all members of the Union who favor compulsory arbitration to vote the Populist ticket.

A. N. Bell and family arrived home last Sunday evening from a visit with a brother of Mr. Bell's at Sonora. They travelled by way of Bridgeport with private conveyance.

About half an inch of rain fell Tuesday afternoon, which laid the dust, spoiled some hay, cooled the torrid atmosphere and was altogether quite a mixed blessing.

Dr. I. J. Woodin started for Bishop to-day on his way to the white mountains to attend Mrs. Willett, who was seriously hurt recently. If able to stand the journey she will be brought in to Bishop.

Bids will be received by the Directors up till noon of Saturday next for the pool and bar privilege at the coming fair. Considering the large number of cracks in training the privileges should be worth a good figure.

Quite a number of Bishop people were at Independence last Saturday on land business. Among the number were J. H. Bulpitt, John Schober, Jake Schober, Jos. Shelby, Chas. McKay, Chas. Dixon, Chas. Richel, John Albers, John Clarke, Thomas Thompson and Mrs. G. W. De La Matyr.

Mrs. J. Brown has instituted a sewing class at Independence, at the residence of Mrs. Bunney. All kinds of plain and fancy sewing taught, a specialty made of children. For terms and other information call upon

Whole No. of Delegates—49

Honor Where Honor Is Due.

Hon A. Caminetti has been re-nominated for Congress in the second dittrict. This is a compliment to Mr. Caminetti that is highly deserved. Never in the history of the State has California had a representative in Congress who labored more earnestly or with more effect for the good of the whole people. His last bill is a great benefit and comes directly home to the people of this section. It provides that no assessment work need be done on mining claims for 1894, and that no proof of labor or improvements need be made on desert entries for the current year; and that the time for making final proof in all entries is extended one year. There are quite a number of desert locations in Owens Valley that would probably, owing to unforseen circumstances, have been forfeited but for this timely intervention. Mr. Caminetti is an honest, earnest and capable man and the people of this section should show their appreciation of his services by returning him to Congress.

Board of Education,

The County Board of Education held its regular semi-annual meeting last week, commencing Monday and continuing until Saturday evening, all the members being present. Mr. Frank Densmore was elected President of the Board for the ensuing year. On Tuesday morning Miss Matilda Meysan, Miss Mabel Chalfant and Miss Mae Dixon presented themselves as applicants for first grade certificates and Miss Alice Williams for a second grade certificate. Miss Meysan, Miss Chalfant and Miss Williams passed successful examinations. Miss Dixon was called away by telegram on Wednesday. It was agreed that each member of the Board consider a feasible plan by which an examination might be held at a given time in the various school districts of the county, and diplomas of graduation granted thereon, each member to report at the next regular meeting of the Board in February.

Of Interest To Claim Owners.

It will be of interest to every citizen of Inyo county who has located a mining claim to know that congress at the present session passed a measure of relief for them. The provisions of sections 2324 of the revised statutes of the United States requiring not less than $100 worth of labor to be performed each year on each mining claim located since 1872, have been suspended for the year 1894 provided the claimant of any mining location shall file a certificate of notice to hold and work said claim; the certificate to be filed on or before December 31, 1894, in the office of location. This law applies to all western states except South Dakota.

A Serious Charge.

The preliminary examination of Arthur Mateer on a charge of perjury was begun before Judge Davidson yesterday. The entire day was taken up in the examination of A. C. McDonald, Justice of Peace of the Second Township, before whom the perjured statement is alleged to have occurred. It is quite likely that several days will yet be required to complete the examination

No pains or expense will be spared to make the Fair Ball of '94 eclipse all previous events of the kind. The floor is the best and largest in the County. The music will be first-class and various special features will be introduced to add to the pleasure and interest of the occasion.

Notice to Voters.

Section 1083, of the Political Code as amended March 9, 1893, provides as follows:

SECTION 1083. Every male citizen of the United States, every male person who shall have acquired the right of citizenship under or by virtue of the Treaty of Queretaro, and every male naturalized citizen thereof, who shall have become such ninety days prior to any election, of the age of twenty-one years, who shall have been a resident of the State one year next preceding the election, and of the county in which he claims his vote ninety days, and in the election precinct thirty days, and whose name shall be enrolled on the Great Register of such county fifteen days prior to an election, shall be a qualified elector at any and all elections held within the county, city and county, city, town, or district within which said elector resides.

All parties desiring to register can do so with the following named deputies in the various precincts named:

Round Valley—F P Blaisdell.
Laws—A R Shively.
Bishop—W O Meroney.
Big Pine—A K Eugley.
Independence—Clerk's Office.
Lone Pine—Fred Burkhardt.
Keeler—Wm Rickards.
Darwin—Henry Mettler.
Olancha—Ed Walker.

Beatrix Randolph.

By JULIAN HAWTHORNE.

For a moment it seemed to them as if they were alone together. When two persons meet in complete sympathy all other human association seems so trifling in comparison that they cease to be aware of it.

At this moment the overture came to an end, and the order was issued for the stage to be cleared. The prima donna found herself again in her dressing room, but not in the same mood as she had left it. She was warm, composed and happy. She looked in the tall mirror, and for the first time saw Marguerite reflected there. Then into her serene and awakened mind entered all the tenderness, simplicity and pathos of Gretchen's lovely story, and she felt the spirit of the German peasant maiden take possession of her. The appurtenances of the stage, the mechanism of the effects, the glare of the footlights, no longer had power to disturb her illusion. They seemed themselves an illusion, and only the story was real. And when the moment came that she stood before the mighty audience they were to her no longer a hostile and opposing presence, with which she must struggle in hopeless contest, but a vast reservoir of human sympathy, aiding her, supporting her, comprehending her, supplying her with life and inspiration, and responding a thousandfold to every chord she touched.

As her voice flowed out and abroad from her lips it seemed to owe its enchanted sweetness and resonance not to her, but to its echo in the hearts of her listeners. Whence, then, had come this marvelous change in the mutual relations between her audience and herself? She was conscious only of the joy of unrestrained expression; the audience, only of the delight of ear and eye; and Geoffrey Bellingham, sitting with folded arms and charmed pulses in the midst of the assemblage, had no suspicion that any part of this triumph of harmony and beauty was due to him. His eyes and all his senses were turned toward her, but how should he imagine that amid the crowd of that great amphitheatre her glances were conscious of no face but his, and that all the stupendous magnetism of their silence and their applause was centered and concentrated in him? He had even forgotten that his Marguerites were in her girdle.

As has already been intimated, however, it would be superfluous to give any account of this memorable performance from the audience's point of view. Competent judges, who attended many repetitions of the opera, have declared that Mlle. Marana never afterward surpassed the standard of excellence she attained on this first occasion. It was the topic of the time, and the fame of it spread all over the United States, and was spoken of next day in London and Paris. The public, which is so inhuman and tyrannical in its apathies and antipathies, is like a child and a slave in its favoritism and its homage. It idolized the incomparable Marana, and would have built her a house of gold, with jeweled windows, if she had demanded it. The unknown girl from the upper reaches of the Hudson was crowned queen of New York for the sake of two or three hours' sweet singing.

It is seldom that Adam, and even diviner Eve, in the days of their youth, are wholly insensible to the worship of their fellow creatures. They may say and believe that flattery cannot make them alter their own estimate of their merit; nevertheless, the eye that sees admiration in all other eyes involuntarily waxes brighter and more assured, and the presence before which others bow down, if it do not bear itself more commandingly, can at least scarcely avoid a graceful condescension. Doubtless it is not the merit but the homage which the merit causes that creates the elation. And by and by the suggestion will insinuate itself that there may, after all, be something exceptional in the nature gifted with such talents, apart from the talents themselves. From this point it is not far to the conclusion that exceptional natures demand exceptional treatment and consideration—should not be made accountable to ordinary rules; should be a law unto themselves. No position is more susceptible than this of being vindicated by plausible arguments, and a poor argument warmed by good will has always been worth a dozen better ones chilled and torpid from the breath of disinclination.

Now Mlle. Marana, though she could not estimate the influence upon others of the personal quality of her voice, could not help knowing that she sung in tune and correctly; but, inasmuch as many other women could do this, she was forced to infer that her being made queen of New York must be due to some personal quality, as aforesaid. This just persuasion gave her pleasure on more accounts than one; but one account was that it seemed to justify in some measure the deception which she was maintaining before the world. Though still chargeable with purloining Marana's name, she might, perhaps, acquit her conscience of damaging that lady in her musical reputation. If she were listened to with as great favor as the genuine Russian diva would have been, surely the latter could not complain of any very great practical injury. On the contrary she would have earned an American renown without being troubled to so much as open her lips. True, renown was all she would earn; but she had voluntarily given up the offer of other emoluments before the false Marana had ever been thought of. Of course a lie is a lie, after every excuse has been made for it; yet there may be cause for congratulation if a lie prove to contain no other mischief than the simple invasion of a truth.

In this opinion she was, it need scarcely be said, cordially supported by Hamilton Jocelyn and Mme. Bemax; nor was her father disinclined to take an optimistic view of the situation. The latter gentleman, by the way, seemed to have taken a fresh start in life since his troubles came to head, therein following the example of many prominent citizens of New York and other places who, when other sources of supply run dry, are accustomed to tap with golden success the unfailing spring of insolvency. Mr. Randolph had taken rooms in a small but elegant flat on Fifth avenue, and was living the life of a rejuvenated bachelor and man about town. The possession of a momentous secret flattered his sense of self importance, and the incumbency of a minor sinecure in the municipal government, which he had obtained through Gen. Inigo's friendly interest with the Democratic mayor, enabled him to assume the air of one who is on confidential terms with statesmen. He had been at considerable pains to devise ambiguous explanations of his possession of ready money and of the singular disappearance of his daughter, and had been somewhat disappointed to discover that no one seemed to be aware that he had ever lacked the former or owned the latter.

The world, Mr. Randolph thought, must be a barbarously large as well as a reprehensibly inattentive place, since it had failed to follow with solicitude the course of his domestic concerns. However, if there was neglect on one side of the account, it was balanced by convenience on the other, and the unsuspected father of the great prima donna made a virtue of impunity.

He visited his daughter twice or thrice a week, besides being present at her performances; but it afforded him a certain gratification to surround their interviews with an elaborate network of secrecy and intrigue, as if he were an enamored Montague seeking to commune at peril of their lives with a love-lorn Capulet. There was evidently a vein of romance in this old gentleman which, had it been properly cultivated in due season, might have considerably enlarged his character.

To return, however, to the prima donna's conscience. It would probably have subsided into a condition of comfortable acquiescence in destiny had it not been for the stimulus unconsciously applied to it by a gentleman of her acquaintance. She could never meet Geoffrey Bellingham without wishing that Mlle. Marana had never been born, or at least that she herself might have achieved her fame in some straightforward and unencumbered way. When a certain tender look and smile, very winning in one whose features were naturally severe, came into his face the pleasure it gave her was marred by the reflection, How would he look if he knew what I am? It is true that he believed her to be a woman whose moral character was currently supposed to be less immaculate than a good many aliases would render that of Beatrix Randolph; none the less she felt, when in his presence, that her one actual sin was more burdensome than all the vicarious naughtiness of the unknown Russian.

She told herself that Geoffrey had perhaps made up his mind to condone Marana's delinquencies, taking into account her foreign training, her temptations, and the loose standard of morals that prevailed in Europe, but that he never would forgive Beatrix for having deliberately misled him—she, an American girl, brought up amid all the enlightenment and fastidious rectitude of the great republic. This was the crumpled leaf in her bed of roses, and it chafed her relentlessly.

But persons whose perception of their value—social, artistic or other—is on the way to beguile them into making a golden calf of themselves in the wilderness, may have reason to be grateful for the implicit criticism of some severe eyed young lawgiver, whose exhortations are none the less effective because they happen to be the utterance of the silent voice of character.

CHAPTER IX.

HOW SHE WAS BETRAYED AND SLANDERED.

One forenoon, as Wallie Dinsmore was seated in his study, with his slippered feet pointed toward the fireplace, the newspaper across his knees and the African lemur munching a lump of sugar on his shoulder, he heard the door bell ring. He rubbed his forehead between his eyes and uncrossed and recrossed his extended legs by way of arousing himself, for his serenity during the last half hour had been gradually verging toward the soporific stage. A few moments afterward there was a knock at the study door, and Wallie, resting his chin on the apex of a triangle made by his elbows and joined hands, said, "Come in!"

The visitor entered, and coming up to Wallie's chair took the paw of the lemur in his hand and shook it. The lemur chattered and Wallie looked up.

"Hullo, Geoffrey," he said, "I was just thinking about a cottage at Newport. Sit down and let me tell you my idea. Have a cigarette—or a cigar?"

"Have you any smoking tobacco?" returned Geoffrey, taking a pipe from his pocket.

"I guess you'll find some Cavendish in the jar. You know where the matches are."

Geoffrey supplied himself, and then drew a chair to the other side of the fireplace and smoked for several minutes in silence. At length he said, "Were you at the opera last night?"

"No. What was it?"

"'Semiramide.'"

"Good?"

"Yes."

"Your theatre seems to suit her," Wallie remarked. "By the way, there must be a column about last night in the paper. Yes; here it is. 'No such rendering of the music of this part has ever'—and so forth and so on. She's a big success."

"She deserves it, doesn't she?"

"She can sing, sir—she can—sing," replied Wallie, with the quiet slowness that was his only form of emphasis. "She puzzles me!"

"What's the puzzle?"

"If she's been through the wars, where are her scars? She looks fresh as a lily and sweet as new mown hay. Where's the cloven foot?"

"There is none," said Geoffrey, with a laconic conviction.

"So I'm inclined to think, and so I'm puzzled."

"There will be stories about any woman," rejoined Geoffrey; "mostly lies."

"But some of the European stories about Mlle. Marana—well, they would lead one to suppose that she had changed her nature, and everything else except her name, when she landed in this country."

"Well, since her name is the only thing she could change, it follows—And our opinion should be formed on what we see and know, not on hearsay."

"You are only quoting what I said to you when you didn't want to come to the dinner," said Wallie, with a chuckle. "To be sure, I hadn't seen her then."

"I thought you had seen her abroad."

"Well—I mean I hadn't seen her before in New York."

"There has been nothing against her since she came?"

"No; on the contrary I think she has had the opportunity of refusing several eligible offers, and she has done so for all the world like a true American girl."

"Who were the men?"

"That would be telling. Why do you ask?"

As Geoffrey made no reply, but smoked with a good deal of sternness, Wallie continued after a while, "I suppose your wisdom teeth are cut, young man?"

"She's a lady, and I—wish her treated as such, that's all!" said Geoffrey. "What were you saying about a cottage at Newport?"

Before this topic could be gone into the friends were interrupted by the entrance of another caller—Mr. Alexander Randolph.

"Who the devil is he?" demanded Geoffrey, knocking out his pipe.

"Never met him till this autumn. He won't hurt you. Sit still."

"Ah, good morning, Mr. Dinsmore," said Randolph, entering in state with his gray eyebrows and imperial; "I can remain but a moment." Here he caught sight of Bellingham. "Am I in the way?"

"In the way of making the acquaintance of Mr. Bellingham—Mr. Randolph," said Wallie. "Sit down, gentlemen. Have a cigar, Mr. Randolph?"

"I thank you—never before luncheon. To come to the point at once—I am of a committee of gentlemen to extend a complimentary breakfast to Gen. Inigo on the 14th of this month. Can we count upon your attendance?"

"The 14th? Let me see," said Wallie, opening a drawer in his desk and taking out a memorandum book. "Yes, there seems to be nothing on that day. Much obliged to you and the committee, Mr. Randolph."

"The hour is 1 o'clock," said Randolph.

"Gen. Inigo deserves a breakfast," Wallie remarked. "He deserves three meals a day. He has catered very well for us."

"That seems to be the general impression," said Randolph, giving a twist to his eyebrow.

"We were just discussing the prima donna," Wallie continued. "You know her, of course, Mr. Randolph?"

"I—ah—I have—that is, slightly. I have heard her sing; I may have met her socially; one meets so many people it is difficult to say."

She turned again and threw her arms about Randolph's neck.

He colored while he spoke and seemed a good deal confused.

"She's a very pretty woman, and seems to be as virtuous as she is pretty, strange to say," the other went on. "There's a discrepancy between her conduct and her history."

Mr. Randolph colored still more.

"I—I'm an old fashioned man, sir," he said, whisking a silk handkerchief out of his coat tail pocket and passing it over his forehead. "In my day we—we took the virtue of a lady for granted; and I must say I—of course, I have no right to be the champion of this lady, sir, but"——

He stopped, and Bellingham said: "Any man has a right to respect a woman he believes honest, and to make others do so in his presence. If that's old fashioned, Mr. Randolph, count me in!"

"Thank you, sir," returned the other.

He rose and put back his handkerchief in his pocket.

"I must take leave of you, Mr. Dinsmore," he added. "A man like myself has a great many affairs on hand. We shall look for you on the 14th, then. Good morning; good morning, Mr.—ah—Bellingham."

"I am more puzzled than ever," said Wallie, when Randolph was gone.

"What now?"

"In the first place he couldn't quite make up his mind whether he'd met her or not; then he got flurried because I suggested there had been stories about her; and, finally, he took to flight rather than discuss her any more. Now if he doesn't know her, why should he flare up so about her? and if he does know her, why does he pretend he doesn't?"

"He's an old fashioned"—began Geoffrey.

"That's gammon," interrupted Wallie, "and you know it! The fall of man is an older fashion than Mr. Randolph. Did any sane man, young or old, ever get into a state of mind because the correctness of an opera singer he didn't know was called in question? I can't make it out—unless he means to marry her!"

This speculation was received by Geoffrey in dead silence, and for a considerable time neither of the men said anything. At last the question of the cottage at Newport was brought up once more and canvassed until they parted.

Bellingham walked slowly toward Madison square, with Mr. Randolph, among other things, on his mind. Still meditating he turned up Fifth avenue, and before long found himself opposite Mlle. Marana's hotel. It occurred to him that he had never yet called on her in her own apartments, and he resolved to repair that neglect. Accordingly he went to the office and inquired if she were in. The clerk glanced at the keyboard and said "Yes" abstractedly. Bellingham got into the elevator and went up.

Recent German Political Plays.

Some months after Bismarck's dismissal a historical play called "Der Neue Herr" was performed at Berlin. The subject was the glorification of the young elector of Brandenburg, known to history as the great elector, who, on ascending the throne of his fathers, dismissed his father's wicked minister. Of course nobody could fail to notice the singularly ill chosen historical parallel, but it did not end there. The emperor visited the performance night after night, applauding vociferously, and even went out of his way to confer marks of distinction on author and actors.

This episode was in general discreetly passed over by the press at the time; the fruit was not ripe, the cup not yet full. But for all that it wounded the feelings of many who, whatever their party, had retained unsullied the sentiments of chivalrous gentlemen. A more recent attempt to propagate political ideas by means of a stage play, which also found demonstrative patronage from the emperor, was choked at its birth by the apathy of the public, who sat on the half empty benches in disdainful silence amid the boisterous applause of the emperor.—Contemporary Review.

Communication with Stranded Ships.

Some months ago, when the Eider was stranded off the Isle of Wight, the proprietors of The Graphic offered a prize of £100 for the best invention for enabling ships to communicate with the shore. In all 2,200 competitors entered for the prize, and the award has just been given to Messrs. Thomson and Noble, of Southampton. The best means of communication is considered by the judges to be a rocket, and the prize winners' rocket has about it a novelty which has been proved to work admirably. It is fitted with a strong grapnel, and carries of course a rope, single or double, according to distance.

The grapnel remains closely shut while the rocket is in flight, but the moment the ground is reached it opens and clings on to whatever it touches. The rope may then be made taut from the ship, and the passengers and crew landed in the ordinary way. The advantage of this arrangement is that the work of rescue can be performed in the absence of assistance from the shore end.—London Tit-Bits.

Crops After the Recent Floods.

It seemed impossible two months ago for any corn to be raised on the flooded bottomlands of the Mississippi valley, but the indications now point to a very fair crop. As soon as the water receded most of the farmers lost no time in securing seed, and the extreme moisture in the soil is bringing on this corn very rapidly. Had the drought predicted for July set in early in the month, the gloomy predictions of the early part of June would have been more than fulfilled, but the very moderate weather has come to the rescue of the flooded farmer, who in many cases will be able to realize nearly as much from his crop as he could have hoped for had the river not left its channel at all.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Employment for the Wongoore.

It is proposed to introduce a new species of vermin into this country. The people of California are plagued with gophers, and they propose to bring the wongoore to war on the gopher.—Chicago Herald.

KNOWLEDGE

Brings comfort and improvement and tends to personal enjoyment when rightly used. The many, who live better than others and enjoy life more, with less expenditure, by more promptly adapting the world's best products to the needs of physical being, will attest the value to health of the pure liquid laxative principles embraced in the remedy, Syrup of Figs.

Its excellence is due to its presenting in the form most acceptable and pleasant to the taste, the refreshing and truly beneficial properties of a perfect laxative; effectually cleansing the system, dispelling colds, headaches and fevers and permanently curing constipation. It has given satisfaction to millions and met with the approval of the medical profession, because it acts on the Kidneys, Liver and Bowels without weakening them and it is perfectly free from every objectionable substance.

Syrup of Figs is for sale by all druggists in 50c and $1 bottles, but it is manufactured by the California Fig Syrup Co. only, whose name is printed on every package, also the name, Syrup of Figs, and being well informed, you will not accept any substitute if offered.

FRAUDULENT LOTTERY SCHEMES

Clever Devices and Bogus Circulars by Which Many People are Being Swindled.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., June 23, 1894.—Since the Louisiana State Lottery Company removed to Honduras and resumed business under the name of the Honduras National Lottery Company, the patrons of this great concern have been eager bait for clever operators, and every month thousands of people are taken in by lottery schemes which purport to be the original Louisiana State Lottery.

The modus operandi is to send a bunch of tickets to some prominent person, inclosing a complimentary ticket good for $5.00. The party is instructed to sell one-fifth of the ticket to some other well-known prominent person, and keep the other fifth for himself. Another condition is that the party must remit $100 in payment for tickets, at least three days before the "drawing."

In order to make the offer appear genuine, a circular of the Honduras National Lottery Company is inclosed with the address of J. H. Lombard & Co., New Orleans, La., carefully stamped in red ink over the address of Paul Conrad, Puerto Cortez, Honduras, C. A., care Central America Express, Port Tampa City, Fla. As a matter of fact, the Honduras National Lottery Company has no such agency in New Orleans and Lombard & Co., never had any connection with this company. The New England States are flooded with the bogus circulars, and a number have already been swindled.—Boston (Mass.) Herald, June 23.

The Pullman boycott has no feature which promises arbitration between the down-trodden public and the porter.

THE BEST OF REASONS.

The reason why ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS are popular is that they may be relied on to cure,

1. Lame back, sciatica, stiffness or twitching of the muscles.

2. Chest troubles, such as pleurisy, pneumonia, consumption.

3 Indigestion, dyspepsia, biliousness, kidney complaint.

The success, however, will depend upon the genuineness of the plaster used. The popularity of ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS has been so great that multitudes of imitations have sprung up on every hand. The only sure cure is to get the genuine ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS improve the digestion.

"I'll make you happy, I will," said he,
His bosom with passion fired.
"Well, maybe you would," responded she,
"But at present you make me tired."

NEARING THE GRAVE.

In old age infirmities and weakness hasten to close the gap between us and the grave. Happily scientific research and pharmacal skill have allied themselves in furnishing us a reliable means of ameliorating the ailments incident to declining years, and of renewing waning physical energy. Its name is Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, a widely comprehensive remedy in disease, and an inestimable blessing to the elderly, the feeble and the convalescent. Rheumatic ailments, trouble with the kidneys and lumbago are among the more common ailments of the aged. These are effectually counteracted by the Bitters, which is likewise a prevention and curative of malarial complaints, dyspepsia, constipation and biliousness. It is highly promotive of appetite, sleep and the acquisition of vigor.

Paternalism leads to unrest and revolution just as surely as beans lead to blue stockings.

SURE CURE FOR PILES.

Sure cure for blind, bleeding and itching Piles. One box has cured the worst cases of ten years' standing. No one need suffer ten minutes after using Kirk's German Pile Ointment. A dyspeptic writes on household affairs says: "Lemon pies are now made without eggs. The lemons having long since been discarded."

There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease, and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven catarrh to be a constitutional disease and therefore requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from 10 drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials. Address F. J. DOWN DRURY LANE.

The dingy street is all aflare with light
That blazes from the garish drinking bars
Athwart the solemn purple of the night,
Athwart the steadfast shining of the stars.

A battered barrel organ, bold and loud,
Grinds out the strains of a familiar air;
And on the dusty pavement whirls a crowd
Of children dancing quaintly in the glare.

Oblivious of their hunger and their rags,
With little flickering feet that never tire,
They eddy over the uneven flags
Like flights of birds about a windy spire.

And fluttering absorbed and dreamy eyed,
They gain once more a well beloved clime,
Where all around them, beautiful and wide,
Is spread the blissful land of Pantomime.

Once more, in filmy frocks of silver sheen,
In flowery wreaths and silken sandals small,
They flit beneath the Beanstalk high and green,
Or dance with Cinderella at the Ball.

Once more they circle 'round the palace dim
In which the lovely sleeping Beauty lies,
And poise to watch the Prince, so young and slim,
Awake her with a kiss upon her eyes.

Ah, Fairyland! It stretches far and near
Its mazy windings mystically sweet;
It has a dazzling doorway even here
In all the squalor of this joyless street.

A LOST LOVE.

Martha Hargrave was an only child of one of the wealthiest inhabitants of Elm's Cross, the expectant heiress of his fortune and possessed in her own right of £5,000. In such circumstances it may be supposed that she attracted not a little the attention of blushing striplings and speculative mammas. These were, with the exception of one family, of her own society—for Mr. and Mrs. Hargrave were Quakers of the old school and confined themselves almost exclusively within the circle of their friends. The exception was formed by a widow lady and her son, the former an early intimate of Mrs. Hargrave, now living on a small annuity, from which she contrived to save a little every year to pay for her boy's outfit in the world.

Richard Temple was well calculated to be the object of a mother's doting affection; he was a fine, spirited, generous, handsome lad, two or three years older than Martha, of whom he was the playmate in childhood. Richard looked upon Martha as his sister till he began to feel as a personal injury the admiring looks that were thrown upon her from under the broad brims of the young Quakers, and the affection of the boy was suffered to ripen into the love of the young man.

While this process was going on with Richard, in Martha the wildness of childhood sobered gradually down into the demure circumspection of the Quaker girl.

But nevertheless when Richard came one day to bid her farewell before his exodus into the world, her heart was too full of the memories of her childish years to remember its new conventionalism, and she stood before him with her hands crossed upon her bosom, gazing in his face with a look of girlish fondness that was made still softer by the tears that stood trembling in her beautiful eyes. He was to proceed to London, to be completed in his initiation into mercantile business, and might be absent for years, and Martha felt the separation as her first serious distress. Richard was old enough to be aware of the nature of his own feelings.

As the moment of parting arrived he drew her toward him with both hands; his arms encircled her waist, and—how it happened I know not, for the thing was wholly out of rule—his lips were pressed to hers. The next moment he started from his bewilderment; his eyes dazzled; Martha had disappeared. He did not know, when in the morning the stage coach was carrying him from Elm's Cross, that a young girl was sitting behind a blind in the highest room of that house watching the vehicle till it was lost in her blinding tears.

I am unable to trace the adventures of Richard Temple in London, but they appear to have been comparatively fortunate, since at the end of only three years he was a junior partner in a young but respectable firm. He had seen Miss Hargrave several times during the interval, but I need not say that their intercourse had entirely changed its character.

At the end of the three years I have mentioned Mrs. Temple died, and Richard, now alone in the world, and with tolerable prospects in business, began in due time to ask himself, with a quaking heart and a flushing brow, whether it were possible for him to obtain the Quaker girl for his bride. After much cogitation on this subject, his characteristic daring prevailed, and addressing to Martha an eloquent history of his love, accompanied by a frank statement of his affairs and prospects, and a solicitation for permission to woo her for his wife, he inclosed the letter, open, in a briefer one to her father, and dispatched the fateful missive.

The reply came from Mr. Hargrave. It was cool, calm, decisive. He hoped friend Richard would speedily forget what, to a rational minded person, ought to be hardly a disappointment, and when his fortune permitted it select from his own denomination a wife of his own degree. This insolent letter, as the young man termed it, had no effect but that of rousing the fierce and headlong energy of his nature. He knew Martha too well to believe that she had any share in such a production, and he wrote at once to Mr. Hargrave to say that his daughter was old enough to decide for herself; that on the following day he would present himself at his house in Elm's Cross in the hope of hearing his fate from Martha's own lips, even if in the presence of her father and mother.

When Richard Temple passed across the Dutchlike lawn of the house he felt his heart die within him. When the respectable middle aged servant marshaled him up stairs to the drawing room he followed the man with deference, as if he had something to say in the decision.

Martha entered the room alone, and shutting the door glided composedly up to Richard and offered him her hand as usual. The clasp, though gentle, was palpable.

"Martha," he said, "did my letter surprise you? Tell me only that it was too abrupt—that it startled and hurried you. Was it not so?"

"Nay, Richard."

"Then you knew, even before I dared to speak, that I loved you. Do you know of the reply my letter received?"

"Yea, Richard."

"And you sanctioned it?"

"In meaning," but here her voice slightly faltered; "if the words were unkind, be thou assured that they came neither from my pen nor my heart."

"Then I was deceived in supposing—for I did indulge the dream—that my devotion had awakened an interest in your bosom? That interest belongs to another!"

"I never had a dearer friendship than thine," said Martha, and raising her eyes to his she added, after a pause, in the clear, distinct, silvery tone which was the character of her voice, "and never shall!"

"Yet you reject and spurn me!"

"Richard," said the Quaker girl, growing still more pale, "no more of this. Thou mayest agitate and unnerve, but never change my purpose."

"What is your purpose?"

"To honor my father and my mother."

She extended her hand to him and spoke. The reply he had demanded was distinct enough in her words, but a thousand times more so in her look, manner, tone.

Richard never knew whether any one watched the stagecoach that day from the upper window.

Martha was not well, and her father at length grew alarmed. They took her from watering place to watering place; they tried every day to give some new direction to her thoughts. Martha was grateful. But still she was not well, and when many months had passed away the now terrified parents, after trying everything that science and affection could suggest for the restoration of their only child, consulted once more. The nature of the step they ultimately determined upon may be gathered from the following communication received in reply to a letter from Mr. Hargrave:

RESPECTED SIR—The inquiry thou directedst has been easy. I am connected in business with one (not of our society) to whom the young man is well known and by whom he is much esteemed. Richard Temple is wise beyond his years. He is of quiet and retired habits and will get on in the world. This is the opinion of my friend. I know that he would willingly give him his daughter to wife. But Richard was not forward in the matter. His thoughts, even in the company of the maid, seemed preoccupied—doubtless by business. Since writing these lines I have been informed that he visits Elm's Cross in a few days to arrange some matters connected with his late mother's affairs. I am, respected friend, etc., EZEKIEL BROWN.

This letter determined Mr. Hargrave to recall his rejection of Richard Temple, and the effect of a conversation he had upon the subject with his daughter proved to the unbounded joy of the parents that as yet she had no organic disease.

For some days Martha, though happy, was restless. At length an acquaintance, when calling, informed her that she had just seen Richard.

"Thou rememberest Richard, Martha?" Martha nodded.

"He is grown so comely and so manly thou wouldst hardly know him."

"He will call here, peradventure?" said the mother.

"Nay. He has already taken his place in the coach for tomorrow." Martha grew pale, and the mother hurried out of the room to seek her husband. That night Richard received a friendly note from Mr. Hargrave, begging him to call in the morning on business of importance.

When Richard found himself once more in the silent drawing room his manner was very different from what it had been on the last occasion. He was calm, but gloomy, and almost stern; he waited for the appearance of his inviter with neither hope nor fear, but with a haughty impatience. Instead of Mr. Hargrave, however, it was Martha who entered the room, and he started back at the unexpected apparition. The color that rose into her face and made her more beautiful than ever prevented him from seeing that she had been ill, and when she held out her hand the slight grasp he gave it was so momentary that he did not discover its attenuation. A painful embarrassment prevailed for some time.

He was about to withdraw with a ceremonious bow when Martha stepped forward.

"Richard," said she, "I have no fear that my early friend will think me immodest, and therefore I speak without concealment. Tarry yet awhile, for I have that to say which, peradventure, may make thee consider thy place in the coach a light sacrifice."

"How?"

"Richard," she continued, "thou didst once woo me for thy wife, and wert rejected by my father's commands. Circumstances have brought about a change in his feelings. Must I speak it?" and a slight smile, passing away in an instant, illumined the bright flush that rose into her face. "Wert thou to ask again the answer might be different!"

So long a silence ensued after this speech that Martha at length raised her eyes suddenly and fixed them in alarm upon Richard's face. In that face there was no joy, no thankfulness, no love; nothing but a blank and ghastly stare. He was as white as a corpse, and large beads of sweat stood upon his brow.

"What meaneth this?" cried Martha, rushing toward him, but he threw out his hands to prevent her approach, while the answer came hoarse and broken from his haggard lips:

"Ruin—misery—horror! Martha, I am married!" And so saying he rushed out of the room.

It is said that men recover more speedily than women in love diappointments. The reason is not that they feel them less deeply. Women have more leisure than men. The world has few demands upon them, and they can only exhibit their mental power and loftiness of resolve by making wholesome occupation for their fevered minds. Of these women was Margaret Hargrave. Although stunned at first by the blow, its very suddenness and severity compelled her to reflect upon her position and summon up her energies. She did not permit her sympathies to lie buried in one absorbing subject, but cast them abroad upon the face of society. Under this moral discipline she recovered her bodily health. The fresh roses of youth continued to bloom in her lovely cheeks long after her hair had begun to change its hue, and so the gentle Quaker commenced her descent into the vale of years.

The process is different with Richard Temple, but still of a kindred character. To say that he did not repent his marriage would be untrue, but still he had honor and integrity enough to cherish the wife he had married in return for her love. He devoted himself to business and to his rapidly increasing family; prospered in both, and in due time arrived at the enjoyment of at least ordinary happiness. But at length a period of commercial calamity came and Richard suffered with the rest. His fixed capital was still moderately good, but he was embarrassed, almost ruined, for want of money.

One day during this crisis he was in his private room in the counting room brooding over his difficulties, and in the least possible mood that could be imagined for sentimental recollections, when a letter was placed before him, the first two lines of which informed him, in a brief, businesslike manner, that Martha was dead. The paper dropped upon the floor and he abandoned himself to grief.

On emerging from this he took up the letter to place it on the table, when, on glancing over its remaining contents, he found that poor Martha had bequeathed to him the whole of her original fortune of £5,000. When he had become quite an old man he was observed often plunged in a deep reverie over his Quaker love.—L. R. in New York News.

JOLLY BACHELORS

How Some of the Young Fellows That Draw and Paint Enjoy Life.

WHAT THEIR MEALS CONSIST OF.

A Painter's Good Fortune Usually Begins at the Altar, and it is the Goal Desired.—But Few Get Married.

Although common sense generally stands appalled at the artist's threshold, a great number of our younger and some of our older painters manage to get along very comfortably without it. There is an unwritten law in Bohemia that a man can do anything honorable without losing his dignity. During a snowstorm a young lady driving down Fourteenth street in the family carriage was astonished to observe a young artist whom she had met some time before at a fashionable dinner party carrying a bucket of coal to his studio. A more diplomatic person would have driven on without pretending to notice the incident. But this particular young woman was so astonished at seeing the wit and lion of a social gathering engaged in such a menial occupation that she motioned her coachman to stop, and alighting from her carriage desired an explanation from her friend of his extraordinary conduct. He was not at all embarrassed. Setting his coal bucket down, he said laughingly:

"Oh, that's nothing. My coal is out, and they haven't sent me the ton I ordered. I have a model up stairs, and I couldn't ask the poor thing to pose for a Venus in a cold room. So I went to the grocery and got a bucketful, and here I am." Whereat he lifted his hat, picked up his burden, and disappeared up the stairs.

It must not be imagined that because these young fellows live in their studios and generally cook their own meals they are to be sympathized with. No bachelor in New York has more enjoyment out of life than a painter. One of his first purchases is a gas stove with its various cooking apparatus. By the aid of this instrument he can prepare meals as appetizing, if not quite so elaborate, as those of the Hoffman House. Usually his meals are simple—a breakfast of coffee, rolls, eggs, lamb chops or liver and bacon, and a light luncheon of anything handy, eaten hurriedly in order to save the precious hours of light. When darkness falls the young painter's appetite asserts itself. He either goes to an Italian or, as his finances may be, to a fashionable restaurant and dawdles for two hours over a table d'hote, or else goes to his cupboard and finds enough material for an elaborate dinner of three or four courses. Usually he has company. Dinners in a studio building are like progressive euchre parties—the artists go from table to table, one night gathering in Jones's room, another in Brown's, a third in Robinson's.

Madder Lake, the genre painter, now rich and famous, gave a dinner one Sunday ten years ago to half a dozen young fellows—poets, painters, musicians, literary engineers and the like. It was a bitter cold day and a howling snowstorm prevailed.

"Say, fellows," remarked Fixatif, in whose studio they had been smoking all the afternoon. "I'm hungry, and I'll be blest if I have anything in the larder except crackers and cheese. Let's dine with Lake."

Without apology Lake's studio was invaded and the proposal made to him. He was quite willing, but all the supplies he had were a pound of porterhouse steak, some mutton chops and a lot of vegetables.

"The very thing," cried John Moran. "Fellows, you have never eaten one of my haricots. Well, you shall today. Have you any wine, Lake?"

"Two dozen claret," said the host.

"Sit down, then, with a bottle, every mother's son of you," said John Moran, "and watch me make a haricot."

Whereupon he took off his coat, tied a piece of Lake's silken drapery around him, and after an hour's preliminary work had the ingredients cooking slowly over a grate fire. The poet lighted a cigar, and turning to the company remarked benignantly: "Voici! Within half an hour you shall taste a repast fit for the Olympian gods!"

Then ensued an extraordinary thing. Megilps, the dog painter, happened to state that for his part he always had a very poor opinion of Swinburne. That set Moran off. He had been silently engrossed over the pot for a long time, but now he was ready for an argument. Megilp's unfortunate remark gave him the clew, and Moran seized it at once. He had just sold a poem to The Century and spoke with authority and a faint but musical brogue. He was a good talker and everybody listened approvingly. Suddenly there arose what seemed to be a simultaneous wail of horror from the company. "The haricot is scorching!" So it was. Moran dropped his eloquence and grabbed hold of the cooking pot. But the vegetables and meat alike were burnt, nauseous in odor and equally disagreeable in taste. There was a proposition to chuck the poet into the snow, but it was not carried. Fixatif went to his larder and brought back all his crackers and cheese, and with this scanty meal, washed down by copious drafts of claret, the expectant diners had to be satisfied.

Probably it is in the desire to get away from such incidents as this that painters always want to get married, to eschew sack and live cleanly. There is a great deal of wit and good humor in a bachelor's studio. It is the scene of romance and sentiment and gayety. It presents Rembrandtesque contrasts of light and shadow and is in many particulars such a method of Bohemia that is delineated by the novel writers. But the bachelor artist knows that his life, though generally jolly and free from care, is also in the main free from comfort and lacking in the element of sustained effort that is essential to the achievements of ambition. It occasionally happens that bachelor painters make a reputation and remain single and prosperous. But usually the artist's good fortune begins at the altar, and in the great majority of cases he is desirous to get there as soon as possible.—New York Sun.

Not Obliged to Believe Everything.

The dean of Norwich in a recent speech told this story to illustrate the new criticism as it appears among the middle classes. A worthy timber merchant announced that he was relieved to find that he need not believe literally the various passages in the Bible which he had often proved to be impossible. Being pressed to name one of these passages he mentioned the ark. It was, he understood, 450 feet long, 70 feet broad and 45 feet high and was filled with live animals. He was convinced, therefore, that the Israelites could not have carried it about with them for forty years.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Rosa Bonheur.

Mlle. Rosa Bonheur is still hard at work, notwithstanding her advanced age. She has just finished three small pictures—a cattle piece, a study of a sleeping lioness, and an exquisite flock of Pyrenean sheep with their shepherd.

Caution to Housekeepers.

Housekeepers are warned against the "California cold process" of fruit canning. Professor E. W. Hilgard, director of the California University experiment station, has issued circulars repudiating the "cold process" and warning persons against the use of the "compound extract" advertised. The health of the household finds a new menace in the increased use of powerful drugs in the preservation of food. Salicylic acid boracic are now in extensive use. Manufacturers of mince meat put up wet in cans or jars are using such acids, and they are also put into vegetables, pickles and preserves.

The New Jersey state board of health has condemned this practice. One of its members—Albert R. Leeds—recently called attention through the Philadelphia Ledger to the extensive use of the dangerous drug. He says: "Medical authorities ascribe to salicylic acid five different kinds of toxic action. Its influence in producing difficulty of breathing and palpitation of the heart is so marked that it should be a rule never to prescribe it as a medicine in case of heart or lung troubles. The drug is principally used for rheumatic disorders. Considering that there are methods of preservation which render its use unnecessary, that its action is cumulative, and that article after article of food may be taken, each of which contains it, the safe plan would be to restrict the use of this drug to medicinal purposes."

A Clever Woman at the World's Fair.

The World's fair has given employment to an army of women who have been quick to grasp the situation and qualify themselves for work either in the grounds or on the floors of the numerous buildings. Mrs. Luella J. Perry is to head the guides within the inclosure after the opening day. This tiny, wavy haired, brown eyed woman has already escorted some 3,000 visitors about. She secures the autograph of every one she guides. Her attentions are not confined to women. It is a matter of indifference to her which sex she guides, as long as her services are appreciated.

Mrs. Perry brought herself and her enterprise from the little town of Barre, near Worcester, Mass., and only ten miles from the town where Director General Davis first saw the light. Mrs. Perry was on the grounds to see the first shovel put into the earth. She knows every inch of her route and puts in pleasant "filling up" talk that helps while away the long distances between the buildings. She is wonderfully intelligent, and talks Turkey, China, Africa or Alaska with equal ease.—New York Recorder.

The Honey Season.

One of the most nutritious and healthful of foods is honey. It is the one sweet that never clogs, and can be eaten with impunity at all times. The markets are now flooded with the white clover honey from up the state, and the delicious California honey made from the orange blossom. Let your children eat all the bread and butter and honey they want. Give them great slices of bread covered with honey for their luncheons. It will do them good. From the time the new honey begins to come into the market until spring I feed my children honey every day.

If they have a little cold or cough and trouble with their throats, I give them strained honey mixed with a few drops of lemon juice, and it proves most effectual. When they are hungry I give them a generous slice of bread and butter covered thick with honey, and they never get sick, as they would eating sweetmeats, jellies and jams. From long years of experience I feel justified in recommending honey as an excellent and nutritive food, not only for children, but for grown people.—New York Herald.

A Famous Woman Dead.

The Marquise de Blooqueville, who died a few days ago in Paris, was formerly one of the most beautiful women of her time, and like most French beauties had considerable political influence. The marquise was the youngest daughter of Marshal Davoust, prince d'Eckmuehl, duke of Auerstaedt. Two of her sisters, also famous for their good looks, married respectively the Duke of Cambaceres and Count Vigier. The marquise was a great favorite at the court of Louis Philippe, and was the intimate friend of Queen Amelia and the Duchess of Orleans. In early womanhood her features were of the perfect Greek type, her eyes and hair a brilliant black. Enthusiastic writers of Louis Philippe's day described her figure as divine, and her gait and carriage as those of a goddess. She was a handsome woman at the time of her death.—New York Tribune.

Mrs. Langtry's Jewels.

The jewels worn by Mrs. Langtry in the different acts of the "Queen of Manoa" are altogether worth between $300,000 and $350,000. The diamond and ruby necklace worn in the third act actually cost $45,000. Behind the scenes may be seen a mysterious individual—neither stage carpenter, dresser nor actor—wandering about without any apparent business. He is a detective specially selected on account of his acquaintance with the ways and faces of expert jewelry thieves.—Woman.

Lady Tennyson.

Lady Tennyson has been for several years a great invalid, and has passed most of her later life lying on a sofa. She is a sweet, affectionate old lady, and in her youth was very pretty. She has never got over the blow at the death of her son Lionel. The Tennysons are a peculiarly attached family, and Hallam, the eldest son, has all his life been most devoted to his illustrious father.—London Star.

Expensive Shirts, Cheap Scarfs.

It is a curious fact that the man of middle age that will pay willingly the high price for all linen shirts to one of the Twenty-third street or upper Broadway furnishers will seek to strike an average on his outlay by going into some dry goods store and purchasing an assortment of fifty cent neck scarfs.—Clothier and Furnisher.

THE SEVEN HELLS.

A Curious Hot Spring Situated on one of the Japanese Islands.

THE STORY TOLD BY A TRAVELER.

Superstitious Men and Women Torture Themselves in Boiling Hot Water.—It is Better Than Natural Gas.

Being out on the coast of Korea and Japan, looking for things curious, I secured from the natives intelligence of a remarkable place in the remote interior of an island belonging to Japan called Kiushiu. The place is commonly called Seven Hells, and on account of its inaccessibility and remoteness has seldom been visited by Americans or so much as referred to in print. I determined to visit this Japanese inferno, and having everything arranged I set out with provisions for a two weeks' travel. The first few days were spent in a small Japanese steamer crossing three or four inland seas and winding around at least a thousand different islands to get in reach of the mainland that would lead me to the end of my journey. It may appear to be an exaggeration to speak of so many islands and seas, but when it is remembered that Japan alone has 4,000 islands and at least 100 different seas it will not appear strange that I passed 1,000 islands in search of the one on which is the phenomenon.

When I had got as far as I could go by water, there was nothing left for me but to try the crude mode of travel of the islanders for 100 miles or more. I hired a jinriksha and two coolies to pull me and at once proceeded. A whole day and night were spent in this funny vehicle until I came at last to mountains so steep that it was impossible for me to ride farther. Then another change in my mode of travel was made. I hired a cooly and pack horse to carry my baggage, while "I took my foot in my hand and walked" for 20 miles over that rugged mountain.

Once over the mountains I was almost in sight of the Seven Hells. An arm of another sea lashed up in a narrow neck. On every side stood gigantic mountains capped with snow, while below lay the beautiful valley. It seemed as if I might be entering paradise. I walked a little farther, and in a moment the earth resounded as if a thousand cannons were exploded beneath me. I had reached the Seven Hells, and all that had been told me of the place was fully demonstrated.

Just a few yards from where I stood was the Boiling sea. A great smoke and steam arose like a cloud from the water, and upon examination I found that the sea of water was boiling and bubbling like a pot over a stove. The water was scalding hot, and would cook an egg in two minutes. This Boiling sea is considered sacred by the natives, and the government had at one time to erect a fence around it to keep the people from plunging in.

From the Boiling sea a continual stream of hot water runs down through a village of about 300 people, who are the most peculiar human beings outside of China. In the center of the village is a big round bath of hot water from the sea. In this bath from 10 to 25 are constantly to be seen bathing. There are no screens or coverings, but men, women and children all bathe together in Adamic simplicity. I saw at one time nine women and ten men in the bath.

About 50 steps away from this place is a sweat bath, dedicated to one of their gods. An open shelter is built in the streets over a cavern in the earth which they say Buddha built for them. The excavation has a door to it similar to an old fashioned sweet potato house that southerners build to keep their potatoes from freezing in the winter. The door is about 3 feet square, and there is no way for either a person or the steam to escape except by this door. In the front were priests selling tickets for half a cent each, and six persons were admitted to the sweat bath at once. Just over the entrance stands an image of Buddha, with rice cakes, flowers and incense offerings. The people worshiped as they went in, while an old priest stood by telling the people that whosoever bathed in faith should be cured of all maladies. The lame and crippled flocked around and listened with eagerness. The priest said that Buddha sent down his angel, who met an ancient priest and told him that he would write the name of Buddha on a stone and cover it with the earth and cause the mountains to gush out with hot water and flow over the name of Buddha for the healing of all diseased believers.

"This," said the priest, "is the place prepared by the great gods, and if you would be healed enter in and bathe." It was amazing to notice the deluded men and women, in companies of six, go into the bath and stay until almost dead from suffocation and come out dripping with perspiration and covered with straw. It seems that a stream from the Boiling sea runs under the excavation, and inside is thrown a lot of straw on which these men and women spread themselves and stay until they fairly roast themselves alive. From this place they go to a hot shower bath, which consists of several large bamboo poles placed in a waterfall from the hot sea, which fell about 10 feet upon the bodies of the saints just from the sweat bath. From the shower bath they go to the fountain bath, where the course is completed. The entire process often takes several hours and is gone through without clothing or towels of any kind. This keeps the streets alive with men and women walking here and there as naked as they were born into the world.

Another peculiarity of this strange people is the way they cook and eat. Everything they do has some religious superstition connected with it, and their cooking and eating are not an exception. I am safe in saying that no people on earth cook like the people who live at the Seven Hells on the island of Kiushiu, in the marvelous little nation of Japan. They have arranged to run the water from the Boiling sea in small streams, about a foot under the surface of the earth, right in front of every man's door. Over these streams are mud ovens built like a pot, with a lid over some of them. In their ovens the people place whatever they want to cook, and the steam from the hot water does the work. This is certainly better than natural gas. Many of the people, and in fact most of them, merely dig a hole down to the hot steam, place some straw over the water and put their potatoes, etc., in and cover them up for awhile until they are ready to eat. I saw many people cooking in this way.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

The Dinner Dance.

The "dinner dance" is now more popular than ever. There is one very obvious advantage in this method of giving a dance in that it makes a small affair possible, and there is no danger of giving offense to the ninety and nine who are necessarily left out of it.—New York Tribune.

They Were All Drowned.

Manager "Nate" Salsbury says that when he was last across the pond he put up for a day in an Irish town. He was lingering over a cigar in a smoking room at his hotel—a room at the back of the building and overlooking a canal—when he noticed another occupant of the place. The reason for noticing him was the other fellow's iteration of the phrase, "And there were thirteen av thim drowned, and me own brother amang thim." This soliloquist was a native, a man in middle life, who made his remarks at ten minute intervals, gazing sadly out upon the canal meanwhile. At last he could no longer contain the information that he was almost perishing to impart, and turning to Mr. Salsbury he said: "'Twas a sad accident they had here, sure, two years ago come the 14th of nixt September, and me own brother amang thim."

"How was that?" asked Mr. Salsbury, willing to be sympathetic.

"Well, ye see, it was loike this: There did be a coachin party start that marnin—thirteen people, and me own brother amang thim—and they set off in grand sthyle, but whin they got to the bridge ye see beyant, forninst th' lock, the bridge broke and they fell through, the whole thirteen, me own brother wan av thim. There was little wather in the canal jist at the toime, but the whole crowd got a floundering in th' mud, whin the lock keeper opened the gates and let in a power av wather, and that finished the whole thirteen, and me own brother amang thim."

"What did the old fool let on the water for?"

"Sure, he wanted to float thim."—New York Recorder.

An Active Life the Best.

Some think that Carlyle, while living the life of a student, was all the while dying to be something much more active. It is extremely likely that there were moments in his life when he would even have enlisted, had a recruiting sergeant been at hand to take advantage of his mood. But upon the whole, we may doubt if he would have done better for himself in any other sphere than that he chose and to which he devoted himself so thoroughly.

There was no lack of energy in his career, though objectively it was not apparent. The occasional growl which he vents against the literary life must not be taken too seriously. They merely mark the discontent of the natural man with the station of which he fancies he has long ago exhausted all the pleasures.

As a corrective to Carlyle on this point, Ernest Renan may be mentioned. In his "Recollections" he is almost superlative in praise of the scholar's life. He would not vary his career if he were called upon to live it again. Yet even in him the instinct of energy at the back of all of us led him to express the hope that he might die a quick, vigorous death—be shot or knocked on the head.

"Life must," we are told, "be active and vigorous, else death is preferable to it."

It is wholesome counsel. The Buddhist who gradually extinguishes his activities is not at all admirable to us.—All the Year Round.

The Modern Daughter.

The humorous publications still keep up the joke about the modern girl's ignorance of cooking and housekeeping, but actually this wit has become pointless. The standard of housekeeping and the science of cooking were never higher nor better understood than now, and it is the young women who are stepping in to relieve mothers of long borne burdens and in fact show them how much better they can be borne. Said a mother the other day, and she is one of several who has been heard recently speaking in the same strain:

"Edith is delightfully taking from me the domestic problem. I have time for everything nowadays. I've thought myself always a capable manager, but she does better than I ever did. She has trained our one maid to a degree of efficiency I should never have hoped for. She markets to better advantage and more appetizingly, and best of all finds none of the routine a drudgery."

Instead of failures and drones in the domestic hive this generation of healthy, well taught girls are splendid helpful embodiments of that all around development of the Nineteenth century which permits them to toss a salad, make a bonnet, or discuss the tariff with equal ease.—Her Point of View in New York Times.

Taking a Fit.

In one of the high toned restaurants in Williams court, otherwise known as Pie alley, there is a waiter who thinks the police are not as hard hearted a set of public servants as some people would have him believe. Not long ago one of the habitues of the alley took a fit and was removed to Station 2 for treatment. The waiter was telling about the incident, and a customer asked him what would be done with the unfortunate at the police station.

The waiter misunderstood the question, and replied that the man was not arrested for taking the fit, but was only carried to the station that he might be attended by a physician. The customer remarked that a fit was one of the few things that could be successfully taken without the offending party being arrested.—Boston Herald.

Cranks on Dress.

There are indeed all sorts of cranks on the subject of men's furnishings. There are those that will have suspenders for every pair of trousers—a good idea—and they will all be costly, high class articles—and they will get even on neckwear or some other phase of attire. Then again there are neckwear fiends—and this class is growing—that will do with one pair of ordinary braces—wear low priced shirts and go the limit that finer neckwear costs in the leading shops.—Clothier and Furnisher.

Training His Employer.

The story is told of an English butler, who had been employed in several Boston families, who got homesick here and went back to London. When he applied for a place and showed his last recommendation dated Boston he was told that no Englishman wished to employ a fellow spoiled by lax American methods. So he has been driven back to Boston, where he is now supposably training his employer to be severe with him in the English fashion.—Boston Transcript.

Troubled with the Fog.

A child who had never seen a fog except in California rushed to his mother in much excitement the other morning to tell her that it "was growing California." The same small boy, who had had the peculiar state of the atmosphere explained to him, was noticed later in the day blowing with all his might upon the window pane. When remonstrated with for dimming its clearness he explained, "I'm trying to get all this fog out of my mouth."—New York Post.

WILL NOT TALK.

How Prominent Citizens Evade Persistent Reporters.

THEIR MANY LITTLE TRICKS.

The Hotel Visitor is Safe if He has Made Himself Solid With the Hotel Clerk.—How They are Outwitted.

In attempting to avoid a man or a woman at a large hotel it is necessary to use a good deal of wisdom. You do not need to be a detective and glide through the lobby, making frequent changes in your headgear or in your coats, or in pulling on or taking off a false mustache. All you need to do is to:

Lie to the bell boy.
Tip the clerk.
Locate the little side door.
And attend to one or two other small matters.

When the reporter starts out on the "hotel beat" trying to interview celebrities he has absolutely no guarantee that his work will net anything worthy of record. A hotel "beat," it should be understood, means getting news at the hotels. "Beat" is used in the sense of route.

This is about the way it goes: The reporter stops first, let us say, at the famous place that has the marble corridor, the resort of all the politicians of the Union—the Fifth Avenue hotel. He looks at the register. He nods to the clerk, passes the topic of the day and incidentally asks whether or not there are any notables on hand.

He sees the name of Charles T. Yerkes on the blotter. He has been reading the papers, and he knows consequently that Mr. Yerkes has donated $500,000 to the Chicago university for a telescope. That's mighty good stuff, he thinks to himself. So he scribbles his name on a card and sends it up stairs by the bell boy, requesting the privilege of a brief talk.

Now, note one circumstance—the reporter is never allowed to go up stairs of his own free will. He knows, maybe, where Mr. Yerkes' room is. He could go directly to it, but he would be stopped by a porter or by a hotel detective. So he has to trust to the bell boy to bring an answer.

That worthy starts up stairs at a lively clip. The last the anxious reporter sees of him is the tails of his coat as he zips up the marble stairs. Five minutes pass. He does not return. Ah, yes, here he is. He sings out to the clerk, mind you, and not to the waiting reporter, these words:

"No, 189 not in. Don't know when will be in." Then the bell boy directs his steps over to the wooden bench over in the little anteroom and sits up straight, like a soldier, a pained expression on his face.

There is no going behind the returns. If the boy says "He's out," he may mean "out" in the social sense of not "home." But you can't help that. And the sly rascal over there on the wooden board, he's reading a dime novel!

Sometimes a big gun will get away from a reporter by registering under a false name. Mr. Astor often travels incog. Not more than ten months ago he was unearthed at a hotel in Kansas, where he had been stopping under the name of one unknown to fame. A variation is to register under the name of your gentleman's man. It is clever, easy and usually effective.

Men rarely remain around the hotels anyway, whether they are big guns or little fishes. A man registers at a hotel, goes to bed if it be night, gets out in the morning and away to business. When the reporter comes in, say at 1 o'clock, the birds have usually flown. To see a man's name on the register is a long, long way from finding him in the hotel. After waiting five hours to see a man likely enough that worthy will reply that he won't see you. Then you will be rebuked by your paper for neglect of duty.

Another way of escaping reporters at the hotels is through the clerk. When Mr. Walk-in-the-mud, of Mudville, the recently elected governor, drops down on the New York hotel, he registers his name all in a flurry, and then, leaning over the counter, says to the clerk in a hoarse voice:

"Remember, I am not in to any reporters." The clerk bows, rings up front, and the gentleman is shown to his apartment. Half an hour later Mr. Hotel Lounger, a reporter for a daily newspaper, comes in. He looks over the list of arrivals. He sees the name of Mr. Walk-in-the-mud. He fetches out his card. It says:

> Mr. Hotel Lounger desires to see Mr. W-I-T-M for a brief talk for The So-and-so. No politics. Time, say, ten minutes. Interview to be on topics of day, with pleasant personal reference to Mr. W-I-T-M's recent successes.

There is a neat little fib on that card. It is made to appeal to the foibles and vanities of mankind. He hands this card to the clerk. The clerk scans it narrowly and says: "I am sorry, but you cannot see Mr. W. today. He has left strict orders that he will not see any one."

"Why not?"

"Oh, I don't know."

That settles it. The estimable gentleman may at the moment be in his room smoking cigars and putting his feet on the back of a chair, but he is secure in his retreat; no one can get at him. He has fixed that with the clerk.

Many a good man and a few bad ones have managed to escape from hotel reporters through the side door or through the ladies' door. It will happen, let us say, like this:

The reporter is in hot pursuit, and the game is acting very shy. Maybe the reporter has been pestering the guest almost to death. He is waiting for his man in the lobby. Every half hour he sends up his card. The answer comes down that Mr. Guest is not in. That is right too. The evening is beginning to draw on apace. Finally, puffing and blowing, in comes Mr. Guest, fresh from business. Mr. Reporter gobbles him at once. Mr. Guest makes believe that he is very, very, very busy, and that he cannot possibly see Mr. Reporter now, but if Mr. Reporter will come this evening, say at 8—yes, at 8—he will see to it that Mr. Reporter is treated properly.

The newspaper man goes away in deep sorrow. His five hours' vigil has availed him naught. Promptly at 8, or a little before, he is at the man's room with his card. The answer comes back, "Mr. Guest has gone to the theater." This is another of the odd exits of the big guns.

But let the reader, if he be sought after by interviewers, consider. Reporters have long memories, and, like the traditional elephant to which tobacco was given years ago, may revenge themselves long after the man himself has forgotten his offence. It doesn't always pay—the odd exit.

President Cleveland permitted the tariff bill to become a law without his signature. He said the bill was a great improvement over McKinleyism, but it was not satisfactory to the Democratic party. He is not willing to accept the Gorman compromise as a settlement of the tariff question and says the war is not over.

The State Board of Equalization decided to raise the San Francisco assessment 15 per cent, which will add $4,875,000 to the assessment roll of that city. Kings county, which the board considered to be assessed to high, was reduced 5 per cent, which will make their roll $350,000 less than the amount returned by the assessor. The balance of the counties were not altered in their assessments.

We see that some of our high tariff advocates are mourning over the fact that the new schedule, by putting jute sacks on the free list, has forced a jute bag factory in Oakland to go out of business. But how about the farmers of California, who are benefited to the extent of $375,000 a year by the reduction in the price of jute sacks? They certainly will not be found doing much kicking at this feature the new tariff.

A boom in business has started in the East, and the wholesalers of New York say that there have not been as many buyers in the city in two years as appeared there this week. They had not bought anything for some time and their stock was low. Firms report better sales than they had in the fall of 1892, when business was at its best. The boom has started in California, on a smaller scale, it is true, but it will spread, and before long "the good old times" of which we have heard so much in the past eighteen months will be with us again.

Another evidence that Dan Burn's ticket is not gaining strength is the circumstance that the Redlands Citrograph, edited by Scipio Craig a Republican of State-wide reputation —if not wider—has pulled the State ticket down from the head of its editorial columns and has come out as an independent newspaper. Mr Craig was even a candidate before the Republican State convention and his paper has been a tower of strength to the g. o. p in San Bernardino county, but the prevalence of bossism, such as that which controls the Republican party in this campaign is more than he can stand.

The Sacramento Bee Says: The Grove L. Johnson element is hard at work trying to induce Caminetti not to accept the Democratic nomination for Congress in this District. These self styled friends of the present Congressman allege that they are acting in his interest; that he will be beaten, and that they do not desire to see him defeated. There is an old saying about fearing the Greeks bearing gifts, which Caminetti might bear in mind just at the present time. If Caminetti makes the run for Congress shrewd political sharps declare that Johnson will have to change his front name to Denis.

In view of the fact that a bill passed a few months ago by Congress instructing the Secretary of the Treasury to coin the silver seigniorage was vetoed by the President, it is interesting to note the present mint activity in the coinage of the seigniorage and also the principal. Mint Director Preston, discoursing on the 423,000 standard silver dollars minted in July, says that the bullion from which these dollars were coined was acquired under the act of July 14, 1890, which is the only bullion he'd by the Treasury available for the coinage of silver dollars. The cost of the bullion contained in these dollars was $285,661.75 showing a gain or seigniorage of $137,338.25 consequently, $285,661.75 will be held for the redemption of treasury notes, and $137,338.25 will be used in the payment of the obligations of the Government and will add to the circulating medium to that extent. A much larger amount was coined last month, and it is understood that the millions of silver on hand will be thus speedily put into circulation.

THE WIND OF THE DEAD MEN'S FEET.

Oh, "wind of the dead men's feet," blow softly.
Disturb not thou their rest.
Why should ye waken them from quiet slumber
Within earth's toil worn breast?

The day will come when, like a mighty ocean
Which rolls from pole to pole,
Resistless thou wilt sweep the nations over,
And then must every soul

Prepare to meet the One, who, following after,
Appeareth in the east,
And wakeneth all men from death's dreamless slumber,
The greatest and the least.

So, "wind of the dead men's feet," blow softly,
Until shall dawn that day
When, strong and terrible, thou wilt give warning
That all things pass away.
—Florence Peacock in London Academy.

Napoleon's Hats.

Careful inquiry has led to the discovery that there are no fewer than nine of Napoleon I's hats still in existence. A writer in The Vie Contemporaine gives a list of them. One is in the possession of Mme. Claitte, whose grandfather, General Girand, picked it up at Marengo. At a critical moment Bonaparte started off at a gallop, and the wind blowing off his hat he did not stop to pick it up.

Another of the hats is in a little crypt beside Napoleon's tomb at the Invalides. This was worn on the 7th, 8th and 9th of February, 1807, at Eilau, and it is the identical one represented in the colossal picture of the battle by Gros, to be seen in the Louvre. During the peace which succeeded the battle Gros was commissioned to paint the picture, and in order that the figure of the emperor might be faithfully depicted the hat was given to the painter.

At the death of Gros in 1835 it was found under a glass case upon a wooden stand, and it was sold by auction among the painter's effects for 2,047 francs 50 centimes to Dr. Delacroix, who presented it to Louis Philippe. The later, after the famous second funeral of Napoleon, ordered it to be placed beside the remains with the emperor's crosses and the sword he wore at Austerlitz. Of the remaining hats one belongs to Prince Victor Napoleon and another to the museum at Gotha.—London News.

Atomic Principles.

A side light is being thrown on the nature of the elements by the chemico-physical discussion between Armstrong and Hartly as to the connection existing in the constitution of certain organic compounds and the colors they exhibit. We may take it as an established fact that a relation exists. And if so, then why may not elements of distinct and characteristic color be considered as complexes analogous to definitely decomposable substances? The two elements, nickel and cobalt, of decided color in their salts and in their metallic plates, add strength to this idea in that they may be considered as exhibiting a sort of isomerism. Their atomic weights are the same within limits of experimental error, and by analogy with compounds identity of atomic weight implies dissimilarity in constitution and therefore definite structure.—Science.

The Ocean Telephone Possible.

Professor Silvanus P. Thompson is one of those who believe that ocean telephony is not only possible, but that the means of attaining it are within our grasp. Telephone cables for the deep sea will, however, require to be made on a different plan from the existing telegraph cables—that is to say, a single conductor of stranded copper insulated and surrounded by an iron sheathing that comes between the outgoing wire and the water which serves as the return part of the circuit. The going and return wires will have to lie side by side within the sheathing. Moreover, the whole circuit will probably have to be broken up into sections which are capable of acting upon each other by mutual induction.—London Globe.

Cause and Effect.

May—Don't you think that Miss Golightly is perfectly charming?

Mamma—It struck me that she was a little bit giddy.

May—Why, mamma, she moves in the best circles.

Mamma—That accounts for it. Moving in circles will make any one giddy. —New York Herald.

A Novel Revenge.

Cook—Yes, my mistress is a prima donna and a horrible creature. She treats me like the dirt beneath her feet, but I revenge myself by opening the drawing room window when she is not at home and by howling with all my might, so that the neighbors may think her voice is cracked.—Fliegende Blatter.

Bound to Be Ladylike.

Ethel—What did you do when Gus proposed to you?

Mabel—I was so surprised I puckered up my mouth to whistle, but then I remembered that would be unladylike, so I hurried and pressed my lips against his to keep myself from whistling.—Good News.

Which is the better, something or nothing? This depends. When it stimulates, it is of use; when it enervates, it is mischievous. The young man who prefers idleness above an unpleasant job, seeing that he has a dollar or two in his pocket, is in danger.

War chariots appeared for the last time during the Persian invasion of Greece. They were abandoned then because the horses got frightened, and running away often threw large bodies of troops into confusion.

It appears from a treasury statement that there are 36,880 $10,000 bills, 14,805 $5,000 bills and 47,324 $1,000 bills in circulation in this country.

The mace used by the speaker of the house of representatives is made of 13 ebony rods twined together and held in place by silver bands.

There are over 6,000 persons fed three times a day at Dolma-Bagtch palace while the sultan of Turkey is there.

ALIAS SUMMONS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE County of Inyo, State of California.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the County of Inyo, State of California and the complaint filed in said County of Inyo in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

Victor Tapier Plaintiff, vs Jaques Jalbert and Manasese Louca, Defendants.

The people of the State of California send greeting to Jaques Jalbert and Manasese Louca, Defendants:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the County of Inyo State of California, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this Inyo County, or, if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain the judgment of this Hon. Court dissolving the partnership heretofore and now existing between yourselves and the Plaintiff, under and by virtue of an agreement made and entered into by you on the 30th day of October, 1893 and that the title to the mines or mining claims described in said agreement may be adjudged need from all the conditions thereof and restore as follows: That the Plaintiff is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "American Flag Mine;" that Defendant Jaques Jalbert is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "French Flag Mine" and that Defendant Manasese Louca is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "Mexican Flag Mine," as said mines are described in said agreement and the complaint on file herein; together with the costs of suit.

Said plaintiff alleges that you have utterly failed, neglected and refused in any manner whatsoever comply with the terms and conditions of said partnership agreement, or to perform any of the duties imposed thereby, since on or about the 27th day of January, 1894; as well more fully appears by reference to the complaint on file herein.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, said plaintiff will apply to Court for the relief demanded in said complaint.

Witness my hand and the Seal of said Superior Court of the County of Inyo State of California this 27th day of June, A. D. 1894.

[SEAL.] D. J. HESSION, Clerk.
P. H. MACK, Attorney for Plaintiff.

COURT NOTES.

Geo. M. Gill, Superior Judge.

THURSDAY, Sept. 6 1894.

Callsen vs. Claussen et al—Filed defendant's demurrer.

Baker & Hamilton's Darling was in town yesterday.

Mr. and Mrs. W. L. Hunter expect to go to Bishop to-morrow.

The Populists will hold their Convention at Big Pine on the 13th.

Charley Anthony of Darwin spent a day or two in town this week.

P. H. Mack Esq. and O. I. Mairs are expected home from Los Angeles next Monday.

Charley Collins has been hauling grain and supplies and getting ready to start up his ditch camp.

There are quite a number of "sporty boys" at Independence just now, attracted no doubt by the coming fair.

Independence will be well decorated fair week. Murphy has made three flagstaffs or various and large decorations.

It is expected that all the Independence delegates to the Democratic Convention at Bishop will attend in person.

Robinson's and Roeper's cattle got down from the White mountains yesterday. Feed is getting very scarce up there.

The close season of quail ended last Saturday. So far there has been little or no shooting done in this vicinity.

P. P. Keough of Bishop spent several days in the lower part of the County this week interviewing the voters and delegates.

Independence will have tomales fair week anyway. A Mexican from Lone Pine is clearing off a lot and getting ready to pitch his tent.

The threshers are busily at work at the Fort under the management of Calloway & Gill. The grain crop this year will be about average.

Andy Dell came down from Bishop yesterday. Mr. Dell is a candidate for Assessor and is interviewing the voters of this section relative thereto.

Painter Nelligan has attached his hooks to the Courthouse roof and is ready to decorate the outside in the same masterly style in which he finished up the interior.

Tate & Naylor will be a new firm in Independence. They are erecting a new saloon adjoining the site of the Gunn saloon and will soon be in running order.

Sportsmen are hereby strictly forbidden to hunt or shoot upon my premises.

Mrs. M. Lewis.
Camp Independence.

W. F. Matlack received a very painful accident last Friday. He was setting a heavy tire and in handling the wheel it fell upon his right foot, bruising it severely.

The examination of Arthur Mateer on a charge of perjury was concluded in Justice Davidsons Court last Monday, and he was held over to appear for trial in the Superior Court.

Members of the Independence base-ball club desire the statement made that if the Bishop boys will deposit a sufficient amount for a game Fair week it will be promptly covered.

Hon. Cyrus Coleman of Alpine county, who will be the Republican nominee for the 60th Assembly district came down from Big Pine yesterday and went to Lone Pine to-day.

At the M. E. Conference held at Quincy on the 23d of August Rev. S. W. Albone was returned to Independence charge for the ensuing year. Rev. H. J. Wilson was reappointed to Virginia City. The Conference will meet at Winnemucca next year.

No pains or expense will be spared to make the Fair Ball of '94 eclipse all previous events of the kind. The floor is the best and largest in the County. The music will be first-class and various special features will be introduced to add to the pleasure and interest of the occasion.

The Overland Monthly has been placed on the list of publications placed on the list of publications admitted to the libraries in the school districts. This popular periodical has been the leading magazine of the State since 1868 and was awarded the first prize at the Mid-Winter Fair for high character of literature and originality of illustration.

List of Delegates.

At the Democratic Primaries held throughout the County last Saturday the following were elected delegates to the County Convention to be held at Bishop next Tuesday:

Round Valley—James Nevins.

Lincoln—Geo Clarke, Ed. Schober, Jas Summers.

Laws—Frank Shaw, A. J. Walters, Ed. Girard.

Bishop—R W. O'Neal, A. Cohn, W. L. Coates, D. Delaney, Jos. Shelly, G. P. Bourland.

Poleta—George Story.

Cottonwood—Low Payson.

Big Pine—E. Spencer, J D. Shaw, J. McMurray, Robt. Blake.

Fish Springs—D B. Curtis, J. S Broder.

Independence—J. A. Lusk, Wm. Mitchell, H Fehrman, D. Stubblefield, White Smith, Ben. Yandell.

Georges Creek—Jno. Shepherd, Thos. Mills.

Lone Pine—Abe Diaz, Felix Meysan, B. T Hannigan, J. G. Dodge.

Keeler—Jno Fichman, Jno Barnes.

Cerro Gordo—Pat Clinton.

Olancha—El. Walker.

Darwin,—J. A. McKenzie, E. A. Reddy, Jas. Doody.

Modock—B. F. Williams, F. Kennedy.

Panamint—Henry Jackson.

Citrus, J. A. Pfohl

Republican Convent on:

The Republican County Convention met at Big Pine on Tuesday last and nominated candidates for the County offices as follows:

Sheriff, A. M. Given, by acclamation.

Clerk, F. K. Andrews 34, L. A. Eagley 13.

Assessor, P. A. Chalfant 24, W. H. Walker 22.

District Attorney, J. D. Lewis by acclamation.

Treasurer, W. T. Bunney by acclamation.

Supt. Schools, S. W. Austin 24, Mrs. Stevens 15, J. H. Shannon 8.

Coroner, J. J. Woodin by acclamation.

Surveyor, Joseph Seely 35, S. P. McKnight 10.

Supervisor 1st District, Al. Matlick.

Supervisor 3rd District, 1st ballot, A. C. McDonald 5, B. Raine 6, W F Matlack 4. Last ballot, A. C. McDonald 8, B. Raine 7.

The convention decided to indorse Hon. Cyrus Coleman for Assemblyman by a vote of 35 to 8.

James A. Yerington, Nevada's commissioner to the Midwinter Fair, returned this morning from the bay city. Mr. Yerington succeeded yesterday in disposing of Nevada's bunding and settling up the bills against the State, and left everything in apple-pie order. He says there are more moneyed men from the east looking for Pacific Coast investments now than ever before in its history. Reno Gazette

The price of silver is steadily rising. The latest quotation received was 67.

Webb Walker still wears a beaming smile. But he says it is because his face is built that way, not because he feels like it.

John E. Jones Sr. of Round Valley was Chairman of the Republican Convention at Big Pine and F. E. Densmore Esq. Secretary.

The summer of 1894 is over. The weather turned quite cool last night and at daylight this morning the thermometer was decidedly uncomfortable.

At an election held in Milton School District last Saturday the proposed bond levy for the purpose of building a new school house was defeated.

F. E. Densmore Esq. and Bert Raine arrived home last evening. After the convention adjourned they went to Round Valley on legal business.

Jimmy Brown was down from Bishop yesterday. He says there are a large number of flyers at the Bishop track in training for the races here during fair week.

J. C. Miller came down from Big Pine on Wednesday and will remain in town until after the fair. He is tending bar at the "Old Corner" saloon for J. C. Irwin.

On Thursday evening of next week an entertainment will be given at the M. E. Church for the benefit of the library fund. Recitations and vocal selections will be rendered and at the close refreshments will be served. It is a worthy cause and should be well patronized.

UNITED STATES LAND OFFICE
INDEPENDENCE, CALIFORNIA,
August 7, 1894.

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN:

Notice is hereby given that the Southern Pacific Railroad Company has filed in this office a list of the lands situated within the townships described below, and has applied for a patent for said lands; that the list is open to the public for inspection, and a copy thereof, by descriptive subdivisions, has been posted in a convenient place in this office, for the inspection of all persons interested, and the public generally. Within the next sixty days, following the date of this notice, protests, or contests against the claim of the railroad company to any tract or subdivision described in the list, on the ground that the same is more valuable for mineral than agricultural purposes, will be received and noted for report to the General Land Office at Washington, D. Beatrix Randolph.

By JULIAN HAWTHORNE.

The passageway, after the bright sunlight of the street, seemed rather dark. Not knowing which way the numbers ran, he remained for a moment where the elevator left him. Just then a door was opened on the right, a gentleman came out, and advanced along the passage toward him. When about ten paces distant, he stopped, turned back, and departed hastily in the opposite direction. But Bellingham had recognized him; it was Mr. Randolph.

The incident made little impression on him, however. He turned to the left, looking for the number, but finding he was going the wrong way he retraced his steps, and presently found himself standing before the door from which Mr. Randolph had just issued. It bore Mlle. Marana's number. He knocked, and Mme. Bemax opened to him. On his inquiring whether the prima donna were engaged, the lady said she would see. So he walked in, and stood by the window, and in a few minutes Mlle. Marana appeared. She greeted him with such evidently spontaneous pleasure that any slight misgiving he may have felt was immediately dissipated.

"I began to think you were never going to come," she said.

"I'm so much out of the way of making calls that I'm surprised to find myself here. You have a great many callers?"

"Well, a good many come, but I see very few—only old friends. And of course," she added, "as I never was in New York before, that is the same as saying I see hardly any one."

"I met a man lately who knows you, I think—Mr. Randolph."

"Mr. Randolph?" She pronounced the name in a changed tone and blushed.

"Alexander Randolph," he repeated, looking at her.

She dropped her eyes. "I—believe—I have heard his name," she said.

Bellingham said no more; he felt dismayed and bewildered. Undoubtedly there was some unpleasant mystery about this fellow Randolph. "Heard his name," indeed! Had not the man been in her company five minutes ago?

"I saw you at the opera last night," remarked the prima donna, recovering herself. Bellingham merely nodded. "Were you disappointed?" she asked falteringly.

"No, I was like the rest of the audience," he replied in a dry tone.

"You are not like the rest of the audience to me," she said, "ever since the first night I have sung to you. I wouldn't tell you, only—I thought you knew it!"

"I know nothing about you," returned Bellingham roughly.

"You speak as if you didn't care to know anything," she said, holding up her head.

Bellingham controlled his rising temper. A weaker man would have protected himself by irony or sarcasm, but he said exactly what he thought. "I care more about what concerns you," he said, "than about anything else. But I will not look away when I am being deceived. You and this Randolph are both pretending to be strangers to each other. I saw him come out of this room just before I came into it. Do you deny that he was here?"

"He was here," answered she, turning pale.

"There is only one other question. Are you going to marry him?"

This was so unexpected that she laughed. It was a nervous, almost hysterical laugh, it is true, but Bellingham naturally did not understand it. "I am not going to marry Mr. Randolph," said the prima donna, with a heartbroken sense of humor.

"And you will not tell me what your relations are with him?"

"No; they are very peculiar relations," she replied lightly, for she was getting desperate. "You must think what you please—think the worst you can, it makes no difference. I will tell you nothing!"

Bellingham gazed at her fixedly. "I cannot believe that you are a wicked woman," he exclaimed at length. "I don't know how to believe it! Why did you deceive me? I was ready to take it for granted that you were—like other women on the stage. But you made me believe you were pure and innocent. No woman ever acted innocence before as you have done it. You look like innocence incarnate at this moment—at the actual moment you are admitting. What is it you want? I would have asked you to marry me—as soon as I had persuaded myself you loved me. I loved you with all my heart and soul. Did you merely intend to lead me on, and then refuse me, like a common flirt? Or would you have married me and still kept up your relations with—well, I can't talk about it! There is always some motive even in the lightest wickedness, but I can see none in yours—and yours is not light!"

Mlle. Marana was standing erect twisting her lace handkerchief between her hands, her face pale, her eyes wide open, tearless, full of restless light. She never looked at him. It seemed physically impossible for her to do so.

"I have never been spoken to like this," she said, in a faint, panting voice. "Will you leave me, please? Will you leave me?"

Bellingham moved to depart, but he stopped and turned back.

"I have always meant never to be unjust to any human being," said he. "It is possible that the very love I felt for you may have made me unjust to you. If you can tell me that there is nothing disgraceful in this secret of yours—tell me, for God's sake! Are you what you seem or something else?"

"I am not what I seem!" she cried out passionately; and now she looked at him with a blaze of fierceness in her eyes. "You have doubted me, and that is enough. I will never explain—I will never forgive you! If you are a man do not stand there; go out!"

Bellingham was shaken to the bottom of his soul. The voice and manner with which her every word was uttered seemed to contradict the purport of the words themselves. Even yet he could not but believe her innocent. But there was nothing further for him to do or say. He went out.

He descended the stairs slowly and emerged into the street. It was the middle of the day; the avenue was comparatively deserted. A few carriages were taking their occupants home to luncheon. Bellingham stood on the curbstone, looking up and down, and vaguely wondering what he should do next. By and by it struck him that it would not make much difference which way he went. In no place in the world could he find what he had lost. It was nowhere; it had been annihilated. All that had made life delightful was gone from him, and he was left ironically behind. He had never really possessed it, even; it was a mirage—a phantom, which he had tried to grasp, and it had vanished. But the strangest part of the business—almost ludicrous—was that he remained behind, standing here, alive and well, in the sunshine on Fifth avenue!

He sauntered leisurely northward toward the park. Two or three times he passed some one he knew, and returned their greeting with a nod. But all the while he saw that lithe, erect figure, with her pale, lovely face, her eyes bright with pain or anger, her white hands twisting her handkerchief. Could it be that she was depraved, false, heartless? Every stern word he had spoken had been echoed, as it were, by the exquisite sensitiveness of her beauty. If she were false would she not have been true at that last moment, when nothing more was to be gained by deception, when to be sincere was essential to the enjoyment of the triumph her falsehood had gained her.

He reached the park; there was still a vivid greenness in the grass, though the trees were rich with the splendor of autumn. He wandered along the curving paths, feeling no pleasure, but pain, in the quiet beauty that surrounded him. Keeping to the left, where there seemed to be fewer saunterers like himself, he found himself at last near the extreme northern limit. He ascended a little hill, and on its summit, beneath the golden shade of a group of trees, there was a space of leaf strewn turf on which he flung himself down. The rumble of the horse cars on the avenue came faintly to his ears, and now and then the voices of laughter of people passing at a distance; the shadow of passing clouds drifted over him, and ever and anon a golden leaf detached itself from a bough above his head and floated wavering earthward. But no one disturbed him, though he lay there all the afternoon, sometimes with his face buried on his arms, sometimes supporting his head upon his hand. He wondered what she had been doing since they parted. Had she been laughing over his discomfiture and planning fresh enterprises? It was not possible!

The sun went down and the shadows of twilight rose. Bellingham looked toward the east, and saw the disk of the moon mount above the horizon, until the whole round sphere swung aloft, orange against the violet background. The evening was mild and still, but the lethargy which had fallen upon Bellingham began to be dispelled; he became restless and anxious. He could no longer stay where he was; he descended the little hill, crossed over to the avenue, and still going northwestward came to the bank of the Hudson. The bank was high and steep; he clambered down it, and found the remains of a decayed wooden pier jutting out into the water. Upon the end of this he sat down, and the silent current swept and eddied past his feet. The sound of a clock striking somewhere caught his ear. This was the hour for her to arrive at the theatre. A little while longer and she would be upon the stage. Would she look toward his seat, expecting to see him there? No, she would never expect him again! Would she miss him?

More than another hour passed away, and Bellingham sat so still that one might have fancied he was asleep. But he was not asleep—he was thinking, and now his thoughts were becoming clearer and more consecutive than they had heretofore been. The moon had now soared high aloft, and stood silvery bright above the sliding reaches of the river.

All at once Bellingham sprang to his feet. He pulled out his watch; there was yet time. He began hurriedly to climb the bank.

It had been borne in upon him, he knew not how, with a sudden, overwhelming conviction, that she was not guilty, but pure and true; that the mystery was an innocent one, that all would be well, if he could but see her and speak to her. It was possible for him to reach the theatre before she left it, but he must use diligence. He was somewhat faint from lack of nourishment during the day, but he ran on until he came to a station of the elevated railway. He entered a train and was off. His heart was light and hopeful.

The train halted at a station near the rear of the theatre. As he got out he saw that the performance was over, and the audience had dispersed. But she would not have left yet. No; there was her carriage waiting for her at the stage door.

He ran down the iron staircase, but as he reached the bottom he stopped. Mlle. Marana came out of the stage door, leaning upon the arm of a man—of Mr. Randolph. Mrs. Bemax followed, but entered the carriage first. Randolph appeared to exchange a few words with the prima donna; then she turned and put her foot on the carriage step.

But, as if swayed by a sudden and incontrollable impulse, she turned again and threw her arms about Randolph's neck and kissed him again and again. Bellingham saw this, and then he faced about and mounted the iron stairs once more, while a mocking voice in his heart seemed to ask, "Are you satisfied now?"

CHAPTER X.

WHAT CONSEQUENCES ENSUED.

A day or two afterward the architect of the new opera house, discovering that nothing in the way of business required his immediate attention in New York, came to the conclusion that he would do well to go away from it for a while. Since he began to practice his profession he had never had a deliberate vacation. But a man who had just designed and built a new opera house—the best in the world—could afford to take a rest, even were there no other ground for doing so. Bellingham, at all events, packed his trunk and took passage on the Arizona bound for the Old World, and betook himself to an ancient, abandoned, lovely little town on the southern coast of Ireland.

It was one of the loveliest, least known and most secluded retreats in Europe. The gray and ruinous houses were overgrown with soft green moss, the steep and narrow streets were made beautiful with tender rims of grass. The warm breezes brought thither by the Gulf stream gave to December and January the gentle geniality of an English spring. The sparse inhabitants were a far descended race of fishermen, still bearing in their dark complexions and vigorous forms the traces of their handsome Spanish ancestry.

At the inn, in addition to a most engaging landlady and a couple of extremely pretty daughters, Bellingham encountered to his agreeable surprise an American artist, Helwise by name, whom he had known years ago in New York. This lonely man of genius was, it appeared, in the habit of spending the winter months here, transferring to canvas the matchless wealth of color and character which met him at every turn. He was of a grave, kindly, meditative nature, but brimming over in certain moods with wit and philosophy and the fruits of years of penetrating and amused observation of human character and life. Bellingham and he suited each other well and were soon conversing with the frankness and cordiality of a friendship long in abeyance but never forgotten. Bellingham inquired whether there were any other countrymen of theirs in the town.

"It is like the region Irving tells of in 'The Adalantado of the Seven Cities,'" Helwise replied; "it has been lost for ages, and nobody knows were it is except myself. That is, such was the case until about three weeks ago. But last month two mysterious strangers made their appearance, and have betrayed some symptoms of intending to stay. I should have had them expelled, for I consider this place to be my peculiar and inalienable property, had I not found them entertaining as a study, and admirably disposed to keep themselves to themselves. I have never spoken to the lady at all."

"Oh! Husband and wife, are they?"

The door was suddenly opened and in came young Mr. Edwardes.

"Apparently that is just what they are not. No, I don't mean to insinuate—and I don't believe—that they ought to be. I should suppose they might be brother and sister, only they are of different nationalities. The man is evidently an American, and the lady, though she speaks English perfectly well, evidently is not. She is probably four or five years older than he, and has a certain air of experience. She is decidedly handsome, and has what they call distinguished manners; that is, she makes you perceive that they are manners, though very good ones. She has rented that large house on the top of the hill."

"She or they?"

"She. He has his room here, and turns up every night at 10 o'clock. They spend the day together; he is undoubtedly in love with her, and she seems to be anything but indifferent to him. You see it isn't an ordinary affair. Here they are, buried from the world beyond discovery, and they might live as they liked; and yet they—or she at any rate—prefer to conduct themselves in this anomalous fashion. There is some mystery in it, my dear Geoffrey—some deep, dark, inscrutable mystery! They are known respectively as Mr. Edwardes and Mrs. Peters, but I have an idea they call each other something else. One theory of mine about them was that she was a younger sister of his mother; his father, you know, might have married a foreign woman. In that case she would be his aunt and the mystery would be solved; but, as I said before, they are plainly in love, and nephews and aunts neither fall in love nor marry, so far as my experience goes. Come, you are fresh from the States; can you guess?"

"I guess not," said Bellingham; and the conversation took another turn.

Suddenly Helwise, who had been looking toward the southern approach to the terrace on which they were standing, said in a low voice: "There come the mysteries. Now you can judge for yourself."

Bellingham turned his eyes in the direction indicated and saw a man and woman approaching slowly, side by side. They seemed to be conversing intermittently, and as they walked her shoulder occasionally brushed his arm and their glances constantly met. The man seemed to be under 25 years of age; he was tall and active and of rather slender build, and as he approached Bellingham noticed that his features were of a bold and striking cast, with bright and somewhat intolerant eyes. His expression at the present moment was troubled and gloomy. He frequently looked on the ground and struck the pebbles from his path with a stick. He would speak a few sentences at a time, energetically and rapidly; then relapse into a moody silence, responding by a shake of the head or other brief gesture to the discourse of his companion.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

At Winger, in New South Wales, there is a burning mountain. It is 1,820 feet in height and is supposed to be a large coal seam which has, in some unaccountable way, become ignited and has been burning for many years, certainly long before the advent of the white man in his portion of the colony.

A $15,000 PICK UP.

A Well Known Daltonian Makes a Big Haul

FROM THE HONDURAS NATIONAL LOTTERY DRAWING.

Mr. W. H. Pruden, of Dalton, Buys a Ticket for His Wife and Makes a $15,000 Drawing.

Dalton, Ga., June 18.—(Special.)—In a plain, unpretentious one-story brick building, on one of the side streets of Dalton, Ga., Pruden & Lyle, insurance agents, have their office. Mr. Pruden, of the firm, is a remarkable man. He is perhaps fifty years old, with gray mustache and beard, and looks at you with a pair of eyes almost keen enough to read one's soul. He has the reputation of being the best financier in Dalton and has, for a number of years, been alderman and chairman of the finance committee, both of which offices he now holds. He is held in high esteem by all who know him and has never been beaten for an office within the gift of Dalton's citizens. Among other honors conferred upon him, he was, for quite a while, mayor. Many a man who had been less successful in life, if suddenly thrown into possession of one-fifth of the capital prize of the Honduras National Lottery (Louisiana State Lottery) would have informed the whole town of his good luck before night, but not so with W. H. Pruden.

Outside of the cashier of Dalton's bank not a man in town knows that he is $15,000 richer today than he was a month ago. The local papers tried to run down the rumor of a capital prize having been drawn by some one in the town but failed signally.

The Constitution's correspondent, therefore, had small hopes of getting much information when he asked Mr. Pruden if he really had gotten $15,000. He replied:

"No, sir. I did not get it. I wish I had."

"But we have absolute proof that you drew the money from the New Orleans National bank."

"I do not deny that, but I got it for some one else and not myself. I simply acted as agent in the matter."

"Who really drew the money then?"

"I do not care to say."

"Does the party reside in Dalton?"

"That, sir, does not concern you. I wrote the lottery people and told them that I did not want my name used at all. The lottery people know that I got the money and that is sufficient. I do not mind telling you personally about it. I bought for $1 one-fifth of ticket No. 48,617, which drew $15,000, in the May drawing, for my wife, and after it drew the money ($15,000) I collected it for her and she has it now.

"What will your wife do with it?"

"I do not know. I suppose she will invest it in some way, but it is hers and I shall leave that matter entirely to her."

"Has she been buying tickets long?"

"Off and on for perhaps two or three years. I always secured them for her sending the money direct to the company.

"How did she receive the news of her good luck?"

"She was delighted; who wouldn't be?"

Mr. Pruden said he did not consider buying lottery tickets worse than dealing in futures and concluded by saying that the only thing he regretted about the matter was the probable publicity, which, being a very retiring man, he did not relish.—Atlanta (Ga.) Constitution, June 19.

Animals and Rain.

It seems strange that no animal, unless it be the squirrel, seems to build itself a shelter with the express object of keeping off the rain, which they all so much dislike. Monkeys are miserable in wet and could easily build shelters if they had the sense so do so. "As the creatures hop disconsolately along in the rain," writes Mr. Kipling in his "Beast and Man in India," "or crouch on branches, with dripping backs set against the tree trunk as shelter from a driving storm, they have the air of being very sorry for themselves." But even the orang outang, which builds a small platform in the trees on which to sleep at night, never seems to think of a roof, though the Dyaks say that when it is very wet it covers itself with the leaves of the pandanus, a large fern.—London Spectator.

There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease, and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven catarrh to be a constitutional disease and therefore requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from 10 drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials. Address F. J. IMMENSE BELTS.

One of the Marvels of the Midwinter Fair.

One of the marvels at the late Midwinter Fair was the immense energy used to maintain the wonderful machinery in Machinery Hall in motion. After the generation of power this energy was credited to the immense belting which conveyed the power from the engine to the machinery in all parts of the hall. These immense belts were one of the marvels of the show. They were all made of leather, and thousands of people who saw them work could not realize that they were really made of leather.

These belts were made for the fair and secured a special award, which is the highest that could be given. They are known as the Star Brand Dynamo belting and the manufacturer is L. P. Degan, 128 and 130 First street, San Francisco. Mr. Degan also made other belts for Buckingham & Hecht, Baker & Sons and the jute mills at the State penitentiary.

In every place they have been highly praised, but especially at the Midwinter Fair, where the experienced engineers consider them the finest belts they ever used.

THE NURSE'S DELIGHT.

Every experienced nurse knows the value of a remedy which, without being an anodyne, will relieve soreness of the limbs or stiffness of the joints, and enable a patient to sleep quietly and naturally.

Just such a remedy are ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS. Placed on the chest or on the back, if necessary cut into strips and placed over the muscles of the limbs, they work marvels in the way of soothing and quieting restlessness. Being perfectly simple and harmless in their composition, they can be used freely, and many a sufferer has thanked them for a night of quiet rest, grateful both to him and those who care for him.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS do not weaken the bowels.

When woman gets the right to vote
From Maine to Mexico's border,
Then jokes about the father-in-law,

BRACE THE NERVES.

Sedatives and opiates won't do it. These nervines do not make the nerves strong, and failing to do this fall short of producing the essential of their quietude—vigor. And while in extreme cases—and these only—of nervous irritation such drugs may be advisable, their frequent use is highly prejudicial to the delicate organisms upon which they act, and in order to renew their quieting effect increased and dangerous doses eventually become necessary. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is an efficient substitute for such pernicious drugs. It quiets the nerves by bracing, toning, strengthening them. The connection between weakness of the nervous system and that of the organs of digestion is a strong and sympathetic link. The Bitters, by imparting a healthful impulse to the digestive and assimilating functions, promotes throughout the whole system a vigor in which the nerves come in for a large share. Use the Bitters in malaria, constipation, bilious and kidney trouble.

REINCARNATION.

Her lustrous eyes, with their southern heat,
Look indifference into mine,
And my pulses race with a fierce beat
'Neath her maddening smile divine!

An icy chill in her sphinxlike glance
Seals forever my hopeless woe.
I my future staked on a loser's chance,
And her only word was "No!"

In some other world, in an age outgrown—
Say a million of years ago—
We two must have loved as I now, alone,
While I never then told her so!

—Clarence Miles Boutelle in Godey's.

AN AFTERNOON CALL.

My mother's illness had kept us home for months, but she was better and beginning again to take interest in magazines and newspapers. In one of the latter she discovered this item:

"Miss Marian Ross arrived Saturday from Sparkling Springs, Va. She leaves next week for Bar Harbor and other gay centers."

"Go over and call," said my mother; "perhaps she will give you a whiff of the ocean."

Before I could demur she had rung for George to bring around the cart and ordered me out of the house.

I chose a short cut to Ross hill, a country road bordered breast high with blackberry and elder bushes. There was much up hill and down dale work and many a loose stone over which to stumble, but the pony was fresh, trees shaded the road, wild grapevines waved their sprays in our faces, and an occasional breeze wafted us the fragrance of the elder blossoms.

Crossing a bridge and looking down through the tree tops to the creek far below I could see the cattle drinking—velvet skinned Alderneys, whose graceful limbs showed pedigree in every line. Skirting the base of Rose hill we turned into the avenue and climbed toward the gates, which formed a crescent and swung from huge stone pillars almost hidden by woodbine.

The gates barred entrance to the driveway; otherwise the place was not inclosed by wall or hedge—the great green hill stretched away in its beauty for every one to see. A rustic seat was placed hospitably on the boulevard that even a stranger might tarry and enjoy the view far away over the hill and valley to that line of misty blue which marks the end of vision. On my way to the house I espied a hammock under the willow trees down by the spring. Surely a white dress was fluttering from it. Bidding pony stand I ran down the hill, to be received literally with open arms.

"My dear Harriet, how did you divine that I was longing for you? But I did not like to add myself to your burdens. I am so depressing."

"Oh, but my mother is better, and besides I am always glad to see you."

"I am so tired of myself that I feel as if every one else must be tired of me too. I was even grateful to my horse for seeming glad to welcome me home. We are no match for dumb brutes in affection. We chatter away all our best qualities, our affection and earnestness, and—that reminds me, you were not at church yesterday. I was. I sat in the pew between the two doors, where the breeze could fan me and the green trees look in at me (there were very few other spectators).

"The yellow windows were framed by the shadow of the ivy on the outside, and the choir boys sang like birds. The sermon was so good—all about—oh, I forget what it was about, except that he said the word translated 'good' means earnest—to be good is to be earnest. I was afraid before that I never could be good, but now I am in despair. I never realized how frivolous I was until Maud married. She was always serious enough for both of us."

We were sitting in the hammock, which vibrated slowly, encouraged by an occasional touch of her white slippered foot on the turf. Before us the spring trickled from the earth and ran away a tiny thread of silver, just water enough to keep the pebbles glistening and to give drink to the ferns which leaned over it. I congratulated Marian on the luxuriance of the green fronds, knowing that the sisters were fond of them, as they had been gathering them for years on their travels, and each fern had its pleasant reminiscences.

"Now," said Marian, "there is an instance of how serious Maud is. It would break her heart to know that she had half the associations attached to the wrong ferns, but it only makes me laugh when she hangs the California story on a fern I know we brought from the Virginia mountains, or when she tells how she dug that one in an old churchyard in Morristown, N. J., near Washington's headquarters, when Aunt Letty herself identified it as one she sent us from Illinois, from the banks of the Sangamon.

"Didn't Lincoln wade or fish or something in the Sangamon? Yet I believe Maud is happier than I am; at least I am sure there is something lacking in me now that she is married. After one has owned a sister so long it is hard to have some man with no claim at all come and carry her off. Whatever she has had I have always had, until now she has a husband and I have none—not that I want one, but she might have waited.

"Since we were little girls we had planned that if ever there was a wedding in the house it should be a double one, but when I reminded her she laughed at the idea, said waiting for me was hopeless; that such an indecisive person as I wouldn't know my fate when I saw him. Then I couldn't help saying that if my fate expected me to recognize him he would certainly have to be handsomer than her Henry. Of course there was a quarrel, and after that I dared not suspect even in my own mind that Henry was not an Apollo, and if I was exhausted in preparing for the wedding I was afraid to heave a sigh.

"I just fastened a smile on my face and kept it there till all was over. When I took it off after they were gone papa said I looked like a ghost in my own house. He offered to take me somewhere, but I know pleasure resorts are places of martyrdom to him. His idea of recreation is to go fishing with a lot of men and dress like an aborigine. So I told him if he could persuade Miss Brown to be my chaperon she and I would cut a swath. Of course she couldn't leave her sister and the children, but I whirled her off before she had time to resign herself to stay at home.

"When we left we were absolutely lifeless—she with overwork, I with ennui. We went south to the gulf. We were quite too listless to think. If some one would plan out a day, even an hour, for us, we were happy. One of us would say to the other:

"'What are you going to do?'

"'I haven't decided. What will you do?'

"'I haven't made up my mind.'

"'I believe I'll walk on the pier and wait for an idea.'

"'Oh, then, so will I.'

"There were men about too. One—perhaps forty years old—took a fancy to me. They teased me about him, and I hadn't even ambition to retaliate—just let them tease. At first I had a mild intention of transferring him to Miss Brown (they would have made a nice match), but it proved too much trouble. He would do anything for me and nothing for her, and we needed some man to devise amusement and do the talking for us. He tried to make us promise to return some time, although we hadn't spoken of going. He persisted in trying to make us promise, and we were too inert to oppose him. So one day when he was out in a boat we stepped on board a steamboat and went up to North Carolina.

"Beautiful country! Oh, the flowers on the North Carolina hills! I began to appreciate the scenery, and Miss Brown became so sprightly she alarmed me. I told her if she couldn't help growing younger so fast I should have to send home for an older chaperon. Then we drifted about to other places—Sparkling Springs last and longest. We staid at a private hotel—fine old southern house in perfect preservation—magnolias and cape jasmine and pickaninnies. While I think of it let me warn you if you ever go south be careful. You will think every man you meet is in love with you—they are all so devoted.

"There was one man at our hotel. When I say a man I mean one who takes your breath away. There were plenty of apologies for men and several women worth looking at. There was a young widow with a pensive air and a repertory of touching allusions to her dear husband, which were very fetching. She had more men about her than any woman in the house; in fact, she could command all of them except the one I spoke of.

"When I arrived he was dancing a good natured attendance on a young matron unhappily married and exceedingly pretty, infantile type, theatrical tendency to pose. She had wrapped herself about him like a vine and gave him daily bulletins of her troubles. Just think of it! How can a woman? And what did that man do but come and repeat all her confidences to me!

"'Do not tell me,' I would beg. 'I do not care to hear her private affairs.'

"'Neither do I,' he would laugh. 'I think you might share the burden of woe which she thrusts upon me.'

"After I came perhaps he neglected her or broke some of the tendrils she had fastened upon him. It was only natural that he should show me about a little, all the other men being occupied with the widow. He was merely trying to keep me from stagnation, I'm sure. It was absurd for her to grow jealous, but she did, and she a married woman! Visibly jealous! Perfectly preposterous, especially when there was nothing between us. Were only amusing each other; only passing away the time—the days were so long and delightful."

As she spoke she kept nervously twisting a ring which I had never before noticed on her hand.

"When did you get that?" I asked.

"Oh, he gave it to me," smiling.

"So you are engaged. Please tell me what he is like?"

"You shall see for yourself. He said he would come on this winter."

"Then there will be another wedding at Rose Hill?"

"What do you mean?' with arching brows and surprised eyes. "I do not expect him—he said so; that was all."

"You mean that you do not care for him to come?"

To this she would make no reply, only looked at me in a mocking way, and I rose to go. We climbed the hill arm in arm, and I jumped into the cart and was about to touch the pony with the whip when she leaned over, placed her hand on the back of the seat and whispered:

"All that talk about Father Time is a mistake. They ought to say Mother Time. I always knew Time was a woman because—time—will—tell."

She picked up her skirts with one hand, threw me a kiss with the other and ran into the house. My eyes and thoughts followed her until a tug at the reins apprised me that pony had started for home on his own accord, delicately intimating that an afternoon call should end before evening.—Chicago News.

Intelligible Price Marks.

Very few stores now adhere to the old plan of cipher marking. Experience has proved that a majority of customers prefer goods to be marked in plain figures, no one liking the idea of two sets of figures unless he is sure he is among the favored ones who get the benefit of the lower scale. It is said to be the practice with the medical fraternity of some towns to grade their charges to patients according to the style of house in which they live, and the same idea prevails so much as to retail stores that ladies have been known to send servants down to stores because they could get a larger discount.

Other ladies are careful never to dress very well when shopping, and this shows how firmly the impression prevails that a genuine one price store is a novelty. The easiest way to get over this impression is to have every article marked in plain figures, so that the customer may see that one price prevails for all.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

SMALL REPUBLICS

Countries With a Limited Area and Very Few Inhabitants.

THEY ARE VERY SELDOM HEARD OF.

Simple Democratic Forms of Government That Have Worked Well for Ages—Many Interesting Features.

San Marino is an Italian republic, situated in the eastern spurs of the Apennines, and occupying an area of about 33 square miles. An interesting feature of San Marino is that by an act of the great council no printing press is allowed within its limits, and any matter printed in the country is liable to confiscation and the publisher to be sent to prison. It is the only country on the face of the globe with such a law. The inhabitants number about 5,900, and their cheese and wine are probably known to many newspaper readers. The city of San Marino can be reached from Pisano-Urbino by a good carriage road and would well repay any one for the visit. It numbers about 1,700 inhabitants and is a quaint old place, having changed little, if any, since the time of Columbus. It preserves all of its old customs intact, and the dress of the people even is the same as it was three centuries ago. It can truthfully be said that this is one spot upon which the busy, modern world has not intruded itself. The streets are steep and narrow, and the houses tall and gloomy, built of undressed stone, but decidedly picturesque in appearance for all that. In the principal square of the city, called Pranello, stands a magnificent white marble statue of liberty, presented to the city by the Duchess of Acquania in 1874. In the city of San Marino no business of any kind is allowed to be carried on, and all of the shops are to be found at Borgo di San Marino, a busy village about two miles away.

The republic is governed by a great council of 60 members who are elected for life. From this body is elected a council of 12, who decide in the third and last resort. The executive department is represented by two captains regent, one elected by the people and the other appointed from the nobility by the council of 12. They have a cabinet consisting of a home secretary, a minister of foreign affairs and a chancellor of the exchequer. An army of 950 men is maintained, who, however, are mostly employed on police duty. San Marino dates its existence as a community from 885, and its independence as a republic from 1631. Napoleon III protected it from papal interference in 1861, and at the unification of Italy it was allowed to retain its independence, through the efforts of one Cebrario. Andorre, or Andorra, as it is commonly called, is another European republic, a trifle larger in point of population than San Marino, and nearly six times as large in area. It is situated in an almost inaccessible valley of the eastern Pyrenees, between the French department of Ariege and Caladorra, in Spain. The country is crossed by the river Bolira, which affords an entrance from France, the only other entrance being a precipitous mule path from Spain. The Andorrians are a fine, robust people, whose principal occupation consists of fruit culture and mining, the mountains surrounding Andorre containing some of the finest iron and lead deposits in the world. Andorra, the capital of the republic, is situated on the river Balua and contains about 2,200 inhabitants. It was formerly a quaint old city, but the progressive inhabitants in their desire to keep pace with the balance of the world have torn down many of its old buildings, and the town as well as the country is rapidly losing its individuality. The republic is governed by a sovereign council of 24 members chosen by the people, and the council elects one of its members to be syndic for life, who exercises the chief executive power. While Andorre collects its own taxes and elects its own officers, France maintains a sort of protectorate over the country and insists on the payment of 960 francs annually for the free importation of corn into the country, a product the Andorrians cannot raise and are forced to import from France. The French government also has the right to appoint one of the two supreme judges, and in all civil cases the right of appeal to the court of cassation at Paris is given. This is the limit of France's power over Andorre. Andorre maintains a standing army of 1,100 men and has been a free state since 849.

Another republic of diminutive proportions is that of Mausuet, which lies between Vernius, Belgium, and Aix-la-Chapelle. There is only a very little of this most charming country. The land measures but four square miles, and the proud nation which inhabits it numbers only 3,000 souls; but such as it is the republic exists free and independent, under the rule of its people, and enjoys the protection of Germany. It has existed an independent state since 1688. It is governed by a president and a council consisting of five members, who are elected every three years, the president being eligible to but two terms. The national army consists of three soldiers, who, in the piping times of peace, also act in the capacity of policemen. The capital is the town of Mausuet, which has about 1,600 inhabitants, and in which a handsome government building was erected in 1833 at considerable cost.

Pitcairn island, in the Pacific ocean, claims to be a free and independent country, but its independence has been recognized by none of the world's nations.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Rapid Writing.

Three reporters who had met were boasting of their shorthand writing. "Whenever I am reporting a meeting on a warm evening, all the people try to get near to my table." "Why do they?" asked the others. "Because my hand goes so fast that it creates a current of air like a fan." "A mere nothing," said No. 2. "I always have to report on wet paper, or else the current of air caused by the moving of my hand would blow it away. Besides, the paper has to be wetted every few minutes, because the friction caused by the rapid movement of my arm dries it in no time." "Pooh," remarked the third, "I once saw a flash of lightning begin to cross my notebook from the left hand side just as I commenced a line, and my pen got to the other side before it."—Pitman's Shorthand Weekly.

That's It.

Mr. and Mrs. Shortley were discussing with considerable vigor something Mr. S. should have done or should do, but lacked the courage.

"Why don't you do it then?" she urged.

"Well," he argued, "I did try to. I've a half a mind"—

"Yes," she interrupted, "that's just it, and that's all you've got," and Mr. S. went forth with angry determination.—Detroit Free Press.

GIRLS AND HIGHWAYMEN.

How the Young Women of Chicago Act in the Presence of Robbers.

The small girl is in hard luck just now. Every place she turns somebody is ready to hurl some horrible tale about robbers and masked highwaymen at her. It doesn't make her feel very happy either. She runs over to a neighbor's house for the one purpose of getting away from Brother Ned and his dreadful stories, but her little heart droppeth down to the soles of her shoes when she gets there, for the whole family, with staring eyes and wide open mouths, are listening to the slow and sonorous voice of their venerable grandparent. He is right in the middle of a newspaper article dealing with the latest suburban murderer, whose chief business in life appears to be gathering up loose change from passing pedestrians.

It is simply awful, and there is scarcely a girl in this beautiful city of Lake Michigan breezes that hasn't pictured herself as being robbed.

One young woman says that during the robbing process she would be very calm—oh, so calm, just like a beautiful morning in June. If a bold man should march up and demand her pocketbook the brave maiden would remark with all the nonchalance imaginable, "Why, certainly, my good fellow; you are welcome to it, I'm sure." Then she would dive into the voluminous depths of her jacket pocket and haul out a well worn wallet, carried for that especial purpose.

No doubt this well planned scheme would work beautifully, but when the girl had cause to display her ingenious idea she forgot all about the calm part, and just yelled, "Mamma! M-a-a M-a-a-a!" and raced off. That wasn't a bad plan at all. The extensive test of that girl's lung power filled the highwayman's heart with fear and trembling, and the probabilities are that he has reformed and started into a safer occupation.

There is another girl who is celebrated for her honesty, and the most casual allusion to a robber makes her hair stand on end. Her plan is to deliver all valuables with as little loss of time as is possible and accompany the deal with trembling hands and chattering teeth. Why the trembling hands and chattering teeth are essential to the transfer of property she fails to explain.

When a horrid old highwayman yells, "Your money or your life!" at her she'll just say: "Here's my purse; there's $1.17 in it. Here's my watch. I haven't any rings—left them on the washstand at home. That's all I've got. Go away! Go away!" And if he still lingers, in the hope of getting more plunder, she would scream for a policeman, and of course the blue coated officer would land on the scene at once and take the offender off to jail. She might yell, "Police!" in the first place, but it would upset her plans, and that wouldn't do at all.

Another girl declared that she would depend on running to save her riches, but one evening as the shadows were stealing softly down upon the busy world and the fleet footed young woman was trotting along, peeping behind trees and into gloomy doorways, a burly colored gentleman suddenly appeared ahead of her. Somehow or other she didn't think about running just then, and as she was about to pass her new brunette neighbor grabbed hold of one of her arms with all the assurance of a street car conductor and quietly if not elegantly remarked, "See here, honey, I want yer mun; see?" She saw, tightened her hold on that little leather purse and tried to yell. The yell failed to materialize and amounted to nothing more than a little feeble "O-o-oh!" that wouldn't really awaken a drowsy sparrow.

The maid and the villain became involved in a beautiful melodramatic scrap, and, strange to relate, the man got the worst of it. His fair opponent succeeded in jabbing about two inches of hatpin into one of his arms, which made his colored highness howl and loosen his grasp. Then the girl escaped and ran for dear life. She had to buy another hatpin, to be sure, but she still has her pocketbook, and is now posing as one of the bravest girls on record. Major McClaughry might make a police woman out of her.—Chicago News Record.

Roast Turkey Without Stuffing.

There is not the slightest doubt but the stuffing of poultry ruins the flavor and makes a good dinner hard to digest. Speaking of stuffing, I always think of a question asked me at a lecture, where I was trying to convert my audience to the above fact. "Why, how do you keep the turkey from caving in?" They will not, of course, "cave in," as the stuffing does not in the least hold the carcass in shape. Truss the turkey and roast it just as you would ordinarily, and behold the difference in flavor. You will never stuff poultry again. After it is in good shape dust with pepper and put a goodly quantity of melted butter over its breast. Run it into a hot oven and after thirty minutes cool down the fire. Roast without water, simply basting with the melted butter and the fat in the pan, for twenty minutes to each pound of turkey. Do not count the first half hour. Salt when nearly done.—Table Talk.

A Made Over Gown.

A bright girl, with more of a deposit in her head than at her banker's, has made herself a fascinating fall costume out of a last year's gown. The skirt of the gown, which was of dark wool, she cut and fitted over to the desired shape. It was a dull, reddish, rough stuff, and with a little quilling of velvet doubled together and plaited she finished the edge. Then a black velvet coat, relic of finery, was made to do duty as a little jacket, cut shorter than the Eton model, slashed up the back to the neck and edged all around with a finish of jet. The top of her skirt she edged about with a double bias fold of velvet, fitted neatly, and less than two inches wide when all finished, and this she hooked over a full waist of the gray green and blue tartan wool, checked off with a thread of scarlet in silk.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

GRAPE GROWING.

There are Thousands of Baskets of Fruit Shipped Each Year.

CHAUTAUQUA COUNTY'S GRAPE BELT

Growth of Industry and its Satisfactory Profits—A French Nobleman's Prophetic Forecast.

About fifty years ago, as the story is told by some of Chautauqua's older residents, a young French nobleman on a visit to America happened in the region of Chautauqua county. He became infatuated with the waters of Lake Erie, the beautiful hills that slope gently toward it from the receding country, and over which breezes saturated with the fragrance of Chautauqua's vegetation and imbibed with the purities of Chautauqua lake gently pass. He claimed that this region was especially adapted for the raising of grapes, and prophesied that in the future it would be notable for that industry. At the time this statement was made it was not generally supposed that it would be demonstrated as it has been in the last ten or fifteen years, but that it would pass on and take its place among the scores of other prophetic remarks that had been made relative to the same subject.

The Chautauqua grape belt, as it has long been known, is a strip of territory that extends along the shores of Lake Erie for about fifty miles, averaging in width from two to four miles. It has long been known as a fine fruit growing country, owing to the peculiar climatic and other natural advantages that it enjoys. It is constantly under the vigil of Lake Erie and under the protection of the hills that overlook it.

The broad, shallow basin of Lake Erie retains the heat that is collected during the long, hot summer until late in the fall, and the breezes that issue from it continually are moistened with its warmth, thereby preventing the frosts of early fall that have already killed the vegetation over the hills from depositing their destructive influence on the grape crop and allowing the vines to ripen their sweet juices. They also prevent fogs and many other detrimental influences that are injurious to the fruit where still, damp days are prevalent. It is to this peculiarity that the grape industry owes its success. In the spring also the lake, with its crust of ice, distributes its cold breezes on the vines, and this retards the opening of the buds until all danger of frost is past. The soil also is another important factor in the successful growing of grapes.

The inhabitants of this belt were for a long time in ignorance of the superior facilities with which they were supplied. Small fields of grapes were set out, but owing to the absence of good care and sufficient attention they failed to reward the owners for their toil, and therefore they uprooted their vines and raised something that was more profitable and for which they could find a more ready market. There were among this number, however, some that were more persistent, and it is to these that the idea of grape growing in this locality owes its origin. They tried repeatedly to produce them, invented methods of cultivation, devoted time and attention to it, and their efforts were ultimately crowned with success. Their grapes began to be in demand, not only locally, but in all parts of the country.

At the present time there are about 16,000 acres of vineyards in bearing in this county, and between 4,000 and 5,000 more planted and growing. This immense increase in acreage is owing to the confidence that is placed in the product. three years' crop will entirely pay for the vineyard, including labor and land, and there is never a year when a vineyard of Concords will not yield a profitable crop. It is sincerely advanced by many men engaged in this industry that in the future every available piece of property in the grape region, except just sufficient to provide crops for the subsistence of the people, will be devoted to the culture of grapes, and that the whole line of vision from northeast to Silver Creek on any of the various railroads will be an almost unbroken expanse of vineyards, stretching out from the hills that border on Chautauqua lake to the blue waters of Lake Erie.

The larger number of vineyards consist of from five to ten acres, and are maintained more for the purpose of personal luxury and amusement than for financial results. Next to these are vineyards consisting of from twenty-five to thirty-five acres. On these whole families find occupation and if properly cared for they will yield an income of from $1,200 to $1,800 annually. Above these are several vineyards of from fifty to 100 acres, the largest two in the county being those of R. J. Quale, of Silver Creek, and the Hanover Grape company. They consist of 110 and 106 acres respectively. They are about a mile from Silver Creek and are within a short distance of each other. They present a beautiful spectacle with their long, straight rows stretching out for a mile on each side of the road, and one that cannot be realized by persons who have never seen it.

The time required for a vineyard to bear is three years, at the end of which time, if it has not been neglected, it will yield a fair amount of fruit; it increases until the seventh year, when, if it has been properly pruned and cultivated, it is said to be in full bearing. It is then in condition to bear, varying slightly with age, for fifty years. Thus it will be seen that there is no crop which responds more generously to the good care and careful attention of the farmer than the grape.—Cor. New York Times.

Only a Few of Them Left.

The sloop Wasp, now receiving repairs on Morgan's ways at New London, Conn., is probably one of the oldest boats afloat. In 1812 she gained a decisive victory over the British brig Frolic, and later in the war she captured the sloop-of-war Reindeer. There is some talk of exhibiting the Wasp at the World's fair.

The Scientific Method in Politics.

True intellectual manhood has not been attained until men have learned to trust nature, to test all opinions and schemes by the touchstone of natural law, and as a necessary result to despise swaddling clothes and leading strings and all the paraphernalia of creeping childhood or timorous imbecility. We see before us, as we believe, a prospect of manhood for the American people—such a manhood as they have never before attained to—one of the chief signs of which will be a proud confidence in themselves, and in connection and through harmony therewith a noble and generous bearing toward all other nations.

Heretofore men politically prominent among ourselves have not been ashamed to suggest that the best policy for us was the one that wrought most evil to other countries, and have thus fed and stimulated all that was meanest and most malignant in the minds of those whom they addressed. There has thus been cultivated among a people which ought, from its advantages of position, to be the most cosmopolitan and broadly philanthropic of all nations a tone of feeling more petty and parochial than could perhaps be found in any other community of the modern world. The mark has, however, been overshot, and the better feeling and better sense of the American people are now, we may trust, about to assert themselves.—Popular Science Monthly.

Periodates as a Cure for Cholera.

The experiments now being made with crystals of periodate and periodate of iron for the treatment of cholera cases in the barracks of Hamburg have resulted in a remarkable falling off in the death rate at those barracks as compared with other hospitals in that city. Dr. Weaver, who was the first to use the periodates, claims that this method is simply an application of the principles of sanitation to the body, and that it is at once preventive and curative as a system of physical disinfection and cleansing. The periodate appears to kill the disease germs instantly, yet it is perfectly harmless to the human system, even when introduced in large quantities.

The periodate of iron has been used in cases in which an unusually strong nerve or heart stimulant has been deemed necessary, or for severe neuralgic symptoms. The powdered crystals have been used to disinfect the alimentary canal and as a water solution to wash out the stomach in cases of severe vomiting. They have been employed also for transfusions under the skin or into a vein in order to restore suspended circulation of the blood. In a case of collapse the patient has been given drafts of periodate sufficient to restore the pulse and cause the heart beats to return.—London Times.

Negroes in Washington.

There are 2,394 negroes employed in Washington by the government, and they draw from the treasury in salaries about $2,000,000 a year. Naturally the defeat of the Republican party was a severe blow to them, for, being Republicans themselves, they expect to be removed by the Cleveland administration in so far as they are not protected by the civil service rules. A large number of them, however, may be happily disappointed, although men like ex-Senator Bruce, who receives $18,000 a year as recorder of deeds in the District of Columbia, are very likely to be accelerated into private life.

In all there are between 75,000 and 80,000 negroes who live at the national capital, and their accumulation of wealth is now very large. Among them, too, are many of the best educated young men of the race, who ought to be scattered among their people in the south helping to elevate the general condition of the negroes.—Springfield Republican.

To Look for Symmes' Hole.

In response to an advertisement in a Cincinnati newspaper asking for volunteers to leave next June on an arctic expedition Lieutenant W. H. Bradbury, of the Champion City Guards, Springfield, O., received a note from A. Symmes, of Louisville, a relative of the late John Cleves Symmes, of Symmes' hole fame, stating that the expedition would be absent two years. "A vessel," Mr. Symmes says, "will take us to Greenland, and then we are to go in sleds with dogs as far as the snow lasts and then on foot. We go with no other purpose than to follow the wild animals back to Symsonia, whence they come every spring and return every fall. No one has ever followed them to their home, but we will. Where they go we can follow, and a new world is to be found that will immortalize the finders."—Cor. Chicago Times.

Two Passengers on the Ocean.

On a recent trip of the City of Paris a demure little person stitched on some plain sewing the way over. In another part of the ship a quiet gentlemanly young man occupied himself with "Little Dorrit." STRONG VOICES.

Screeching Monkeys of South America are to be Feared.

HOW THEY MAKE LIFE MISERABLE.

The Mycetes Stenton is a Poor Fighter, but His Stentorian Lungs Take the Place of Piercing Teeth.

The strangest of all protective endowments is certainly that of a South American monkey that routs its enemies by the appalling power of its voice. Like most American varieties of our Darwinian cousins, the mycetes stentor is a poor fighter. Its claws are blunt and its teeth are no match for the fangs of the jaguar, but the horrible uproar of its alarm cries protects its assemblies against the raids of the harpy eagle by day and the approach of the prowling giant cats by night.

A moderate degree of business might prove a fatal habit by betraying the whereabouts of the chatterer without troubling the conscience of its pursuers, but no beast of prey likes to have its movements heralded by whoops that wake the echoes for a distance of two English miles, and after the voice of the mycetes was once developed to the pitch that would answer their purpose it was easy to see how the gift could be perpetuated and improved on the principle of natural selection—the most obstreperous individuals flourished and survived their less noisy relatives.

The first explorers of the Orinoco wilderness were not men that could be scared by trifles. They had heard the battleshout of the Moors on the plains of Tunis, and the warwhoop of the Caribs in the mountains of Costa Rica, but when they attempted to explore the forest of Atabapo, in southern Venezuela, they broke up their first night's camp and retreated in the full conviction of having heard the shrieks of los demonios—the voice of satan and a legion of his most ablebodied assistants.

About an hour after sunset the mycetes serenades begin with sounds closely resembling the shuddering groans that terminate the solo of a braying mule. A pause follows, and the braying howls recommence, mingled with screams that become louder and louder, till the camping traveler sits upon his poncho and clutches his ears in despair. Shriller yells pierce the general uproar, perhaps the voice of young vocalists enjoying the triumph of a successful debut. The hollow groans, too, become more unearthly and more many voiced, and after a two hours' concert that has banished sleep for miles around, the performance ends with a few defiant whoops, gradually sinking into a sort of coughing bark, but becomes lower till it dies away with the moan of the night wind.

The prowling cats, too, have probably been banished by that time to a safe distance, and the serenaders indulge in a nap, apt, however, to be broken at any moment by the slightest alarm. A stealthy step in the underbrush, the mere rustle of a moving branch scares the sharp eared sentries. A warning shriek, and pandemonium reigns supreme for another hour.

"The deep groans are bad enough," says the traveler Burmeister, "but not as provoking as the intermittent yells, which indeed take rank above all the irritating sounds one can imagine or describe. They pierce the ear like a brass steam whistle, and their far sounding power is aggravated by a vicious energy of intonation that reminds one of the scream of a petulant child trying to make itself as disagreeable as possible."

A shot blazed away into the thick of the infernal assembly only makes matters worse. The serenaders will scatter, but rally again around a veteran stentor and make up for lost time by screeching like maniacs for the rest of the night.

But the uproar reaches its maximum when two wandering troops meet and indulge in a roaring match. The stoicism of the very brutes gives way on such occasions, and tapirs, jaguars and spider monkeys can be heard grunting out their execrations against the disturbers of the midnight peace.

The vocal apparatus of the mycetes comprises three different air sacks, resembling the bulbous enlargements of certain reeds, and increasing the power of its whoops on the same principle that the sound of the human voice would be intensified by roaring into a hollow shell. Stentor, the Grecian hero, was said to be gifted with a voice equal to that of fifty ordinary men, and audible from one end of the battlefield to the other. But the battles of the ancients were fought at close range, and it may be doubtful if the loudest human voice of modern time would carry a view halloo to a distance of more than 6,000 feet or about 1¼ miles. But the yells of the mycetes can be heard nearly twice that far.

"When the howler concerts were protracted till after sunrise," says the naturalist Salvini, "I have sometimes tried to ascertain how far the noise may be heard. It has taken me an hour or more to thread the forest undergrowth from the time the cry first struck my ear till, guided by its repetition, I stood under the tree where the animals were perched. It would certainly not be overestimating the distance to say two miles. When the sound came across a lagoon, unhindered by trees, a Spanish league (about three miles) would be more like the distance at which the best yells could be heard."

A menagerie owner who should undertake to introduce virtuosos of that species would probably be mobbed on the day of his arrival in a North American town. Nevertheless old males of the very noisiest variety are occasionally found in the wigwams of the Orinoco Indians. Savages in all parts of the world are strangely indifferent to noises, boys in the semibarbarous period of their teens prefer the explosion of a big firecracker to Beethoven's grandest symphony, and the negro chieftains of Senegambia keep parrots for the pleasure of hearing them scream, just as the ancients admired the knife grinder screech of the cicada, but the roars of a full grown mycetes would be too much even for the nerves of a South American cannibal if it did not repay its patrons by its talents for watchdog services.—San Francisco Chronicle.

It Seems Strange.

Will Carleton, the author of "Over the Hills to the Poor House," is at the Auditorium hotel. It seems a strange coincidence that the man who wrote "Home, Sweet Home," never had a home, and the man who wrote "Over the Hills to the Poor House" patronizes the Auditorium.—Chicago Tribune.

Canadian Metaphor.

A member of the Ontario legislature recently advised the government "to insert the pruning knife, no matter whose ox is gored." And another Canadian statesman the other day said that the members of the opposition were a row of extinct volcanoes, from whose mouths not a ray of light came.—New York Tribune.

INYO INDEPENDENT.

Rev. H. Mulholland,
EDITOR & PROPRIETOR.
PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY.

INDEPENDENCE, CAL.

FRIDAY, SEPT. 14.....1894

The following is taken from the Visalia Times, published by Ben. M. Maddox, the Democratic nominee for Secretary of State.

"There seems to be a determination on the part of some one in Washington to consolidate the Independence and Visalia land offices. We suppose the idea is to reduce expenses, but if the scheme is scessful it will be an instance where economy will work a hardship on the people. In an air line it is probably not over ninety miles from Independence to Visalia, but the people there would have to go by way of Los Angeles to reach Visalia to transact land office business if the consolidation is perfected. The top of the Sierra Nevada moutains is the line between Tulare and Inyo counties and Mt. Whitney, the highest point in the United States, stands as a barrier between the two sections. It would be a gross injustice to the counties comprising the Independence land district to compel them to travel 900 miles to reach a land office; and while we are always in favor of doing everything in our power to promote the interests of Visalia, we are not willing to do so at such an expense to the people of Mono and Inyo counties. It would be just about as cheap to go from Bodie to Washington to contest a land claim as it would to come to Visalia, and any one familiar with the geography of California will agree that the proposed consolidation of the land affice is absurd.

Those politicians whose hearts are continually wrung at the contemplation of the woes of others—If one could believe their professions—talk lachrymosely about the "privilege" that the protected monopolists extend to American men and women of working for enough wages to keep them alive. But that is one of the natural developments of the McKinley idea, which is to make the few wealthy so that they may extend "privileges" to those who have been plundered by the protective tariff. The Democratic theory is to give every man an equal opportunity in a land of equal rights—among which rights is that of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness without asking for "privileges" from the managers of trusts and combines—the millionaire caste who have grown "rotten-rich" out of the sweat and sighs of the toiling and plundered masses of the American people.—Expositor.

How can people have confidence in a man who is as reckless as M. M. Estee is in the handling of the official facts relating to the prosperity of the country? The other night in San Jose he said "Two years ago, when Mr. Cleveland was inaugurated, prosperity prevailed, our exports exceeded our imports, etc." The reports of the Treasuery Department show that for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, the greater part of which was under Harrison's administration our imports exceeded our exports by $19,735,738 while the first fiscal year under Cleveland,s administration our exports exceeded our imports by $237,148,396. If the excess of exports over imports is a test of wise management of our affairs, as Mr Estee wou'd have the people believe, the official facts are altogether against him. In any event Mr. Estee's argument convicts him of trying to mislead the people by false statements.

Dan Burns has boiler-plated Estee's opening speech and sent it to his newspapers for publication, but he seems not yet to have had time to edit the Republican platform so as to let the people know just how he proposes to have the Republican party stand on the liquor question. The Prohibitionists and religiously temperance people don't know just what Mr. Burns thinks of the liquor question, and they can't find out.

The attitude of Senator Stewart of Nevada, as a co-respondent in a divorce suit brought by some one of the impecunious wife-peddlers that haunt all our larger cities, is a laughable one. The damages laid against Senator Stewart are $10,000, and he is about 71 years of age. It is not every man, much less every Comstocker, who has $10 000 worth of amorous affection in him on reaching that patriarchal period.

CHANGING PIANISTS.

An Incidental Performance That Proved Interesting.

"As interesting as anything I've seen in this town," said a visitor to the city, "was a change of pianists that I saw in a variety theater. There was a man on the stage singing a song, and the pianist was playing the accompaniment. I happened to see the pianist glancing to the left once, and I looked in that direction myself and saw coming down the aisle a man that I judged must be the relief pianist, and so he was. I imagined that he would sit down for a moment and wait, but, dear me, I was very slow.

"He was approaching the piano at the bass end of the keyboard. When he had almost reached the corner of the piano, the man who was playing began gently sliding off the seat to the right, still playing. By this time the relief was abreast of the bass keys, and these the first player, who was still sliding steadily to the right, now relinquished to him, and then the newcomer, still standing, but also moving steadily to the right, struck in in perfect time and tune.

"There was a brief time, a second or two, when both men were playing—the retiring pianist the treble and the oncoming player the bass—and for a fraction of a second they were both standing. But now the new player is fairly opposite the center of the keyboard. He settles into the seat, and now it is his hand that strikes the treble, and now the whole piano resounds to his resolute touch.

"In fact, there never was a minute when the piano had anything to say about it. There never was a minute when the men were not completely masters of the situation. There never was an instant from the time the relief approached until he was firmly settled in his seat when both men were not continuously in motion, but the change was made without a jar or a slar in the music and without the omission of a note."—New York Sun.

A Royal Book Buyer.

Empress Catherine II of Russia was a great reader and a lover of books. One of her services to letters in Russia was the purchase of the libraries of Voltaire and Diderot. She was a warm friend and admirer of these French philosophers, and their work interested her because she was eager to learn new theories of politics and government. Voltaire's library of about 7,000 volumes is now a part of the Russian imperial library in the Hermitage palace, and in the hall devoted to it is Houdon's statue of Voltaire.

The story of Catherine's purchase of Diderot's library is interesting. It is creditable to her tact and her generosity. Diderot named £15,000 as the price of his library. Catherine II offered him £16,000 and named as a condition of the bargain that her purchase should remain with Diderot until his death. Thus Diderot, without leaving Paris, became Catherine's librarian in his own library. As her librarian he was given a yearly salary of £1,000.

One year this salary was not paid. Then Catherine wrote to her librarian that she could not have him or her library suffer through the negligence of a treasurer's clerk, and that she should send him the sum that she had set aside for the care and increase of her library for 50 years. At the end of that period she would make new arrangements. A check for £25,000 accompanied this letter.—Youth's Companion.

Children's Letters.

A little boy who in the absence of his parents had been sentenced to go to bed early by a relative was seen to be busy with a pencil and paper, after which he carefully buried the communication in a hole in the garden and retired to bed. The missive when disinterred ran as follows:

DEAR MR. DEVIL—Please come and take Aunt Jane. Please be quick. Yours, ROBERT.

It is to be regretted that not a single letter by a Roman or a Greek child survives, the nearest approach being, perhaps, some verses written by a child of 10 in the later empire, which his parents had engraved upon his tomb two years later. The ancients doted on their children. Catullus wrote an ode to his daughter's sparrow, Ovid to his children's parrot, and the Greeks wrote epigrams to their children's toys. They even made offerings of toys to their dead children for playthings in the world of spirits. But no voice of a Greek child comes to us across the gulf of time.—London Spectator.

"The Lost Continent."

Dr. Bowdler Sharpe, the well known ornithologist of the British museum, delivered a lecture at the Savage club on "The Lost Continent." Dr. Sharpe that illustrated the zoo geographical regions of the world, with their peculiar forms of bird life, and explained the occurrence of isolated forms in different portions of the globe by the existence of a former land connection now vanished beneath the sea. The idea of an ancient tropical continent at the south pole uniting South America, Madagascar and Australia is arousing considerable interest and discussion in scientific circles at the present time, chiefly owing to the support which it has received from the recent discoveries in the Chatham islands of Mr. H. O. Forbes, the well known Malayan traveler. The lecturer in conclusion dealt with some problems of the geographical distribution of birds for which no reasonable solution has yet been offered.—St. James Gazette.

Sweetheart Abbey.

There is in Galloway, Scotland, an ancient ruin known as Sweetheart abbey. Within its ivy covered, storm battered walls lies buried the affectionate and devoted Dervorgill, with the heart of her husband, John Baliol, embalmed upon her breast. Lovely in their lives, in death they are not divided. The crumbling masonry is still and must ever be a romance in its symbols of death and decay, telling every day, as it has for 600 years, the thrilling story of a woman's tender love and devotion.

ALIAS SUMMONS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE County of Inyo, State of California.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the County of Inyo, State of California, and the complaint filed in said County of Inyo in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

Victor Tapier Plaintiff, vs Jaques Jalbeque and Manasese Louca, Defendants:

The people of the State of California send greeting to Jaques Jalbeque and Manasese Louca, Defendants:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the County of Inyo State of California, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this Inyo County, or, if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The action is brought to obtain the judgment of this Hon. Court dissolving the partnership heretofore and now existing between you selves and the Plaintiff, and—and by virtue of an agreement made and entered into by you on the 30th day of October, 1893 and that the title to the mines or mining claims described in said agreement may be adjudged freed from all the conditions therein and restore as follows: That the Plaintiff is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "American Flag Mine;" that defendant Jaques Jalbeque is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "French Flag Mine" and that Defendant Manasese Louca is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "Mexican Flag Mine," as said mines are described in said agreement and the complaint on file herein; Together with the costs of suit.

Said plaintiff alleges that you have utterly failed, neglected and refused to in any manner whatsoever comply with the term and conditions of said partnership agreement, or to perform any of the duties imposed thereby since on or about the 27th day of January, 1894; as will more fully appear by reference to the complaint on file herein.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, said plaintiff will apply to Court for the relief demanded in said complaint.

Witness my hand and the Seal of said Superior Court of the County of Inyo, State of California, this 27th day of June, A. D. 1894.

[SEAL] D. J. HESSION, Clerk.
P. H. MACK, Attorney for Plaintiff.

Pat Clinton of Cerro Gordo is visiting Independence.

The races for next week all filled but one. See list of entries.

Supervisor Fitzgerald is in town and will remain until after the Fair.

J. C Crocker and Jas. Herod came down from Big Pine yesterday.

Surveyor McKnight was in town for a couple of days early in the week.

J. J. Gunn has received a large tent from San Francisco for use at his ditch camp.

Mrs. F. Rhine arrived home on Wednesday's train from a month's visit to San Francisco.

Horsemen from various parts of the Valley have been gathering at Independence for a week past.

A large number of Bishop people have expressed their intention of attending the Fair next week.

Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Eibeshutz arrived home last Monday from a visit of three weeks at San Francisco.

James McBride and R. W. Scott arrived from Bishop yesterday with their trotters and are located at the track.

Meads & Schober's big team arrived from Mojave on Wednesday on its way to Bishop with ten tons of freight.

The Fair Ball next week will be the most successful affair of the kind ever given at Independence. Tickets can be obtained at all business houses.

Tate & Naylor have their new saloon nearly completed. They open to-morrow evening for business and will be pleased to welcome all their friends.

In the candidates column will bd found the announcement of W. H Walker as candidate for the office of assessor subject to tee will of the people.

This morning the County Clerk drew the names of sixty jurors to appear at Independence on Tuesday, September 25th for the trial of the Hines case.

The annual meeting of the Inyo County Bee Keepers Association will be held at John Baxter's house in Independence on Thursday, Sept. 20 h at 7 o'clock p. m.

To accommodate all intending visitors to the Fair next week the C. & C. R. R. has fixed a rate of $2.50 from Bishop to Independence and return. All other points in the valley have been given similar reduction.

C. H. McGinnis, special agent of the U. S Land Department, arrived at Independence last Monday evening, going to Bishop on Tuesday. At that place he procured a conveyance and started for Mariposa county and the Yosemite.

In this issue will be found the card of Hon. R. Linder, the Republican nominee for State Senator in the 32nd District. Mr. Linder expects to visit this section before election and make himself personally known to the voters.

The Darwin Road Completed.

Supervisor Fitzgerale reports that the new Road from Keeler to Darwin was completed on the 8th inst., and is now is perfect condition for travel and freight. It starts from the dividing line of Districts Nos. 4 and 5, running south-east along the base of the Inyo range to a point one hundred and fifty yards north-west of the old Shepherd Toll House. This road will not be subject to washouts and is a permanent and good highway. The old road has been washed out annually for the past six years, causing the district and County a considerable outlay of money to keep it open for travel. The new road saves in distance one and a half miles and for heavy teams over eight hours in time between Darwin and Keeler. The total cost of the new road was $738, of which amount $375 was subscribed by the property owners of road district No. 5. Mr. Fitzgerald deserves the highest credit for his tireless efforts to complete this work. During the entire time of its construction he personally conducted the work and to his efforts is due the fact of there being sufficient funds raised to pay for it. The 5th road district is by far the largest in the County in respect to mileage while the population is the smallest. Consequently it is only by good management and constant effort that the roads can be kept in good order. And in this Supervisor Fitzgerald is successful.

THE CONVENTION.

The Democratic County convention was called to order in Bulpitt's Hall, Bishop, on Tuesday by E. Robinson Chairman of the County Central Committee. Robt. O'Neal of Bishop was chosen Chairman by acclamation and in a few well chosen words stated the purpose of the meeting. Irv. H. Mulholland of Independence was selected as secretary. The Chair appointed a committee on credentials who reported as follows:

7. Coronor, $5 00
9. Surveyor, $5 00
10. Supervisors.
11. Justice of the Peace.
12. Constables.
13. Delegates to Assembly Convention.

For Sheriff A. L. McGee of Bishop was placed in nomination by D. Olds, seconded by Frank Fitzgerald. W. L Hunter was nominated by John Shepherd, and immediately after the nomination Mr. Hunter in a short manly speech, which received loud applause, withdrew in favor of Mr. McGee who was declared the nominee by acclamation.

For Clerk D. J. Hessian was nominated by Frank Shaw, seconded by B. H. Yandell and this nomination was also made by acclamation.

For Assessor, Frank Fitzgerald named P. P Keough and W. L. Coats named A. J. Dell. Mr. Keough received 22 votes and Mr. Dell 23. Whereupon the latter was declared the unanimous choice of the Convention.

P. W. Forbes was nominated by for District Attorney and upon motion of I. H. Mulholland the choice was made unanimous.

White Smith nominated J. J. Moore for Treasurer, and George Clarke performed the same service for W. L. Zimmerman. Mr. Moore received a majority of votes and was declared the nominee.

H. C. Hampton was nominated for Supt. of Schools by J. D. Shaw, H. H Howell by G. P. Bourland and E. Spencer by R. H. Blake. Mr. Howell received the necessary majority on first ballot and on motion the election was made unanimous.

Jas. Nevins of Round Valley was nominated for Coronor by J. A. Lank and was declared the nominee by acclamation.

Nominations for Surveyor were passed.

At this time the Convention took a recess of half an hour during which time the following township officers were nominated: First Township: Justice of the Peace, W. O. Meroney, George W. Clarke; Constables, Geo. E. Drake, W. E. Smith. Second Township: Justice, S. G. Gregg, Constable R. K. Love. Third Township: Justices, A. N. Davidson, Alex Clark; Constables, J. W. Murphy, William Mitchell. Frank Shaw was nominated for Supervisor in the First District and W. J. Lake in the Third.

After the Convention re-convened the following were selected as a County Central Committee: Round Valley, W. H. Wells; Lincoln, Geo. M. Clark; Laws, Frank Shaw; Cottonwood, L. M. Payson; Poleta, Geo. Storey; Big Pine, R. P. Hessian; Fish Spring, James Jones; Independence, Henry Rhine; Georges Creek, W. L. Hunter; Citrus, Jacob Pfohl; Lone Pine, T. B. Hannigan; Keeler, John Fishman; Cerro Gordo, Pat Clinton; Darwin, J. A. McKenzie; Modock, Frank Fitzgerald; Panamint, Henry Jackson; Olancha, Ed. Walker.

An auditing and executive committee was appointed as follows: Henry Rhine, chairman; J. A. Lank, J. White Smith, Frank Fitzgerald and Irv H. Mulholland, secretary.

On motion Robert O'Neal was elected chairman of a delegation to a joint assembly convention for the 60th District, the other members being Geo. Story, Irv H. Mulholland and John Shepherd.

A vote of thanks was tendered the Chairman and Secretary, three rousing cheers for the candidates and the Convention adjourned sine die.

The comittee thank all those who took part in the entertainment for the Sunday School and so kindly gave provisions and their services to render such a complete success.

Sportsmen are hereby strictly forbidden to hunt or shoot upon my premises.

Inyo Mono and Alpine.

The Index devotes a column this week to the assembly matter and incidentally to puffing Mr. Coleman. At the last Republican State Convention the editor of that paper by his own confession promised Dan Burns and Bill Stow that he would see that the delegates from this county would support Mr Blakely of Kings County for State Senator and that Mr. Coleman would receive the nomination for the assembly. He failed to deliver the goods in the former case. We think it absurd that Alpine County, as a matter of right or justice, should be entitled to as much consideration as Mono or Inyo in the matter of representation, Alpine, with its 70 or 80 voters, about 30 of whom come from the neighborhood of Truckee on election day, is not entitled to have as much to say in the matter of legislation for this district as Mono or Inyo. As to the "unwritten agreement" about alternating, it was unknown and unheard of till Mr. Craig appeared on the scene. If one ever existed it is surely time to do away with it. The voters of Mono and Inyo are not guileless children and do not believe that "with the breaking up of the assembly district the 18 h Agricultural District would have been dissolved;" so long as agricultural districts exist in this State we will have one on this side of the mountains. If Alpine was cut off from Inyo and Mono the appropriation for this district might be reduced. At the last session of the Legislature a bill was introduced by Representative Schroebel of Calaveras to create an agricultural district out of Alpine and Calaveras, and our representative seeing that if the bill passed it would reduce our appropriation, opposed it and Alpine remains in our district. At the last session citizens of Alpine, representing a majority of the voters and taxable property therein sent a petition to the Legislature to disorganize that county. Letters accompanied the petition stating that Alpine County was kept in existence for the benefit of Mr Coleman and other politicians, Mr. Coleman received $500, for his services at Sacramento.

By JULIAN HAWTHORNE.

The latter was a woman whose aspect (if the distinction be permissible) was younger than her looks. Her face and figure were youthful, but her bearing and gestures were mature. Her features were of a clear paleness, regular in outline and of remarkable beauty. Something in her aspect enchained Bellingham's regard; she did not resemble any woman he had seen, and yet she reminded him in some intangible, elusive way of a woman whom he wished to forget. She was different—different at every point; and yet if he turned away and glanced at her from the corner of his eye there was an indescribable likeness. Was it the way she had of slowly lifting her chin? Was it the slope of her shoulders? Was it in the way the soft hair grew on the nape of her white neck? Was it in the smile that lighted her eyes before it touched her lips? It was all of these things—it was none of them! After a minute Bellingham forcibly dismissed the question from his mind. Of what earthly consequence was it?

Here were a good looking woman and an enamored young man, a common sight enough. They seemed to be in love with each other, as Helwise had said; but while the gentleman had evidently lost his head the lady was entirely self possessed. She seemed to be amused superficially at some extravagance or perversity in her companion, but there was an underlying sadness or anxiety perceptible when her face was at rest. She had the air of trying to make him take some step or comprehend something which he refused to do or understand. As they passed the young man glanced for a moment toward Helwise and nodded recognition. The lady did not turn, nor evince consciousness of the presence of any third party. They slowly traversed the length of the terrace and disappeared through the gateway at the farther end.

"She knows how to dress," remarked Bellingham.

"And how to walk," added Helwise. "She must have learned that on the stage."

"An actress, then, you think?"

"Yes; or an opera singer, perhaps. Well, what do you think is the matter?"

"He hasn't money enough, maybe," said Bellingham; "or perhaps she likes him too well to marry him. A woman like that knows that an ounce of imagination is worth a pound of reality—both to her and to him!"

"You have studied women since I knew you last," remarked Helwise with a smile.

"If I have," replied Geoffrey, "they have only taught me to disbelieve the little I ever thought I knew. Come, let us be moving."

That night Bellingham dreamt vividly of Mlle. Marana, and his dream awakened him before dawn in great distress of mind. He imagined that he was walking across the Brooklyn bridge, which on this occasion extended from the roof of the opera house in New York to the parapet of the terrace where he had sat with Helwise that afternoon. The bridge was unfinished, and he was obliged to make the transit on a series of precarious planks irregularly disposed. When midway across the Atlantic, whose angry roar reached his ears from the immeasurable depth beneath, he saw walking before him the figure of a woman, in whom he at once recognized Mlle. Marana. He hastened to overtake her, for she seemed in imminent danger of falling.

Just as he was on the point of reaching her, however, the plank on which he stood gave way, and at the same moment she whom he had meant to save tottered and fell. He closed his eyes for an instant; then he felt his arm seized by some one from behind, and, looking round, he found himself standing on the stage of the opera house, with Marana herself before him in the costume of Marguerite, with a bunch of daisies in her girdle. He heard the applause of the audience, like the roar of the sea, and perceived that the performance was going forward, and that he, instead of being properly attired, was in his every day dress. It came across his mind also that the figure he had mistaken for Marana was Mephistopheles, disguised to mislead him. He looked at Marguerite; her face was deathly pale. She said below her breath, "You did not believe in me; do you know who"— Her voice died away, the lights were suddenly extinguished, and in the silence and darkness Bellingham awoke.

Too much disturbed to sleep again—for the dream, grotesquely extravagant though it was, had seemed absolutely real to him—he got up, lit a pipe, and sat smoking at his window watching the dawn slowly illuminate the eastern sky.

He took an early breakfast and went for a solitary walk along the coast, and from the summit of a lofty headland saw a great ocean steamer pass westward through the gray sea. She was bound for New York. As he watched her diminish and vanish in the distance, till only a faint plume of smoke remained on the far horizon, for the first time since his journey began he was conscious of an urgent longing to return—to return at once. The unfinished question in his dream kept ringing in his ears, it assumed a momentous importance; he must know what it meant. He laughed at his own absurdity, but the longing remained. At last he returned to the inn.

He found Helwise painting in the room he used as a studio; he was in his shirt sleeves, slippers down at the heel were on his feet, and he wore an old straw hat to shade his eyes from the light. He was whistling softly to himself, and would turn his head on one side after putting a touch on the canvas.

"Did you hear any noise last night?" he asked after they had chatted for a while.

"I had a bad dream. What was it?"

"That young fellow who calls himself Edwardes. His room is next to mine. He came in a little later than usual last night, and by and by I fancied I heard him crying. I was debating whether I ought to go in and see what was the matter, when he knocked at my door. He looked badly cut up. I made him sit down and gave him some whisky and a cigarette. He seems to be in a scrape."

"Did he explain the mystery?"

"Well, he talked somewhat. He fell in love with this woman in Moscow. From what he said I judge she is an actress or a singer, as we were saying yesterday. She is a public character of some kind, and has had adventures before this. She took a great fancy to him, so he says, and I believe him. But it seems to have been somewhat as you suggested; she liked him too well to let him have his way. She wouldn't risk a disillusionment; perhaps her heart had never been touched before. She would not marry him, either, for that matter, I suppose the one thing is about the same to her as the other. But she did an odd thing—she offered to suspend her career, whatever it is, and be with him as long as he wished. And she appears to have given up some important pecuniary advantage to do so. He accepted her offer, thinking no doubt that she would capitulate in due time, in the meanwhile taking care that she should lose nothing in the way of money. He represented himself to her as inexhaustibly wealthy, and she took him at his word. But the fact is, after he had spent a hundred thousand or so, and ruined his father and sister, as he tells me, there was no more left. He was ashamed to confess this to her, and it is only within the last few days, when he had got down to his last fifty pound note, that she found it out."

"And now she means to shake him—is that it?" said Bellingham.

"Well, apparently not. She seems to have plenty of money herself, and she has made him a proposition which does her credit. She has proposed to marry him and pay back the money that he has spent on her. I have begun to fall in love with her myself! And I may do it if she'll have me; for Mr. Edwardes' pride, as he calls it, would not allow him to accept her proposal, and hence his misery, which at one time last night assumed quite a suicidal complexion, but I remonstrated with him, and he felt a little better this morning."

While they were sitting there the door was suddenly opened, and in came young Mr. Edwardes himself in a state of great excitement. He had a newspaper in his hand.

"Did you know what was in this paper?" demanded he, striding up to Helwise.

"What one generally finds in a New York Sunday paper two weeks old," returned Helwise, tipping back his hat and looking up at him. "This is Mr. Bellingham, Mr. Edwardes."

The latter looked at the architect, and seemed to hesitate whether or not to proceed, but the emotion by which he was possessed was too much for him; he went on. "It says here," he exclaimed, holding the paper toward Helwise, with his finger on the paragraph, "that—here, read it yourself!"

Helwise took the paper and read: "Mlle. Marana, the great Russian prima donna, who has endeared herself to all New Yorkers during the past season by her charming behavior as well as by her unrivaled musical powers, will next month bring to a close the most successful engagement ever known in this city. Mlle. Marana has lately been in delicate health. To those of thousands of her friends and admirers we add our own cordial hopes that she may return to us next spring with renewed strength and energy. Meanwhile we shall not look upon her like again."

"Is that the paragraph you mean?" asked Helwise, looking up. "What's the trouble with it?"

"Only that there's no such person as Mlle. Marana in New York, nor ever was—that's all!" cried out the young gentleman in a violent tone.

"You're mistaken, sir," put in Bellingham. "I'm personally acquainted with Mlle. Marana, and have heard her sing in New York this season a score of times."

"You heard an impostor, then!" returned the other angrily. "I know what I'm talking about. Good God! don't I know who the Marana is?"

"Keep your coat on, young man," said Helwise with a quiet laugh. "Possibly you are mistaken instead of Mr. Bellingham."

"Well, I beg your pardon, gentlemen," said Edwardes, putting a restraint on himself and speaking in an agitated voice. "If you only knew you would pardon me. But look here, sir—Mr. Bellingham—I'll tell you. I met Mlle. Marana in Moscow last summer. She—well, the truth is, she's the lady who is here with me now. She had an engagement with a fellow named Inigo to sing this season in New York for four thousand dollars a night, and—she gave it up because I asked her. I guess there isn't more than one Marana in this world! There's only one woman alive who could sing anywhere near her, and that's my own sister—whom I ruined and disgraced, by George!" Here, in spite of his struggles to prevent them, tears forced themselves into the young gentleman's eyes, and he sat down and hid his face in his hands. "And now, to think," he cried out, starting up again and walking to and fro in the room, "to think, after all she's done for me, that scoundrel Inigo should trump up an impostor to take her place! By George, I'll bring him to book if I live another fortnight!"

"You are making a singular accusation, Mr. Edwardes," said Bellingham sternly. "Will you vouch for its accuracy?"

"Yes, I will vouch for it, Mr. Bellingham," returned the other, facing him; "and my name is not Edwardes. I've had enough of this humbug. There's my card, sir."

Bellingham took the card. "Edward Randolph," he read and paused. He looked at the young man curiously.

"May I ask your father's name?" he said at length.

"Alexander Randolph," Edward replied.

"A tall man, about fifty-five, with gray mustache and imperial?"

"That's the man. Do you know him?"

"I have met him. You had better go home and look after him," said Bellingham gravely, "and get your Mlle. Marana to go with you."

Bellingham left for Liverpool the same evening, and took passage for New York two days later. Edward Randolph and Mlle. Marana sailed the same day on another steamer, and they all arrived at their destination within ten days afterward.

CHAPTER XI.

WHAT HAPPENED TO HER IN THE MEANWHILE.

"Perhaps it would be pleasanter for you to go out of your own accord."

Hamilton Jocelyn had observed with anxiety the progress of the acquaintance between Bellingham and the prima donna and was casting about in his mind how to put a stop to it, when Bellingham suddenly disappeared. He would have inferred that he must have proposed to mademoiselle and been refused had not the latter's aspect plainly showed that she was suffering quite as much as Bellingham could be supposed to be. Jocelyn's acuteness was not of a fine enough order to enable him to hit upon the real explanation. But the episode also admonished him that it was full time he himself took a leading and a winning hand in the game.

Accordingly Jocelyn insensibly began to draw nearer to the object of his attentions. He talked to her a great deal about her profession, about the prerogatives of genius, and the peculiar privileges permitted to the artistic and especially to the musical temperament. He launched into philosophical speculations about the constitution of society, and demonstrated what a gigantic tyranny the marriage covenant was as at present administered. The time would come, he declared, when we should look back upon such a state of things with wonder mingled with disgust.

Consider the immense number of divorces and scandals that were coming to light in all degrees of the social scale; what were they but the blind and inarticulate protest of the individual against the selfish injustice of the majority? What was the remedy for these abuses? Did it not lie in the hands of the superior persons in the world—of those who could see through the show of things, who were clear headed, and possessed the courage of their convictions? Let them lead the way. Doubtless they would be pursued by the sneers and slanders of fools and bigots; but fools and bigots had ever been the foes of progress and enlightenment. We who take the broader and profounder views can afford to disregard their clamor. We (said Jocelyn, taking the prima donna's hand in his, and stroking it gently) can set them the example of courage and independence, which will sooner or later be followed. It is not merely our privilege, but our duty, and it would be base for us to shrink from it.

The prima donna withdrew her hand as unobtrusively as she could, and asked her mentor what objection there was to marriage if people loved each other? He replied that if they loved each other what was the use of marriage? She rejoined that for two persons to love each other was for them to feel that they must belong to each other forever, and that marriage was simply their open declaration before God and man of the existence of this feeling in their hearts. To make such a declaration was, she conceived, a natural and inevitable impulse, and it was natural and expedient that it should be made according to certain forms, the gradual outcome of tradition and custom. Therefore she thought marriage was not so much an injustice of society to the individual, as a demand made by the individual that society be the witness and a voucher of his covenant.

But Jocelyn hereupon pointed out that a covenant always implied a binding promise, involving penalties if it were broken; that this again implied distrust in the power of pure love to hold its own, and that any outside pressure brought to bear upon a passion essentially so free as love must tend to promote the very reaction and revolt which it professed to guard against. She made answer that the covenant of marriage was not a bondage, and had not that effect upon the parties to it, but that to make one's happiness known to others endowed it with a reality and substance which were else wanting to it. That every person one met tacitly or explicitly confirmed it, reechoed it and assured it, and that the wedded state would consequently lose half its delight and security if it existed, for example, between two persons on a desert island, debarred from ever communicating the fact of their mutual relation to others.

Jocelyn here changed his ground, the better to convey his meaning, and put it to his interlocutor whether a large percentage of marriages were not notoriously unhappy, and this being admitted, whether it were not thereby demonstrated that a great many marriages were a mistake? She answered that even if all marriages which had ever occurred were mistakes, that would not prove that marriage itself was a mistake, but only that the wedded partners had been mistaken in each other. Upon his maintaining that every institution must be judged by its practical application, she rejoined that if there were no such thing as love, there was an end to all argument about it.

HIS GREAT LUCK.

Was Once Poor but Now is Rich.

Constine Koures Invests His Last $5 in the Honduras National Lottery and Secures $4,000 for It—Remarkable and True Story of How a Poor Greek Found a Fortune—Invested His Last Dollar Instead of Buying Food.

"Nothing venture, nothing gain" was the motto Constine Koures adopted when he left Greece to settle in America. By sticking close to his resolution he is to day $4,000 richer than he was last week. The Honduras National Lottery (Louisiana State Lottery) is responsible for Mr Koures' sudden wealth, and there is quite an interesting story connected with his good fortune.

Koures is from the nobility and owing to some difficulty at home he came to America. Here he commenced life as a peddler and soon found himself in Cleveland, Ohio, without a cent in his pocket. He remembered a countryman in Chicago, one of the firm of Manosus, Mazarokos & Co., 141 South Water street.

The only way to reach Chicago was to walk and this Koures did. One of the firm gave him $5 to get something to eat and procure clean clothes. Koures blistered and instead of buying food invested the $5 in five tickets in the Honduras National Lottery.

To day he received by express $4,000, one fifth of the second capital prize of $20,000 in the drawing of June 12. Koures can't talk but little English, but he told a reporter for THE DISPATCH that the $4,000 would be invested in the fruit business. He was highly elated over his good fortune and he said he thought he now had the basis for a large fortune. He declares that he will continue to buy Honduras National Lottery tickets.—Chicago Dispatch, July 16.

Getting at the Facts.

Attorney—You are the president of the Dazzling Sun Gas company, are you not?

Witness—I am.

"Now, sir, for the purpose of getting at the exact facts in this case I am compelled to ask you what it costs the company per thousand feet to manufacture gas."

"That, sir, is a matter of no concern to you and has nothing to do with this case."

"I insist upon knowing."

"I prefer not to answer, sir."

To the Court—Your honor, it is absolutely necessary to get the figures.

The Court—The witness will answer the question.

"Now, then, I will ask you again, sir, How much does the manufacture of gas cost the company by the thousand feet?"

"I haven't any idea. I have nothing to do with the business affairs of the company, sir, except to draw my regular quarterly dividend of 5 per cent."—Chicago Tribune.

A Short Way Out of It.

Papa—But why do you sign it "Your loving son, Amy?"

Amy—Why, of course, mamma will know, and I couldn't spell daughter!—Life.

Not Caught.

The blithe girl laughed.

"Yes," she prattled, "I met him on the street."

The languid being sighed.

"Did you catch his eye?" she asked.

"I'll"——

The laugh had died upon her lips.

——"see."

Hastening from the room, she closely examined the prongs of her parasol.—Truth.

A Bright Boy.

"Johnnie," said a teacher in one of the up town public schools, "have you seen the skeleton of the mammoth in the Museum of Natural History?"

"Yes, mum."

"To what kind of an animal does it belong?"

"A dead one."—Texas Siftings.

KNOWLEDGE

Brings comfort and improvement and tends to personal enjoyment when rightly used. The many, who live better than others and enjoy life more, with less expenditure, by more promptly adapting the world's best products to the needs of physical being, will attest the value to health of the pure liquid laxative principles embraced in the remedy, Syrup of Figs.

Its excellence is due to its presenting in the form most acceptable and pleasant to the taste, the refreshing and truly beneficial properties of a perfect laxative; effectually cleansing the system, dispelling colds, headaches and fevers and permanently curing constipation. It has given satisfaction to millions and met with the approval of the medical profession, because it acts on the Kidneys, Liver and Bowels without weakening them and it is perfectly free from every objectionable substance.

Syrup of Figs is for sale by all druggists in 50c and $1 bottles, but it is manufactured by the California Fig Syrup Co. only, whose name is printed on every package, also the name, Syrup of Figs, and being well informed, you will not accept any substitute if offered.

BRACE THE NERVES.

Sedatives and opiates won't do it. These nervines do not make the nerves strong, and failing to do this fall short of producing the essential of their quietude—vigor. And while in extreme cases—and these only—of nervous irritation such drugs may be advisable, their frequent use is highly prejudicial to the delicate organism upon which they act, and in order to renew their quieting effect increased and dangerous doses eventually become necessary. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is an efficient substitute for such pernicious drugs. It quiets the nerves by bracing, toning, strengthening them. The connection between weakness of the nervous system and that of the organs of digestion is a strong and sympathetic link. The Bitters, by imparting a healthful impulse to the digestive and assimilating functions promotes throughout the whole system a vigor in which the nerves come in for a large share. Use the Bitters in malaria, constipation, bilious and kidney trouble.

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure now known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers, that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of Testimonials.

"FELICE NOTTE!"

God send the little golden bees of sleep
To murmur in the blossom of your ear
Their gentle summer music hushed and deep,
Their softest slumber songs to you, my dear!

And may the gypsy fortune telling dreams
Draw you beneath their painted tent and take
Your palm and tell you fortunes—rosy gleams
Too sweet to be remembered when you wake!

Once may your hyacinthine lids unfold
Bathed in the limpid pallor of the moon,
The happiest stars in heaven may yet behold,
And pray and sigh for joy, and slumber soon.
—Irene Putnam in Lippincott's.

A MAN IN THE BELL.

In my younger days bell ringing was much more in fashion among the young men of —— than it is now. Some fifty years ago about twenty of us who dwelt in the vicinity of the cathedral formed a club which used to ring every peal that was called for.

One Sunday I went with another into the belfry to ring for noon prayers, but the second stroke we had pulled showed us that the clapper of the bell we were at was muffled. Some one had been buried that morning and it had been prepared of course to ring a mournful note.

We did not know of this, but the remedy was easy. "Jack," said my companion, "step up to the loft and cut off the hat," for the way we had of muffling was by tying a piece of an old hat or of cloth (the former was preferred) on one side of the clapper, which deadened every second toll.

I complied, and mounting into the belfry crept as usual into the bell, where I began to cut away. The hat had been tied on in some more complicated manner than usual, and I was perhaps three or four minutes in getting it off, during which time my companion below was hastily called away—by a message from his sweetheart, I believe, but that is not material to my story.

The person who called him was a brother of the club who, knowing that the time had come for ringing for service, and not thinking that any one was above, began to pull. At this moment I was just getting out when I felt the bell moving. I guessed the reason at once. It was a moment of terror, but by a hasty and almost convulsive effort I succeeded in jumping down and throwing myself on the flat of my back under the bell.

The room in which it was was little more than sufficient to contain it, the bottom of the bell coming within a couple of feet of the floor of lath. At that time I certainly was not so bulky as I am now, but as I lay it was within an inch of my face. I had not lain myself down a second, when the ringing began. It was a dreadful situation.

Over me swung an immense mass of metal, one touch of which would have crushed me to pieces; the floor under me was principally composed of crazy laths, and if they gave way I was precipitated to the distance of about fifty feet upon a loft, which would in all probability have sunk under the impulse of my fall and sent me to be dashed to atoms upon the marble floor of the chancel a hundred feet below.

This was my first terror, but the ringing had not continued a minute before a more awful and immediate dread came on me. The deafening sound of the bell smote into my ears with a thunder which made me fear their drums would crack; there was not a fiber of my body it did not thrill through. It entered my very soul; thought and reflection were almost utterly banished; I only retained the sensation of agonizing terror.

Every moment I saw the bell sweep within an inch of my face, and my eyes—I could not close them, though to look at the object was bitter as death—followed it instinctively in its oscillating progress until it came back again. It was in vain I said to myself that it could come no nearer at any future swing than it did at first; every time it descended I endeavored to shrink into the very floor to avoid being buried under the down sweeping mass, and then, reflecting on the danger of pressing too weightily on my frail support, would cower up again as far as I dared.

At first my fears were mere matter of fact. I was afraid the pulleys above would give way and let the bell plunge on me. At another time the possibility of the clapper being shot out in some sweep and dashing through my body, as I had seen a ramrod glide through a door, flitted across my mind. The dread also, as I have already mentioned, of the crazy floor tormented me, but these soon gave way to fears not more unfounded, but more visionary and of course more tremendous.

The roaring of the bell confused my intellect, and my fancy soon began to teem with all sorts of strange and terrifying ideas. The bell pealing above and opening its jaws with a hideous clamor seemed to me at one time a raving monster raging to devour me; at another a whirlpool ready to suck me into its bellowing abyss. As I gazed on it, it assumed all shapes. It was a flying eagle, or rather a roc of the Arabian story tellers, clapping its wings and screaming over me.

As I looked upward into it, it would appear sometimes to lengthen into indefinite extent or to be twisted at the end into the spiral folds of the tail of a flying dragon. Nor was the flaming breath or fiery glance of that fabled animal wanting to complete the picture. My eyes, inflamed, bloodshot and glaring, invested the supposed monster with a full proportion of unholy light.

It would be endless were I to merely hint at all the fancies that possessed my mind. Every object that was hideous and roaring presented itself to my imagination. I often thought that I was in a hurricane at sea and that the vessel in which I was embarked tossed under me with the most furious vehemence. The air, set in motion by the swinging of the bell, blew over me nearly with the violence and more than the thunder of a tempest, and the floor seemed to reel under me as under a drunken man. But the most awful of all the ideas that seized on me were drawn from the supernatural.

In the vast cavern of the bell hideous faces appeared and glared down on me with terrifying frowns or with grinning mockery still more appalling. I found I was becoming delirious, and trembled lest reason should utterly desert me. I feared lest, when utterly deprived of my senses, I should rise—to do which I was every moment tempted by that strange feeling which calls on a man whose head is dizzy from standing on the battlement of a lofty castle to precipitate himself from it—and then death would be instant and tremendous.

When I thought of this I became desperate. I caught the floor with a grasp which drove the blood from my nails, and I yelled with the cry of despair. I called for help, I prayed, I shouted, but all the efforts of my voice were of course drowned in the bell. As it passed over my mouth it occasionally echoed my cries, which mixed not with its own sound, but preserved their distinct character. Perhaps this was but fancy. To me, I know, they then sounded as if they were the shouting, howling or laughing of the fiends with which my imagination had peopled the gloomy cave which swung over me.

In twenty minutes the ringing was done. Half of that time passed over me without power of computation—the other half appeared an age. When it ceased I became gradually more quiet, but a new fear retained me. I knew that five minutes would elapse without ringing, but at the end of that short time the bell would be rung a second time for five minutes more. I could not calculate time. A minute and an hour were of equal duration. I feared to rise lest the five minutes should have elapsed and the ringing be again commenced, in which case I should be crushed before I could escape against the walls or framework of the bell. I therefore still continued to lie down, cautiously shifting myself, however, with a careful gliding, so that my eye no longer looked into the hollow. This was of itself a considerable relief.

The cessation of the noise had in a great measure the effect of stupefying me, for my attention, being no longer occupied by the chimeras I had conjured up, began to flag. All that now distressed me was the constant expectation of the second ringing, for which, however, I settled myself with a kind of stupid resolution. I closed my eyes and clinched my teeth as firmly as if they were screwed in a vice.

At last the dreaded moment came, and the first swing of the bell extorted a groan from me, as they say the most resolute victim screams at the sight of the rack to which he is for a second time destined. After this, however, I lay silent and lethargic, without a thought.

When it ceased I was roused a little by the hope of escape. I did not, however, decide on this step hastily, but putting up my hand with the utmost caution I touched the rim. Though the ringing had ceased it was still tremulous from the sound and shook under my hand, which instantly recoiled as from an electric jar. A quarter of an hour probably elapsed before I again dared to make the experiment, and then I found it at rest. I determined to lose no time, fearing that I might have lain then already too long and that the bell for evening service would catch me.

This dread stimulated me, and I slipped out with the utmost rapidity and arose. I stood, I suppose, for a minute, looking with silly wonder on the place of my imprisonment, penetrated with joy at escaping, but then rushed down the stony and irregular stair with the velocity of lightning and arrived in the bell ringer's room. My hands were torn and bleeding; my hair disheveled and my clothes tattered.

I leaned against the wall, motionless and deprived of thought, in which posture my companions found me when in the course of a couple of hours they returned to their occupation.—Blackwood's Magazine.

Why the Sky Is Blue.

The explanation of the blue of the "vaulted canopy above us" is not to be sought in the fact that the air, or its constituent particles, reflect the readily refrangible rays of short waved length and let the less refrangible long waved rays through. The short waves of light—the blue color—are much more strongly reflected than the long waved red ones. Lord Raleigh has proven the blue reflected in the light from the sky to be four-fifths times stronger than the yellow color and six-sevenths times stronger than the red. The violet is six-eighths times stronger than the yellow, or about nine-tenths times more intense than the long waves of red light.

These relations of intensity must therefore cause the reflected light to appear to be mostly blue. The blue of the sky is also connected with the phenomenon known as the polarization of light, that color in the colored waves always being polarized in the same direction, which is quite independent of the nature of the turbid particles of the atmosphere. As long as present conditions exist the sky will be of blue colors of varying intensity.—St. Louis Republic.

The Doll Was Naked.

"I was coming across the St. Lawrence river the other day," remarked Samuel B. Wolfson, a commercial tourist stopping at the Lindell, "and witnessed a thing that made a custom house officer blush, and I'll bet he is the only one that ever had such a sensation in his life. On the boat was a beautiful young miss who had a large package in her lap. The inspector desired to see it, but the young girl refused.

"But I must," insisted the officer.

"It is nothing but a doll," she said. "I'll pay the duty, but you can't see it."

"I hate to be rude, my young lady," said the inspector, "but unless you open the package I shall be forced to take it away from you."

"I will not open it," she said defiantly. "It's nothing but a doll, I tell you, and it has no clothes; one stark naked, sir, and you shall not see it."

The officer tried to laugh, but he couldn't. The other passengers applauded the young lady's nerve, and the inspector passed on.—St. Louis Republic.

RAINY DAY GOWNS

Some Sensible Advice on Woman's Wet Weather Costumes.

SEVERAL GOOD SUGGESTIONS.

There is no Reason Why a Woman Should Look Like a Fright Every Time She Goes Out in a Storm.

Some earnest student of human nature once said that the most melancholy sight in the world was to see a fat man with a boil on his neck trying to flirt with a girl in a fourth story window, but for real downright sadness a woman on a wet day distances all competitors. The average woman in a rainstorm is a sight to shudder at, for, however neat and pretty she may be on ordinary occasions, demoralization seems to set in as the rain begins to fall, and the result is a weird and awful appearance that would make a man cross the street to avoid meeting his own wife. Of course this all applies to the average everyday woman, who does not make a practice of taking a cab home when she feels the first warning spatter—a custom, by the way, which is much more commendable, though perhaps expensive, than straggling around trying to manage parcels, purse, umbrella and dress skirt.

Observe the average woman on a rainy day at the big bridge entrance, for instance, as she fumbles in her pocketbook for ticket or change, and if ye have tears prepare to shed them. Her hat is awry, but she knows it not. In one hand a portion of her dress skirt is hitched, while another portion has been gathering up the mud, as has the portion of one white lace trimmed skirt which, bedraggled and torn, flaps against her shoes, leaving them muddy and unsightly. Her right hand holds an umbrella as well as her skirt; her left fumbles in her pocketbook, while her other, as Sir Henry Boyle would say, endeavors to straighten her hat, fix a hairpin in her bang and do a few other things just as important. Her face is set and hard looking and there is a wild glitter in her eye. From her appearance one might judge that she was a female communist or a shoplifter, or that she was possessed of what in literary circles is known as a "jag." But this woman is a respected member of society, a church member, a King's Daughter, the head of a happy home and an admirer of Browning and Ibsen. But she doesn't look it a little bit.

It is all owing to the attire which ordinarily sane women persist in wearing on rainy days, making no distinction whatever between sunshiny, clear weather and that which is sloppy and "demnition damp, moist and uncomfortable." In these days when woman is "advancing" to such an extent that the tyrant man must needs step lively to keep pace with her it would be well if she would take a pause in debating such subjects as "How to Manage a Husband" and "The Final Extinction of Man," and earnestly discuss "Why Do Women Look Like Such Guys on a Rainy Day?" Then they would commence to realize where they were at in much shorter time than through a century of "talks" on vague and faroff questions. There is no need for lovely woman to make herself look like a fright because she is going out in the rain, but neither is their any law, human or divine, which countenances her going about looking like a bedraggled hen.

Every woman should have in her wardrobe one or two "rainy day" gowns—that is, one or two dark light weight dresses that have outworn better uses, and that ordinarily would be handed over to the maid or the laundress. Take the skirt of such a gown and denude it of all trimming, then shorten it with a liberal hand—as the cookbooks say. Don't be too modest about cutting away all that last foot of material that gets so deeply, darkly, beautifully muddy when the streets are sloppy. It is much better to walk abroad in a gown that shows the tops of your shoes, if necessary, than to walk along blissfully unconscious, with dress skirt and petticoats hitched up to your knee on one side, while the other side trails ingloriously in the mire. You must wear a short, dark petticoat; under this black stockings and good stout boots.

Many women cannot wear overshoes, and if your pocketbook admits of a pair of boots made to order by a good maker for rainy weather use they will be found much more satisfactory and comfortable than the "rubbers" that so often are more bother than help. Now, if you are addicted to the mackintosh, you may wear one over this, as they are made up in very jaunty styles, but every woman knows how hot, heavy and perspiring rubber coats—even idealized rubber coats—are. Except in very violent rainstorms a short jacket which leaves the arms free will be more convenient. Women who affect stained glass effects as to costume and brown pottery coiffures would do well to leave both at home on rainy days. Frouzy hair gets out of frouze and looks unkept and witchlike; "picture" hats get crooked; plumes wilt, and artistic neck garnitures droop in most unbecoming style under the influence of dampness. Braid your hair up snugly under a little English tourist hat or a sailor, either glazed or felt.

Wear a veil—not a cloud of gauze, but a sensible veil that will keep your hair in trim though the wind blows a hurricane. You can have a bit of white linen show at your neck if you wish or a trim mackintosh buttoned snugly across produces a neat effect. The short skirt idea may strike you as rather shocking at first, but try it and you will find it not half bad in wet weather. Robed like this a woman can keep trim and neat through the rain, and will never look like such a fright that her husband will sneak down a side street to avoid greeting her. A bright Brooklyn woman has invented a sensible waterproof garment called the "duck's back waterproof," but every woman does not like these rubber garments, and for such why not adopt a home made rainy weather suit?—New York Herald.

One Rat's Experience Was Enough.

A certain grocery in Buffalo was overrun with rats. One day a barrel half full of molasses fell apart or, at least, the bottom fell out and the molasses ran over the floor. In some way one of the biggest rats in the vicinity got into the molasses, and bedraggled and discouraged was seen creeping laboriously away from the premises. Every rat disappeared at the same time, and not another one, or any evidence of one, has been seen about the place since.—Buffalo Courier.

Keeping Track of Ships.

In the course of the year more than a dozen ponderous books are filled at Lloyd's with nothing but the names of ships, their captains, and the dates on which they touch and leave port. Every known vessel in the world of more than 100 tons register has its record in them, and the underwriters can easily turn to the name of any British or foreign ship and tell approximately where she is at the moment.—London Tit-Bits.

KITEFLYING IN NEW YORK CITY.

On the Roofs It Isn't All Fun, but the Street Arabs Are Worse Off.

When a boy in a growing western town wants to fly a kite all he has to do is to call in his favorite chums and go out to the big lot, and away goes the kite grandly sailing through the air.

But in New York it is different.

Yesterday afternoon a boy was standing on a roof near the bridge trying to fly a kite in a gale of wind. He had a serious time. He was fully seventy-five feet from the ground, and around him were innumerable telegraph wires. Every time he tried to get the kite up its tails were sure to tangle in the wires. Then, too, another boy had a kite flying from a roof near by, and sooner than you could say Jack Robinson the two strings, the two kites and the two tails were all mixed up together in a way that took a great deal of talk to unravel.

Then the gale caught the kite and bore it to the ground. The lad patiently clambered down the long flight of stairs to the street and then came back with his treasure. He was puffing like a porpoise. It was not very much fun.

The telegraph wires bothered him again.

Oh, it was an awful time—this kiteflying in New York. It was so aggravating, too, to see other kites flying in the distance, all held by boys on the tops of tall tenements. The roof is the playground for the kiteflying boys of Gotham.

The other day in one of the most crowded parts of Broadway a boy was holding a kite string, the kite just clearing the edge of a tall mercantile house. How the lad ever secured the place for a kite or how he got it up was a mystery. Yet there he stood, winding away on the string, now letting out a bit, now sending up a "telegram," which, as every boy knows, is a piece of round paper running along the string and borne upward by the stiff breeze.

A policeman came along, and noticing the crowd the boy's kiteflying had brought together said gruffly to the lad:

"Take the kite and move on."

"But the kite won't come down," pleaded the boy, winding on the string.

An old gentleman moved out of the throng and said:

"Hi, there, let the boy have his fun; he is not harming any one."

"But it is a nuisance," growled the copper, "and he better get out. The first thing he knows his string will be in the heads of of the passing teams."

Just then a gust of wind stronger than usual caught the kite and bore it higher and higher in seeming ridicule of the meddling policeman.

The sport was much enjoyed by the crowd.

In disgust the copper moved away, pretending to move a tramp off his beat.

The old man said slowly, with a happy smile:

"I was a boy once myself and I know how it is. Here is a dime, boy. When your kite comes down go and buy yourself some nice red apples."

Then the old codger went away in the big crowd, no doubt very happy at the way he had renewed his youth and at the same time had contributed to the pleasures of a poor New York street arab.—New York Herald.

An Opinion of Husbands.

She was a fat, jolly old colored woman, and she wandered into County Agent Mahoney's office in search of a little coal. Her coal black face beamed with good nature, and honesty shone in both of her eyes. She asked for the coal with the air of one who thought herself entitled to it, but County Agent Mahoney has become suspicious through long experience with applicants for assistance, and he proceeded to catechise her.

"Are you able to work?"

"Cou'se I'ze able to wo'k. Don't I wo'k every day jest like a nigger! I wouldn't come to yo' office if I wazunt hahd up."

"Have you a husband?"

"What I want wid a husban? Dey's only good foh nothin. Had one wunst, the triflin whelp. He done nothin but spen all de money I made foh whisky. I don got tiahd ob dat an fiahd him outen de house. I don't want no moah husban in mine. What am dey good foah anyhow?"

Being a married man Mr. Mahoney was not in a position to give an unprejudiced opinion, so he gave the colored woman an order for a half ton of coal and she went on her way rejoicing.

"If she had told me the old story of a sick husband she would have got nothing," said Mr. Mahoney, "but an opinion on the worth of husbands, coming from such a high source, is cheap at the price of half a ton of coal."—Omaha World-Herald.

Our Degenerate Little Toe.

The whole history of the organism bears testimony to the marvelous persistence of parts in spite of contumely and disuse. Take, for example, the present position of the little toe in man. We know not the condition of this digit in prehistoric man, and have but little information as to its state among savage tribes at the present day, but we do know that in civilized peoples, whose feet are from infancy subjected to conditions of restraint, it is an imperfect organ.

In 1 per cent. of adults the second and third joint have anchylosed; in 3 per cent. the joint between them is rudimentary, with scarcely a trace of a cavity; in 20 per cent. of feet the organ has lost one or more of its normal complement of muscles. But though shorn of some of its elements, and with others as mere shreds, the toe persists, and he would be a bold prophet who would venture to forecast how many generations of booted ancestry would suffice to eliminate it from the organization of the normal man.—Alexander Macalister in Popular Science Monthly.

Starving Our Children.

When we see our house plants looking stunted, putting forth few leaves and no flowers, we stir the soil in the pots and enrich the earth. When we see a child looking pale and thin we say, if we know something of physiological chemistry, "Too little nitrogenous food." If we are simple folk, averse to long words, we remark, "That child seems half starved." It is the truth, however we express it, and a wrong is being done to the child that the fact is not recognized and remedied by whoever has the daily oversight of its meals. The unconscious victim may seem to eat a sufficient amount of food, while it does not get enough of the proper kind to furnish the nourishment the body requires.—Ladies' Home Journal.

Myoptic Eschatology.

Laying aside my glasses clear,
Kind squires to halt myoptic eyes,
Blundering among blurred stars, I peer
Into the dim, dull twinkling skies.

Some day, 'mid those faint lights adrift,
Wandering past all fancy far,
My spirit shall its journey shift
From half seen star to half seen star.

And this daft fear fantastic starts.
In those blurred worlds what shall I do,
Lacking the firm, material parts
To hang my wonted glasses to?

BEAR DISCIPLINE.

The Way Old Mrs. Bruin Kept Her Noisy Little Children Quiet.

THE STORY TOLD BY A BEE HUNTER.

The Mother Bear Shook the Little Ones Repeatedly Because the Youngsters Squealed and Played.

"I once saw a she bear act toward her cubs just as I've seen women act toward their children," said an old Zoyalsock bee hunter last week. "Late one August I lined a lot of wild bees to a big beech tree two miles back in the woods on Elk mountain. I located the bees in a hollow part of the trunk, far up toward the top, and when I went to mark the tree so that no one else would claim it I noticed that a bear had gone up and down the tree several times only a little while before.

"There was a lot of loose green beech bark at the butt, and looking up I saw that a bear had been clawing and biting to get in the hollow where the honey lay. I didn't want to cut the tree for two or three weeks, as the bees were gathering honey from the wild flowers of late summer, and, for fear that the bear might dig into the tree and steal the honey before I got ready to chop the tree down, I decided to see if I couldn't catch the bear at it that night and shoot it in the act.

"The next night I climbed the hemlock, heard the brush crack at a distance, heard something that sounded like the whining of a cub, followed by a low growl, and soon everything was as still in the woods as it had been. The bear didn't make its appearance at the bee tree that night, and on my way home a little after daylight I stopped at the house of an old bear hunter and told him of my experience in the woods.

"The old man chuckled over my lack of knowledge concerning the habits of bears, for he saw through it all at once, and then he told me that the cracking I had heard was caused by a bear's feet, and that a bear always makes three or four circuits around a bee tree in the night before it approaches it. The bear I had heard tramping on the dead limbs, the old hunter said, had run across my track while it was making the first circuit, and that it had made itself scarce mighty quick after it had got scent of my boots. 'And I'll bet a dollar that it was a she bear with one or two cubs,' he added.

"Then he told me to take a couple of pieces of board with me when I went after the bear the next time. 'From the time you strike the woods till you get to the tree,' he said, 'keep your boots on the boards by taking one up from behind you and placing it in front of you all the way. Don't let your boots touch the ground, and when you reach the tree strap the boards and boots to your back and take them up.'

"That night I followed the old bear hunter's directions to the letter. A little after midnight I heard the brush cracking around in a circle, for the night was calm and clear, and no wind rustled the leaves. The sound of cracking came nearer and nearer, and when three circuits had been made by the heavy steps I was rewarded for my long watching in the big hemlock by seeing a she bear steal cautiously toward the bee tree, with two cubs tagging at her heels.

"The old bear sniffed around the butt of the tree a couple of times, gazed at the top for a moment, and then stuck her claws in the bark and started to climb. The cubs began to whine and whimper before their mother had gone the length of her up the tree, and immediately she began to stop them by giving a low growl and looking back at them. But the cubs didn't stop their noise, and all at once the old bear backed down, gave each cub a good shaking, sat it up on its haunches, cuffed its ears, shook her fist at it and told it to stay there till she came down.

"The cubs were as still as mice, and the old bear quickly climbed to the top of the trunk and began to tear at the wood with her teeth. I had intended to shoot the bear in the tree, but when I saw that the one that was trying to steal my honey was a mother with two young ones to look after my heart failed me. I might have killed her easily with a charge of buck shot, but I was so deeply interested in her cubs and her work that I made up my mind to let her live and watch her while she was doing her best to dig through the wood to where the honey lay.

"In the course of fifteen or twenty minutes the cubs became tired of sitting on their hind quarters, got down on all fours and started to play with one another. They rolled and capered in the underbrush, and in a little while they began to squeal and look up at their mother, as though they were coaxing her to come down. The old bear flew into a rage over the way they were acting, and hurriedly backing down she gave them another severe shaking, scolded them, cuffed their ears and set them up on their haunches. Then she climbed the tree once more, and for nearly an hour, while she worked like a beaver with tooth and claw to get at the honey, the cubs sat as still as stumps and didn't give vent to a single whimper.

"By that time the old bear had torn through the wood to the honey, and when she had eaten a lot of it she backed down with a pawful of honey for her young ones. The cubs gobbled it greedily, and the old bear soon climbed up and fetched down another pawful, which they ate quickly. All of a sudden the old bear started the cubs off in front of her, and in a moment the bear family was out of sight. The next night I chopped the tree down and secured the rest of the honey. I got a washtub full out of the hollow tree, and I wasn't a bit sorry that I had let the bear and her cubs have their fill of it for once."—Cor. New York Tribune.

Color Perception in Savage Races.

From various investigations made of the subject the opinion would appear to be justified that savage races possess the perception of color to a greater degree than do civilized races. This is made evident by the facts presented by Dr. Webster Fox before the Franklin institute, Philadelphia, his statement covering the results of some 250 examinations among Indian children, 100 of these being boys.

Researches of this character show that in a selection of 100 white boys from various parts of the United States at least five of the number would have proved color blind. Among all these Indian boys not a single case of the kind was discovered.—New York Tribune.

ENGLISH RESTAURANT WAITERS.

It Is No Wonder That the British Serving Man Looks for a Tip.

In restaurants where the customer pays his bill through the waiter the latter is held responsible for its due payment from the moment he receives the articles ordered by the customer from the kitchen, and what is known as the "check" system is pretty generally adopted. The waiter on beginning his day's work pays in to the proprietor or his clerk from two to five pounds to cover the value of the orders he is likely to receive during the day, and he is given in exchange a number of "checks."

For every order he gives he hands in checks to an equivalent amount. If the value of the orders exceeds the amount of deposit the waiter must pay in more money before he receives the dishes. What the customers pay him he retains until settling time.

If the customer goes away without paying the waiter must bear the loss. In one instance I heard of a customer who, after enjoying a sumptuous dinner, suddenly discovered, with much apparent surprise, that he had not the wherewithal to pay for it, and told the waiter he must go to borrow it from a friend. He offered very fairly to take the waiter with him, and chartered a cab for the purpose. They drove to two or three places without finding the friend at home. At last they discovered him; at least the customer disappeared through what he said was the door of his friend's room.

He did not return, and on the anxious waiter's inquiring whither the door led, he learned that it communicated with a passage leading to the street at the back of the house. It was too late to follow in pursuit, and my unfortunate friend had not only the dinner to pay for, but the cabman engaged by the customer to settle with, which might be considered, under the circumstances, as insult added to injury.

The waiter is the person on whom blame naturally falls if orders are not promptly executed. But he is himself at the mercy of the kitchen porters, who pass him the dishes from the kitchen, and these men can seriously impede him by dawdling in carrying out his orders if he fails to square them with a fee, so that here we find an unexpected illustration of the truth of the late Professor Edward Forbes' scientific observation apropos of the infinitely little in nature:

Big fleas have little fleas upon their backs to bite 'em,
And little fleas have lesser fleas, and so ad finitum.

The waiter, who lives in part upon the customer, is himself preyed upon by the kitchen porter.—Good Words.

Railways in the Ottoman Empire.

The continual extension of railways in Turkey in general, and especially in the Syrian province of the empire, is of somewhat wider interest than the economic importance of the lines built or building would suggest. The railway policy of the Ottoman government has resulted so far in the construction of three trunk lines through the northern and central portions of the sultan's Asiatic dominions. These lines embrace a railway from Haidar Pasha—a suburb of Constantinople—running right through the heart of Asia Minor, and thence down to the Tigris valley, Bagdad and the Persian gulf, the object being to link the latter gulf with the waters of the Golden Horn, the second, a line from Samsoon, on the Black sea, southward to Ayas, on the Mediterranean, and so link together the Black and Mediterranean seas; third, to connect the Mediterranean sea through Damascus and the Euphrates valley with the Persian gulf.

The first line has been undertaken by a German company, which has already carried the line to Angora, 440 miles inland from Constantinople. A Belgian company holds the concession for the second line, and has already completed the survey of the first portion. The third line is in possession of an English company, whose operations have already reached the point of actual construction, and this line, which passes through Syria and the Euphrates valley, will form part of the shortest route to India.—London Times.

An Anecdote of Hannibal Hamlin.

A gentleman well known in this state who has been in the wholesale liquor business in San Francisco moved to New York and established somewhere in that state a refinery or distillery, and after awhile special agents of the internal revenue service made up a case against him for, as alleged, evasion of taxes, of which he claimed he was innocent. They finally entered a suit against him in the name of the government, and it was continued along for some time in the hopes of settlement. Finally the gentleman got Mr. Hamlin interested, and he took it up with authorities at Washington, and eventually a settlement was reached satisfactory to both parties.

This gentleman happened to be visiting a friend in Bangor soon after and called upon Mr. Hamlin one evening, and on leaving laid a check for $5,000 on the table. The next day, however, Mr. Hamlin met the gentleman on the street and returned the check to him with the remark, "Here, I am no such fellow, but if you have any nice cigars in your store you may send me a box."—Portland (Me.) Express.

Branded Cattle Not Fashionable.

Those who have had their feelings hurt from time to time by enlarging upon the sufferings of cattle when branded will be glad to know that the practice is getting much less universal than it was a few years ago. There are fewer enormous ranches now and less need for branding than formerly, and, added to this, there is a decided preference in the trade for unbranded hides. A brand on the hip or jaw is not so much objected to as the large, unsightly brand on the side, which renders valueless the best part of the hide. The day of large, unsightly brands is certainly past, and before long the practice will only be resorted to in cases of absolute necessity, such cases becoming more and more rare as large ranches and unfenced prairies become cut up and reduced in area.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

A Discovery.

There is a handmaiden infesting Brooklyn who played a brief engagement recently in the domestic comedy of a flat. She proved herself to be willing enough to learn the ways of the household, but passing slow of understanding. One day, however, after meeting several rebuffs for misguided zeal, she came to her mistress in triumph.

"Didn't you say, ma'am, that everything in the flat was on one floor?" she demanded.

"Certainly," was the reply.

"Well, it ain't, ma'am. The steam heat comes from down cellar."—New York Times.

LEGENDARY LORE.

Superstitions Which Have a Strong Hold on Canadians.

THE LEGEND OF THE WEREWOLF.

Belief That Spirits of the Dead Return to Earth—The Prominent Part Played by Old Satan.

In the legendary lore of Canada the devil plays a prominent part. He does not appear as the strong angel who fell through pride, the enemy of God, but as the mediæval devil of monkish legend, the petty persecutor of man. In the rural districts of Canada satan is supposed to be very active. His company may be looked for on all ocasions. The accidental appearance of a little child in the room often betrays the presence of the evil spirit, as the poor innocent is sure to bewail itself vigorously. The prince of darkness may be met at a ball in the guise of a handsome young man, who excels all the rustic gallants in appearance. He wears gloves to conceal his claws and disregards the trammels of conventionality by keeping his hat on his head to hide his horns. He selects the prettiest girl in the room as his partner, but his choice is usually the village coquette, whose vanity or levity has exposed her to the evil influence. In the midst of the gayety a piercing cry is heard. A strong odor of brimstone becomes perceptible, and the attractive cavalier is wafted out of the window, carrying with him some useful domestic utensil—as, for instance, a stove or the frying pan. The girl may escape with a sharp scratch of a claw, particularly if she should happen to wear a cross or a crucifix. Canadian rusties never answer "Entrez" when a knock is heard at the door; they invariably respond "Ouvrez." This is founded upon an old legend of a young woman who replied "Entrez" to such a summons, when the devil came in and carried her off.

When one is starting in a hurry to bring the priest to the sick, the devil is stimulated to the most lively activity, for then it is the question of the loss or gain of a soul. On such occasions an endless variety of the most unforeseen accidents are sure to happen. The horses are found unharnessed, or the harness breaks without any reason, and strange lights flash before the horses' eyes. Prudent sons guard against such contingencies by providing themselves with two vehicles. Then, if an accident happens to one, the other remains available.

The werewolf legend constitutes one of the most somber of the traditionary beliefs existing in French Canada. The story of a human being assuming a wolf's shape is certainly one of the most generally diffused throughout the world, and the werewolf story comes down to us from old Roman times. The French Canadian believes that if a person does not partake of the sacrament for seven years he will turn into a loup garou—a shapeless animal without head or limbs. The loup garou might also assume the form of a wildcat, a hare, a fox or even a black hen, but at night he was obliged to range through woods and desert places. At dead of night the loup garou steals from his bed. Climbing the highest tree in the neighborhood, he hides in its branches and is instantly transformed into bestial shape. He is endowed with supernatural speed and strength. A fierce creature, with appetites exaggerating those of the animal he resembles, his especial delight is in slaughtering and devouring little children. When he returns to human semblance, he may be recognized by his excessive leanness, wild eyes and haggard countenance. In order to regain his estate of humanity it is necessary that the blood of the monster should be shed. This kindly office being performed by a friend, a complete restoration results.

In many parts of the country cats of three colors were considered lucky. Therefore the fortunate possessor of a puss mottled with black, white and gray should preserve the animal carefully. When a Canadian lumberman is sufficiently fortunate to shoot a deer he wraps himself at night in the skin in order to keep off witches.

The souls of the lost or spirits in purgatory naturally occupied a prominent position in Canadian folklore. The dead frequently returned to the world. Among old fashioned persons there were few who had not held converse with a spirit or revenant. In punishment for sin the dead were often detained on the scene of their past misdeeds. One dead person could not help or relieve another. The wrong committed on earth could only be righted by the intervention of a living being. The evil spirits were unable to cross the blessed waters of the river St. Lawrence without the help of a Christian. These haunting spirits were numerous and of various descriptions.

The aurora borealis, called les marionettes, les eclairons, les lustrions, are supposed to be lost souls. It is a common practice among the country people to sing aloud to keep off evil spirits. They believe that the sound of an instrument or the human voice raised in song will cause the marionettes to dance. However, dire misfortune threatens the reckless being who adopts this method of amusing himself unless the precaution is taken of touching him in time with a palm that has been blessed. He gradually yields to a weird fascination, his eyes dilate, his voice grows feeble, and before morning dawns his body lies stiff and stark in death, while his soul has flown to join in the giddy whirl of les lustrions.

Fireflies, known as fen-follets, called by country people fi-follets, are also considered to be lost souls, whose goblin lights lure the unwary to destruction—a sad prerogative possessed by fireflies, in common with other lights of the country, less brilliant perhaps, but whose seductions are quite as much to be dreaded. A simple charm will curb the malicious designs of these airy, glittering imps. If the object of their persecution can retain sufficient presence of mind to thrust either a needle or a sharp knife into the nearest fence, a fi-follet is obliged to stop short in his course. One of two things must then happen—either the fi-follet will impale himself upon the sharp instrument and thus find deliverance, or else he will exhaust himself in frantic efforts to pass through the eye of the needle, an attempt which proves quite as difficult to the fantastic spirit as the most substantial mortals. This gives the traveler time to seek the shelter of a dwelling.—Popular Science Monthly.

The Pied Crows of Scotland.

In Scotland crows are sometimes seen with white feathers. One that I particularly remember had a white head and a white tail feather, irregularly marked. These birds are called pies and are very teachable. They are not, however, easily procured.—

Mr. Estee made a speech at Los Angles on last Saturday night and as usual devoted himself to national questions, with which he will have nothing to do in the event of his election. Mr Budd made a speech at Sacramento at the same time and he dealt almost wholly with State issues. In the election of a Governor the people of California will consider which candidate is likely to give the best and most economical administration of affairs. They know that the State government is costing nearly twice as much as it ought. Mr. Budd shows a vigorous determination to institute the desired reform and an intelligent comprehension of how it is to be brought about. When Mr. Budd has promised the public anything he has always kept his promise. He has force to back his intelligence and devotion to the best interests of the State to promot him to pursue the wisest and most economical policy. All the requirements of the occasion are met with in him. The people discredited Estee twelve years ago, and they will do the same thing again.—Expositor.

Before Senator White obtained the same classification for Zante currants that is given to the other qualities of raisins, incoming vessels from the Mediterranian brought hundreds of barrels and thousands of cases of these raisins free of even a revenue duty under the McKinley tariff, which let things in free that we could not produce and tried to shut everything out that could be produced, so as to throw the whole people into the power of the protected monopolists—who furnish great corruption funds to be used in debauching the franchise in close States. The Fruit Trade Journal of New York has not for more than a month contained a report of the arrival of a single Zante currant. California raisin growers have reason to appreciate the action of Senator White, and they should vote for members of the Legislature who will vote to send another Senator to Washiagton to help him work for California's interests in other ways.

The calamity howlers are filling the air with ululations of prognosticated disaster to the sheep industry, now that American manufacturers are allowed to buy foreign wool on equal terms with foreign manufacturers; but just let them wait until there is an inch or two of rain to start feed, and see whether sheep will go up or down in price. The shortness of feed this year has been a very potent cause for the decline in the value of sheep, but this element of depression has been altogether left out of the calculation by the calamity-howlers and the whole discouragement and depression has been charged up to "fear and uncertainity"—just to influence the votes of the prejudiced and uninformed.

The Bulletin says: "These are busy times for Chief Warfinger Boobar and Assistant Root. The demand for berths along the water front is unusually heavy, and this morning there was not a single bit of space vacant that the smallest craft could crowd into. There have been many movemnts of deep-water vessels within the last few days and business is good on all the docks." The Republican newspapers and Republican orators will be force to admit soon that the repeal of the McKinley tariff bill was the best thing that could have happened for the prosperity of the country.

Pio Pico, the last Mexican governor of California, died at Los Angles on the morning of September 11th. He was 93 years old. He was governor of this part of the United States before it came under the sway of this government and he hurried away to Mexico, when the trouble of 1847 and 1848 arose, thus abdicating his governorship.

Dan Burns nominated the Republican state ticket, and is admitted by Republican papers to be the boss of the party. In order to keep the fact of his ownership before the people his name is signed to all of the announcements made for Mr Estee's meetings.

INDIANA WOMEN SLUMMERS.

They Visited Chicago With the Best of Motives and Were Shocked.

The Indianapolis members of the Chicago "slumming" expedition have returned home. The ladies who joined in the expedition are recognized leaders in W. C. T. U. work in Indiana. All of them are reported as excessively chagrined over the publicity given their visit to Chicago slums, which was undertaken with the best of motives.

"There are some falsehoods which should be corrected," says Miss Ayres. "We left our lodgings at 11 p. m. and returned at 1:15 precisely. We did not visit the worst resorts either. We aimed to inspect the more decent varieties, but the Lord knows for that matter they were all bad enough. The detective who guided us said it was no uncommon occurrence for parties of religious ladies to visit these resorts for scientific purposes, and our visit would never had leaked out if it had not been for a Judas Iscariot of a newspaper man, who gave the whole affair away.

"We had but one simple, solitary and landatory purpose in making the visit," continued the lady. "We wanted to find some practical means of elevating fallen women. Our object was to ascertain what relationship the tobacco and liquor habits bear to this unmentionable vice which we are seeking to cure. If we can strike at the root of the disease, it will be a comparatively easy matter to cure the disease itself. We ascertained that there was a very close relationship between the three vices, and that the latter is superinduced by the tobacco and liquor habits. Now we know whatever we do to lessen the amount of tobacco and liquor sold, by just that much will we lessen the vice which we are aiming at."

Miss Ayres was asked if what the ladies saw was calculated to lessen their estimation of humanity in general. "They were simply shocking. I had never dreamed that so much evil existed. Most of the resorts were like gilded palaces and were always accompanied by liquor and tobacco attachments where the girls indulged as freely as the men. I never want to see the like again. We were not prompted by morbid curiosity. We were working in the interests of social purity, and our motives were of the highest character. We believe that we did a good work."—Indianapolis Cor. Cincinnati Enquirer.

CHARGED TO A WOMAN.

It Is Said That the American Wife of Barrios Has Caused the Guatemalan Trouble.

A woman again. We learn that the prompter of the recent revolution in the republic of Guatemala, through which a dictatorship has been set up, was an ambitious woman, the American wife of General Barrios, a lady whose name is not unknown in New York. The enemies of Barrios in Guatemala declare that it was she who induced him to proclaim himself dictator, and who is the author of the arbitrary policy under which the country is ruled at this time, and under which the deputies are kept in prison and the army is held ready for action and suspected persons are banished, and the people are compelled to keep as quiet as they can. The enemies of Barrios say that he has neither the pluck nor the brains needed for a dictator, and that he is merely the tool of the determined American woman whom he took to wife.

She may yet rue the day in which she conceived the dictatorship. The anti-Barrios Guatemalans are aroused against her. They denounce her in whispers. They condemn her in placards, which are stuck up in the night time on the dead walls and fences of the city of Guatemala la Nueva. They get out circulars, which are surreptitiously printed and secretly distributed, in which she is characterized as an "American interloper." There is no doubt that she is in danger. If the Constitutionalists who are lurking around the capital and on the Salvadorian frontier, stealthily preparing to take the field against the dictatorship, shall overthrow Barrios, we cannot say that she will not suffer as hard a lot as she has been charged with inflicting upon others. We are surprised at her course. Americans ought to be the champions of democratic freedom and republican institutions everywhere.—New York Sun.

The Oldest Soldier In the World.

Russia proudly claims the oldest soldier, if not the oldest citizen of any rank, in the known world. Her claimant for this distinguished honor is Colonel Gritzenko of Pottawa near Odessa, who, if he lives until Feb. 7, will celebrate his one hundred and twentieth birthday. Gritzenko entered the military service in the year 1789, 104 years ago, and received from the hands of Empress Catherine herself a gold medal for conspicuous bravery at the assault on Ismail. This trophy, of which the aged warrior is justly very proud, bears the following inscription: "For exceptional bravery at the assault of Ismail, Dec. 11, 1789."—St. Louis Republic.

Sensitive Old Saybrook.

The town of old Saybrook will hold a meeting in a few days to rescind a vote recently passed appropriating money for the building of a lockup. Since the vote was passed the sentiment of the town has changed greatly, and now the majority of the people believe that the erection of a building for the retention of violators of the law would cast an odium on the ancient town. It is seldom that the need of such a building is felt in old Saybrook, and the people believe that a community as orderly and law abiding as theirs can get along without it.—Hartford Times.

One Cent Postage.

Postmaster General Bissell believes that the inauguration of the projected one cent postal service is impossible at the present time, owing to the fact that there is a deficit of $8,000,000 in the postal funds in the treasury, and the fact that the adoption of the service would of course reduce the postal revenue 50 per cent.

ALIAS SUMMONS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE County of Inyo, State of California.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the County of Inyo, State of California, and the complaint filed in said County of Inyo in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

Victor Topier Plaintiff, vs Jaques Jalberque and Manasese Louca, Defendants:

The people of the State of California send greeting to Jaques Jalberque and Manasese Louca, Defendants:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the County of Inyo State of California, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this Inyo County, or, if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain the judgment of this Hon. Court dissolving the partnership heretofore and now existing between yourselves and the Plaintiff, under and by virtue of an agreement made and entered into by you on the 30th day of October, 1893, and that the title to the mines or mining claims described in said agreement may be adjudged freed from all the conditions therein and restored as follows: That the Plaintiff is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "American Flag Mine;" that defendant Jaques Jalberque is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "French Flag Mine" and that Defendant Manasese Louca is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "Mexican Flag Mine," as said mines are described in said agreement and the complaint of file herein; Together with the costs of suit.

Said plaintiff alleging that you have utterly failed, neglected and refused to in any manner whatsoever comply with the terms and conditions of said partnership agreement, or to perform any of the duties imposed thereby, since on or about the 27th day of January, 1894; as will more fully appear by reference to the complaint on file herein.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, said plaintiff will apply to Court for the relief demanded in said complaint.

Witness my hand and the Seal of said Superior Court of the County of Inyo, State of California, this 27th day of June, A. D. 1894.

[SEAL.] D. J. HESSION, Clerk.
P. H. MACK, Attorney for Plaintiff.

COURT NOTES.

Geo. M. Gill, Superior Judge.

SATURDAY, Sept. 15, 1894.

People vs. Scovil—District Attorney moves that hearing on appeal be set for September 20, 1894. Motion denied and hearing continued without date.

Nelligan has nearly completed his court house contract.

All quiet now until election—that is, all but the candidates.

The weather during fair week was all that could be desired.

There are quite a number of idle men in town, and grub stakes are in demand.

J. R. Eldred of Big Pine is the Populist nominee for Supervisor in the 3d District.

George Leonard, owner of Gold Piece, arrived from Kern County on Wednesday, returning Saturday.

John W. P. Laird Esq. is visiting at Independence. Mr. Laird is engaged as assistant counsel to prosecute the Hines case.

Mr. Hudspeth accompanied by his wife and child arrived at Independence last Tuesday. School opens for the fall term on Monday.

Anybody knowing the whereabouts of a yearling jack, no brand, having a bell on with no clapper in it please notify R. Rossi, Independence Cal.

Mrs E. A. Reddy of Darwin has been in town for the past two weeks. She has been in ill health for some time and is here for medical treatment.

Sportsmen are hereby strictly forbidden to hunt or shoot upon my premises.

Mrs M. Lewis.
Camp Independence.

The Defiance mine at Darwin continues to ship ore in paying quantities. In the mean time development is steadily going on and when a favorable opportunity comes the output can be greatly increased.

On Thursday evening H. Giles and Ed. Rose arranged arranged a match between Sagebrush and Gold Piece for $1,000 a side, one quarter of a mile, to come of November 19th. They are both speedy animals and a hot race may be expected.

Brown & Wills, abstracors, is the name of a new firm in Independence. The young men have been engaged for the past year in abstracting the records of Inyo Coty and are now in a position to furnish all information upon land titles and other questions in connection therewith that may be desired. See their card.

J. W. P. Laird of Bakersfield addressed a large audience in the court house last evening, the subject of his discourse being the Populist party, its principles, aims and hopes. Mr. Laird spoke for about an hour and a half and was listened to with much interest.

A telegram from San Francisco on Friday announced that Hon. P. Redly was too ill to come to Independence to try the Hines case. Accordingly the jury summoned by Sheriff Gorman to appear at Independence next Tuesday has been excused and the case will be formally postponed next Wednesday.

ESTRAY NOTICE.

There came to my place at Camp Independence (the Lacey ranch) about the 1st of March, 1894, one bay mare, no brands visible, white star in forehead, about five years old, weight about 950 pounds. The owner is notified to prove his property and remove the animal, or she will be sold according to law.

RAFAEL ROSSI,

Sept 22, 1894.

The Foot-race.

There was quite an exciting foot race on Friday between Ed. Ober and Bert. Campbell. It will be remembered that Ober and Campbell ran at Bishop a year ago and Ober won. Campbell has been here for a month past and finally arranged a race on Thursday evening. The start was mutual consent, distance, 75 yards. After several scores Campbell got off about three feet in the lead, and the men finished so close that the judges decided it a tie. On the run-off Ober won by two feet. Campbell furnished his own backing and the race was hotly contested. There is talk of a match with Rector at 100 yards.

THE FAIR.

Never in former years has there been a more beautiful display of farm and work-basket products than that viewed at the Pavilion this week. While the live stock department has been showing bluer blood each year the fair sex have kept well abreast of them in their own line of work. Both in quantity and quality the needle work surpasses any former exhibit, and the task of the judges in selecting what is best from all that is so fine must be a difficult one. In the culinary department one is tempted by jellies, jams, pickles and preserves that delight the eye as well as the palate, while the well spread table Thursday evening would indicate that the Directors had at least one good lunch in their lives. The apiary display is a most interesting one and shows that our bee men are up with the times in all their methods and contrivances. A section of a hive with the busy bees and their queen attracted much attention. The rare display of Indian work that took the prize at the Mid-winter Fair makes us realize that we have a unique industry in our midst that should not be allowed to die out. It is time that the photographer whose pictures are displayed should drop the adjective amateur. The valuable map of Inyo county shows what a vast area the county covers and what a stupendous task the work must have been. The fruit and vegetable products are of the finest and testify what we all know—that in products of the soil we lead them all. A collection of growing plants enhanced the beauty of one corner of the room while cut flowers filled vases and jars. The drawing and painting display contains some admirable pictures of animal and still-life. Rope work and rugs of rags and burlap show what skillful fingers can do with homely materials. The borax, marble and and other minerals present an interesting spectacle to the mining man. In the juvenile department are some good drawings but the young people should have made a larger display. On Wednesday and Thursday evening a musical and literary entertainment was given and a competition for the best recitation was given Wednesday evening. For children of the ten years old Louella Robinson received the first premium and Irma Webb the second. For those twelve years old Blanch Bunney received the prize. There was a large attendance each evening.

THE RACES.

The first race was for Indian ponies, there being six starters, a single dash of a mile. Blackrock with an 80-pound boy up won easily.

The two year old trot was taken by Nancy V. driven by John Taylor. He got off in the and was never headed.

The three-eights dash had three starters. It looked a cinch for Gold Piece and was gathered in by that speedy sprinter with ease.

Wednesdays races began with the stallion trot, which was won by Patsy in straight heats. Stranger led to the stretch in the first heat but as he is a very large horse the heavy going told on him.

The half mile and repeat was the only betting race of the meeting. There was a bad start made in in the first heat, Gold Piece getting off one hundred feet in the lead and he came in easy. Tommy Williams on Proxy made a regular Bay District ride through the stretch to save his distance. Novelty failed to beat the flag. In the second heat the horses got off to a splendid start and Proxy won all the way, Gold Piece being distanced.

Thursdays sport was opened with the 3 minute class trot. Echo started a strong favorite at two to one. Lem was "rank" and broke badly in the first turn, Echo taking the heat. For the second heat drivers were changed behind Lem, and he was thoroughly warmed up before the heat which he gathered in handily, also taking the third.

The two-year old half-mile dash was won in hollow style by Kate Robinson's Northcne.

On Friday Patsy and Inyo met in the free-for-all trot. While warming up for the first heat Inyo collided with a buggy on the track and wrenched his shoulder and completely wrecked his "bike". Patsy won the first heat all the way. The next heat was taken by Inyo and the final heat by Patsy by a short half length. Inyo undoubtedly lost the race through his mishap as the high wheeled sulky is at least five seconds slower than the "bike" on this track.

The mile dash was a "cookie" for Proxy, he having no trouble whatever in taking it.

The last race of the fair, for three-year-olds, was won by Echo who took the second and third heats. McGinty finished ahead in the last heat and was set back for breaking.

On the whole the sport was very good though betting was very light.

Following is the summary:

STOCK PARADE.

The stock parade on Wednesday and Thursday mornings was highly creditble to the push and enterprise of Owens Valley stockmen. All grades were shown from standard bred to heavy draft. The roadster class was especially remarkable as all the animals with one exception were bred and raised here, and were a fine, showy lot of horses that could have been exhibited with credit in any country.

THE BALL.

The ball Friday evening was a grand success, socially and financially. The large pavilion was taxed to its utmost to accommodate the number of dancers, the music was excellent and the management perfect. The midnight supper at the Norman House was all that could be desired and the affair wound up the eighth annual Fair in a blaze of glory.

The County Hospital Burned.

The building owned by Mrs Lewis and used by her as the county hospital was totally destroyed by fire last Friday morning about four o'clock; a blind man who was a patient of the hospital was unable to escape in time and was burned to death. The origin of the fire is unknown; there being a high wind hard work alone was all that saved the surrounding buildings. One strange fact of the last fire was that Mrs. Lewis lost her dwelling house last year at the same time. The building was a total loss, there being no insurance. Mrs. Lewis also loses her entire crop of grain consisting of two hundred sacks. The building was erected in the early days of Inyo County, being formerly used as a store by our town merchant Mr. Chenot when he carried on a merchandising business at the Fort.

A Coroner's jury was impanelled by Justice Davidson who found that that the deceased was named Jacob Braumstein, a native of Germany, aged 63 years. That his death was caused by fire whether accidental or intentional not known.

A Miracle in Missouri.

THE ACHIEVEMENTS OF MEDICAL SCIENCE FAR MORE WONDERFUL THAN THE MAGIC OF THE EAST.

The Remarkable Experience of Post Master Woodson, of Panama, Mo.—For Ten Years a Cripple.—To-day a Well and Hearty Man.

(From the Kansas City Times.)

The people of Rich Hill, Mo. and vicinity, have recently been startled by a seeming miracle of healing. For years one of the best known men in Bates and Vernon counties has been Mark M. Woodson, now postmaster at Panama, and brother of ex-State Inspector of Mines, C. C. Woodson, of this city. The people of Rich Hill, where he formerly resided, and of his present home, remember well the bent form, misshapen almost from the semblance of man, which has painfully bowed its head half to earth and labored snail-like across the walks season after season, and when one day last month it straightened to its full height, threw away the heavy butt of cane which for years had been its only support from total helplessness, and walked erect, firmly, unhesitatingly about the two cities, people looked and wondered. The story of the remarkable case has become the marvel of the two counties. Exactly as Mr. Woodson told it to a Times reporter, it is here published:

"For ten years I have suffered the torments of the damned and have been a useless invalid; to-day I am a well and hearty man, free from almost every touch of pain. I don't think man ever suffered more acute and constant agony than I have since 1884. The rheumatism started then in my right knee, and after weeks of suffering in bed I was at last relieved sufficiently to arise, but it was only to get about on crutches for five years, the ailment having settled in the joint. Despite constant treatment of the most eminent physicians the rheumatism grew worse, and for the last four years I have been compelled to go about bent half toward the ground. In the winter of 1890-91, after the rheumatism had settled into its most chronic form, I went to Kansas City upon advice of my brother, and for six weeks I was treated in one of the largest and best known dispensaries of that city, but without the slightest improvement. Before I came home I secured a strong galvanic battery, this I used for months with the same result. In August, 1892, I went to St. Louis, and there conferred with the widely known Dr. Mudd of hospital practice fame, and Dr. Kale of the city hospital. None of them would take my case with any hope of affording me more than temporary relief, and so I came home, weak, doubled with pain, helpless and despondent.

"About this time my attention was called to the account of a remarkable cure by Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People of locomotor ataxia, rheumatism and paralysis. I ordered some of the pills as an experiment. When I began to take them, the rheumatism had developed into a phase of paralysis; my leg from the thigh down was cold all the time and could not be kept warm. In a short time the pills were gone, and so was the cane. I was able to attend to the duties of my office, to get about as a well and strong man. I was free from pain, and I could enjoy a sound and restful night's sleep, something I had not known for ten years. To-day am practically, and, I firmly believe, permanently cured of my terrible and agonizing ailment. No magician of the Far East ever wrought the miracle with his wand that Dr. Williams' Pink Pills did for me."

To verify the story beyond all question of doubt Mr. Woodson made the following affidavit:

State of Missouri, } ss.
County of Bates, }

I, M. M. Woodson, being duly sworn on my oath state that the following statements are true and correct as I verily believe. M. M. Woodson.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 3d day of March, 1894.

John D. Moore, Notary Public.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People are manufactured by the Dr. Williams' Medicine Company, Schenectady, N. Y., and are sold only in boxes bearing the firm's trade mark and wrapper, at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50. Bear in mind that Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are never sold in bulk or by the dozen or hundred, and any dealer who offers substitutes in this form is trying to defraud you and should be avoided. Dr. Williams' Pink Pills may be had of all druggists or direct by mail from Dr. Williams Medicine Co.

Beatrix Randolph.

By JULIAN HAWTHORNE.

He said that love did unquestionably exist, and that it was the strongest and most enduring passion of the human heart, but that it by no means followed that we could always love the same person with equal fervor. Life was growth, and love, which was the essence of life, must therefore be subject to growth likewise. As we developed, as our minds and capacities expanded, we put aside the things of our less mature time, and embraced the interests and the loves corresponding to our larger sphere. There was one love for childhood, another for youth, another for the prime of life. The greater a person's inherent scope and energy, the finer his organization, the more often would he find it necessary to change the object of his affections. To do so was not in opposition to true morality, but in obedience to it; but society, consulting solely its own selfish convenience, had artificially and arbitrarily made such acts criminal, and had thereby bewildered and mortally injured myriads of innocent human beings.

To this the prima donna replied that love could grow illimitably without danger of ever outgrowing its object. The need was not of more to love, but to love more. God, who was love itself, loved the meanest of his creatures, and what God loved that, surely, is not unworthy the affection of the most richly endowed of mankind. As Jocelyn did not immediately confute this argument the prima donna arose and gently intimated that it was necessary for her to be alone in order to prepare for the evening's performance.

Jocelyn ought to have known the futility of argument with a woman about a subject in which the emotions are mainly involved. Even if he had demonstrated his proposition and obtained her assent to it, he would not have been a bit nearer his goal. A woman overpowered by passion will act in direct opposition to the most elementary dictates of reason; and the same woman will not swerve a hair's breadth from the path of rectitude if the most unanswerable logical demonstration do not tally with her emotional prepossession. The fatal flaw in Jocelyn's syllogism was Jocelyn himself. Man may sometimes be led by the intellect, but woman only by the heart—and by curiosity.

After the above discussion it became vaguely apparent to Jocelyn that the prima donna was drifting away from him. She parried his attempts at familiar intercourse gently but effectively. He had in fact done her a service against his own interests. He had assisted her to formulate her instinctive recoil from the view which he sought to inculcate. It was incumbent upon him, therefore, to take some practical step. The close of the season was at hand.

While he was racking his brains as to what he should do, accident came opportunely to his aid. As he was walking about one evening behind the scenes, while the opera was in progress, a carpenter, who was tinkering a defective joint in the scenery up somewhere in the wings, let fall a chisel, which struck Jocelyn on the head, inflicting a superficial but alarming looking wound along the right side of his forehead. He staggered and fell, and blood streamed down his face. A surgeon was sent for, and meanwhile Jocelyn was removed into the prima donna's dressing room. Just then the prima donna, warm and palpitating from her scene, came in with glowing cheeks and sparkling eyes, the thunder of applause still sounding in her ears.

Jocelyn's ghastly aspect filled her with compassion and tenderness. She knelt down beside him where he lay upon the sofa, dipped her handkerchief in water, and with soft murmurs of sympathy and ruth washed the blood away from his wound. He recognized his good luck and lay still for a time, apparently in the dead faint that precedes dissolution. But watching his opportunity when they were left alone for a few minutes he faltered out an entreaty to be lifted to a sitting position, and when she clasped her strong young arms about him to accomplish his desire she found herself unawares entangled in his embrace, and before she could extricate herself she felt his lips on her cheek.

She placed him in the attitude he wished, and then got slowly and wearily to her feet, her face pale and her eyes dark.

"So," she said, with a perceptible intonation of contempt, "I was not mistaken!"

"Forgive me, Beatrix," he sighed out, still affecting to be overcome by weakness. "I could not help it. Darling girl, I love you so! I can fight against it no longer."

"I might have known that you were like the others—or worse," said she, "but I could not believe it till now. I shall never be mistaken again."

"Oh, Beatrix! have you no pity—no consideration for—for my condition? Heaven knows how I have struggled! Take off this bandage," he continued querulously, snatching away the handkerchief from his forehead. "Let me bleed to death—I will not live without you!"

"It will take you a long time to bleed to death, Mr. Jocelyn," returned she quietly. "I shall not be able to wait for you. Perhaps Madame Bemax will. Shall I call her?"

"You shall not speak to me in that tone!" exclaimed Jocelyn, raising himself on his couch in real or feigned passion. "I have not deserved it! Have I not done everything for you? Have you forgotten what you owe me?"

"You cannot have forgotten that I long since told you I could never marry you, so how could you expect that I would pay you what I owe with myself?"

"I am not a man to make cold blooded calculations!" said he, getting impulsively on his legs. "If you had any heart you would understand, Beatrix," he went on, suddenly changing his tone and attempting to seize her hands; "I do not ask an irrevocable compact—I do not hope that you can love me always. You will go on, I know, and leave me behind. But, oh! my dearest one, would you regret in the future that is before you, and which my poor aid will have helped you to enjoy—will you regret, then, having made a man who loves you insanely—having made him, for a little while only, the happiest of human beings? You may be loved by younger men than I, and handsomer and richer but never"——

"Mr. Jocelyn," she interposed, with a manner that indicated a lamentable hardening of her once sweet and gracious nature, "if you would look at yourself in the glass you would understand why I appear so unsympathetic. Even a prima donna, who holds herself at the beck and call of every good looking fellow who happens to take a fancy to her—even I cannot listen to you until you have washed your face. Perhaps you had better not use my washstand—people are so censorious, and your sensibilities are so delicate; but if you will go to your own place and get yourself in presentable condition then you may come to-morrow and we will talk over your proposal as quietly as your passion will admit. I will ask my father and Gen. Inigo to be present as witnesses and to offer suggestions; for you are so young and impulsive that perhaps I might otherwise get the better of you. I think I hear some one coming," she added, laying her hand upon the door latch; "perhaps it would be pleasanter for you to go out of your own accord, instead of waiting to be—assisted!"

Jocelyn departed, feeling sore outside and in. But he fancied he knew a way to make the prima donna regret his dismissal.

CHAPTER XII.

"TO BE HONEST, AS THIS WORLD GOES."

"There's nothing in it that you may not see; will you read it?"

Mr. Wallie Dinsmore had been indulging in a good deal of casuistry of late, owing to a desire to reconcile his theory that human beings ought to help one another with his temperamental aversion to being mixed up in other people's affairs. He might have evaded the difficulty by handing over the matter which troubled him to Mrs. Cadwalader; but that would only have been an indirect way of forcing his own hand. He smoked a great number of cigars, seated in his study chair, and incidentally tried to stare his great white owl out of countenance; but he hesitated still.

One morning while thus occupied he heard a carriage stop at the door and a card was brought up to him. Contrary to his usual custom in such cases, he jumped up, tossed his cigar into the fire, gave a pull to his collar and a jerk to his coat, and bade the servant conduct Mlle. Marana upstairs.

By the time she appeared he had recovered his genial serenity. He shook hands with her with the quiet cordiality of a man constantly in the habit of receiving famous prime donne in his private sitting room, and at the same time gave the servant a look which intimated that he would be not at home while this visitor remained.

"You come in good season," said he, "the owl and I have just been talking about you."

"I did not ask for Mrs. Dinsmore," began the prima donna.

"Well, I know," interposed Wallie. "I have often tried to persuade her that the morning is the proper time to receive calls, but she is still wedded to her superstitions. You must try to put up with me. I believe I should make a pretty good aunt."

The lady felt the kindness with which he endeavored to put her at her ease, and a faint color dawned in her cheeks. He went on:

"I see by the papers that you are soon to leave us. It must be pleasant to you to feel how much respect and regard, as well as renown, you have won since you came here. I hope it may soon bring you back to us?"

"Do you respect me, Mr. Dinsmore?" demanded she, fixing her eyes on him.

"You were an enigma to me at first," he replied immediately, "but I respected you involuntarily, even before I knew that I was right in doing so."

He met her look as he spoke, and she felt that he spoke what he meant.

"I came to ask you to help me respect myself," she said, with a pause between. "Did you know that I was an actress as well as a singer?"

"I knew what you refer to the first moment we met," answered he, with a friendly smile. "I had seen Mlle. Marana abroad."

She did not need to ask him whether he had kept her secret. Between persons of a certain order of integrity assurances of such a kind are superfluous. She breathed a sigh of relief. He had known, and yet had not withheld his respect, the respect of a gentleman. Her sad heart began to take a little courage.

"I think I know your father, Mr. Randolph," he resumed, with the slightest accent of interrogation. "You must not think me a Paul Pry, but Mr. Randolph is a gentleman of the old school, not a good dissimulator, and he accidentally betrayed himself to me one day without knowing it. Perhaps I ought to have confessed to him, but I am a wretchedly undecided mortal about such things, and I have been debating for the last month what I had better do. More than a month; in fact, ever since Geoffrey Bellingham went away."

As he carelessly uttered the last words his glance passed over her. She did not move an eyelid. Her breath stopped for a few moments, but that could not be seen.

"She has already learned some things, poor girl!" thought Wallie to himself. "Your main object in entering the profession must be nearly achieved," he presently continued, as she remained silent.

"You think it was only the object that justified me?" she said quickly.

"If I were you," he replied, "I would be myself in the future."

"But can I sing any more?"

"Speaking for the public, I should say sing on forever. You have gained a footing from which nothing can dislodge you. You need no other woman's reputation, and the public will easily forgive you the ruse you have put upon them; indeed they have nothing to forgive."

"I would rather you found fault with me than made it easy for me," she said, with a tremor in her voice. "There is no one else I can go to."

"I don't think you need a scolding," returned Wallie, with his kindly smile. "The past is done with. I can imagine you have had an uphill time of it in many ways. But you have gone far to rehabilitate completely Mlle. Marana's character, and I should fancy she would be very reluctant to have it known that she cannot claim the merit of the vindication. Another season you would probably be free from vulgar annoyance, even were you to continue your present disguise, but in your own name and with the outside protection which it would enable you to command you would be perfectly secure. However, I sha'n't pretend to advise you, Mademoiselle—Miss Randolph. In the first place I am an interested party—I want you to go on singing for my own benefit; and, furthermore, I cannot tell how far the pleasures of the profession may seem to you to outweigh the drawbacks—or vice versa."

"It's the only thing I'm good for—that's all," said she, looking up at him.

"I wonder what Geoffrey would say to that?" thought Wallie. "By Jove! it's outrageous what fools these boys and girls will be. They will—they seem to like it! Well, then, they deserve to have their little miseries, don't they? Of course they do! I wish I were"—he checked himself and dropped his eyes, which had dwelt too long upon her loveliness. "Come, come," he said to himself severely, "this will never do. Attend to your business, old two-and-forty, and pay proper reverence to your daughter!"

He got up and said aloud:

"Miss Randolph, I'm going to ask you a great favor. I'm an old man, as I needn't tell you, and I am a slave to my habits. Would you permit me to smoke a cigarette? What small wits I have go hopelessly wool gathering if I don't keep them together with a little tobacco."

Miss Randolph smiled.

"My father always smoked," said she. "It would make me feel at home."

"Dear me!" thought Wallie ruefully, "she might have let me off as an elder brother! But she takes me at my own valuation—bless her heart! Now let us see what can be done."

He lit his cigarette, and sent the smoke curling through his nose. "Art is certainly a great resource," he observed, "and a noble one. It has been said, and it may be true, that it admits of no rivals. If one's affections are unoccupied—one's human affections, I mean—and are likely to remain so, I dare say one could not do better than to devote one's self wholly to art. You feel, you say, that there is nothing else you could possibly prefer to it; that you were made for music and for nothing else?"

"Nothing else," she repeated in a husky voice, feeling as if, with those words, she had surrendered her last secret of hope of happiness.

"This will come out all right," thought Wallie to himself cheerfully; "if that ass Geoffrey were only here it might be settled on the spot." Aloud he said: "That being the case, I don't see how you could be more fortunately situated. With you circumstances, expediency and inclination all pull together. It was not so with a young friend of mine once who showed remarkable talent for the stage. She had got so far as to make her debut, with every prospect of success, when she was unlucky enough to fall in love with—and be fallen in love with by—a young gentleman of good family here, a lawyer. You will hardly believe it, Miss Randolph, you are so differently constituted in every way from her," continued Wallie, gravely; "but when she discovered that he would feel pained if she remained on the stage she actually gave up her whole career! And they were married, and she has never been heard of in a public way since. And she seems very happy too! But she could never have had the same single hearted devotion to art that you have."

Why a Sheriff Cannot Be Re-elected.

The reason why the sheriff of New York cannot be elected to two successive terms is this: It is the sheriff's duty to carry out the process of courts against official delinquents during trial and after conviction. Should a sheriff endeavor forcibly to hold over for a second time after having been defeated for re-election he would be the instrument of the court's process against himself—a paradoxical position which the law avoids by making him ineligible for re-election.—New York Sun.

EXPENSIVE ECONOMY.

Some people begrudge the little money that an Allcock's Porous Plaster costs, and then when they are wracked with pain from a lame back, or from the soreness arising from a cold, they will spend any amount of money to relieve the pain. If they only had one of these world-renowned plasters on hand they would be saved a vast amount of suffering and be considerably richer. At the first sign of stiffness of the joints apply one of these plasters without any delay. The soreness will be greatly relieved at once and soon disappear entirely. It will be money saved to have them on hand, to say nothing of the comfort they bring.

Brandreth's Pills contain no irritating matter.

Fond Wife (pouting)—You think more of your books than you do of me. Loving husband—My darling, I never have to read the same book twice.

BRACE THE NERVES.

Sedatives and opiates won't do it. These nervines do not make the nerves strong, and failing to do this fall short of producing the essential of their quietude—vigor. And while in extreme cases—and these only—of nervous irritation such drugs may be advisable, their frequent use is highly prejudicial to the delicate organism upon which they act, and in order to renew their quieting effect increased and dangerous doses eventually become necessary. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is an effecient substitute for such pernicious drugs. It quiets the nerves by bracing, toning, strengthening them. The connection between weakness of the nervous system and that of the organs of digestion is a strong and sympathetic link. The Bitters, by imparting a healthful impulse to the digestive and assimilating functions, promotes throughout the whole system a vigor in which the nerves come in for a large share. Use the Bitters in malaria, constipation, bilious and kidney trouble.

A FRENCHMAN'S LUCK.

Nicholas Buchy Wins $4,000 in the Honduras National Lottery Drawing.

Nicholas Buchy, a Frenchman who keeps a wine house and boarders at 253 South Sixth St., is going about his duties with a bouyant heart, and his joy is shared by his faithful wife and five loving children and his many friends generally.

Nicholas' happiness is based on the fact that he received a check from the Honduras National Lottery Company (Louisiana State Lottery) for $4,000 the result of a lucky one dollar investment, which he made recently.

Mr. Buchy was absent from his wine house this morning, but his good wife, a woman of prepossessing appearance, confirmed the news of her husband's great, good fortune, and added: "It came just in the nick of time, too, for business has been poor and Nicholas had lost considerable money because of it, and sickness in the family, not to mention the helping hand which he extendid to worthy but poor neighbors."

Madame Buchy in speaking of her husband's fortune smiled beamingly on all around her and did not hesitate to assert that her good man had only gotten his deserts. In this she was enthusiastically seconded by those who sat sipping wine and drinking beer at the table in the large and scrupulously clean barroom. Buchy is one of five who will have divided among them the second capital prize of $20,000.

Buchy was born near Strasburg, Alsace-Lorraine, 63 years ago, but came to Philadelphia 41 years ago. For 31 years he followed his trade, that of a tin and sheet-iron worker, managing by diligence and thrift to comfortably support his wife, whom he had courted and won in his native land, and a growing family.

In addition to providing for his family Buchy would, now and then, take a modest chance "just to woo dame fortune" as he told his children better half.

On the occasion of the drawing of June 12 last Buchy was delighted to fine that he had won at last.

Buchy has told his friends that his good fortune will not cause him to change his mode of life, and that he will continue to conduct his wine house opposite the square.—Philadelphia (Pa.) News, July 11.

$100 REWARD, $100.

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure now known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers, that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of Testimonials.

SEVERE EXPOSURE

Often results in colds, fevers, rheumatism, neuralgia and kindred derangements. We do not "catch cold" if we are in good condition. If the liver is active, and the system in consequence doing its duty, we live in full health and enjoy life "rain or shine." To break up a cold there's nothing so valuable as Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets. They keep the whole system regulated in a perfectly natural way. If we do not feel happy, if we worry and grumble, if we are morbid, if the days seem dreary and long, if the weather is bad, if things go awry, it is the liver which is at fault. It is generally "torpid." A common sense way is to take Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets. We generally eat too much, take insufficient exercise, by means of which our tissue-changes become indolent and incomplete. Be comfortable—you are comfortable when well. CLIP, SAVE AND SEND TO US

Do we not present a smiling countenance? Why should we not? It is true we have been overworked and even with our greatly increased facilities, have had to work nights, to supply the demands made upon us for Aermotors, tanks and towers. This ever increasing, never ceasing demand for our goods, even in times of great business depression, makes us tired, but happy, as witness the smiling countenance in our glittering Aermotor. While others cannot get work to do, we are overwhelmed with it. Why? Because we make the best thing that can be made, of the best material that is made, at the lowest price that ever was made, and back it all by the best reputation ever made for knowing what to do, how to do it and invariably accomplishing the result. All the world knows that the Aermotor Co. alone knows how to make Windmills, steel towers and tanks. Orders for them pour in upon us from every nook and corner of the earth. A business depression in any one locality is not felt by us. The world is our field. Is it, therefore, any wonder that we are busy and are doubling our last year's output, even in these days of depression? Everyone on the Aermotor premises, from the office boy to the owners, presents this well fed, smiling countenance. All are prosperous, busy, happy—work is plenty, and prosperity attends the designers, makers, managers and sellers of Aermotors. Even the purchasers of Aermotors are the wide-awake, intelligent, up-to-the-times cash buyers in any community. Aermotor people have no forebodings of disaster and hard times. Aermotor employes never strike. They are prosperous and contented. Even in the civil commotion and great upheaval recently raging in Chicago, the Aermotor people were at work, radiant with smiles and good cheer, and ready to help bring and welcome back the general prosperity, which must, at once, inevitably return to our land.

QUEER THINGS IN ANIMAL LIFE.

The greyhound runs by sight only. This is a fact. The carrier pigeon flies his hundreds of miles homeward by eyesight, noting from point to point objects that he has marked. This is only conjecture. The dragon fly, with 12,000 lenses in his eye, darts from angle to angle with the rapidity of a flashing sword, and as rapidly darts back, not turning in the air, but with a clash reversing the action of his four wings and instantaneously calculating the distance of the objects or he would dash himself to pieces. But in what conformation of the eye does this power consist? No one can answer.

Ten thousand mosquitoes dance up and down in the sun, with the minutest interval between them, yet no one knocks another headlong on the grass or breaks a leg or a wing, long and delicate as they are. Suddenly a peculiar, high-shouldered, vicious creature, with long and pendant nose, darts out of the rising and falling cloud, and settling on your cheek, inserts a poisonous sting. What possessed the little wretch to do this? Did he smell your blood while he was dancing? No one knows.

A carriage comes suddenly upon some geese in a narrow road and drives straight through the flock. A goose was never yet fairly run over, nor a duck. They are under the very wheels and hoofs, and yet they contrive to flap and waddle safely off. Habitually stupid, heavy and indolent, they are nevertheless equal to any emergency.

Why does the lonely woodpecker, when he descends from his tree and goes to drink, stop several times on his way and listen and look around before he takes his draught? No one knows. How is it that the species of an ant which is taken in battle by other ants to be made slaves should be the black or negro ant? No one knows.

The power of judging of actual danger and the free and easy boldness that results from it are by no means uncommon. Many birds seem to have a correct notion of a gun's range, and are scrupulously careful to keep beyond it. The most obvious resource would be to fly right away out of sight and hearing, but this they do not choose to do.

A naturalist of Brazil gives an account of an expedition that he made to one of the islands of the Amazon to shoot spoonbills, ibises and other magnificent birds which are abundant there. His design was completely baffled, however, by a wretched little sandpiper, which preceded him, continually uttering his tell-tale cry, which at once aroused all the birds within hearing. Throughout the day did this individual bird continue its self-imposed duty of sentinel to others, effectually preventing the approach of the hunter to the game, and yet managing to keep out of the range of his gun.—Philadelphia Times.

PRETTIEST HAND OF ALL.

Since iron came into use the towering form of the smith, as we have watched the sparks fly from his anvil, has stood for the synonym of manly strength, integrity and honesty. Novelists have written him a hero, poets have sung of his strong arms and his broad forehead, and Mr. Murray, in beautiful measure, has related the true incident of "The Smith of Ragenbach," who saved the lives of a hundred children, himself perishing in the effort.

A few weeks since I was at M——, and my business being completed, I inquired if there were any whist players in town, and was referred to Judge B——. I timidly entered his office, introduced myself, and in less than a minute the judge's desk was closed and he was at the telephone calling for Colonel H——. No words were wasted. All he said was: "Colonel, get Dave and come here at once." He then dropped on his knees, removed a few dusty law books, and brought forth a complete duplicate set, national method, cards and all. At this instant there entered two men—one with a clean-cut, classical face, who was introduced as Colonel H——, editor of a local paper. The other was in his shirt sleeves, more or less soot was on his open, frank face, and his hands bore the marks of having been washed for the occasion. He was introduced as "Dave, our blacksmith."

For over two hours scarcely a word was spoken. Twenty hands forward—twenty hands back—520 tricks. Then the score was counted, and the gain was one for the Judge and the Colonel. It appeared to be a greater triumph than winning a case in court. The judge's tongue was loosened, and he told of this, and that, and the other, closing with a description of the prettiest hand he ever saw. Then the Colonel told of a pretty hand. Perhaps I, in a dull way, said something. The blacksmith, in almost a drawling tone, said: "The hand that I remember was first white, and plump, and dimpled, perfect in shape. As time wore on it became broader and darker. Then the fingers grew longer, the wrinkles came, the nails were easily broken and uneven, a little wart was on the thumb, the little blood vessels were clearly marked, and the blue veins stood out conspicuously on the back. It was the prettiest hand I ever saw. It was my wife's hand. Do you not remember, Judge," colonel? Three years ago this afternoon we filled her grave with flowers and tears."

In that old lawyer's office, the walls covered with cobwebs and blackened with smoke, four strong men wept like babies, and three of us mentally thanked God that in this cold, selfish world there was at least one tender-hearted man. Time may go on in its usual way—men may come and men may go—sorrows and joys alike may pass; but this one afternoon, and this one man, will never by me be forgotten.—I. W. H., in Whist.

SLUMS OF BIG CITIES.

Results of the Investigation Ordered by Congress.

CONDENSATION OF THE FACTS.

Light on Chicago, New York, Baltimore and Philadelphia.—Percentage of Sickness Very Small.

Commissioner of Labor Carroll D. Wright has forwarded to the President his seventh special report, which relates entirely to the slums of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Chicago, being the results of an investigation ordered by Congress.

As the result of his researches, Commissioner Wright has compiled the following:

The cities comprehended in this resolution are Baltimore, Boston, Brooklyn, Buffalo, Chicago, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Detroit, Milwaukee, New Orleans, New York, Philadelphia, Pittsburg, St. Louis, San Francisco and Washington—sixteen in all, with a total population of 8,037,458. Before entering upon the investigation, an estimate was made of the total population of the slum districts of the cities named, and it was found that, according to the best information obtainable from the municipal authorities of the different cities, the slum districts in the sixteen cities named comprehended at the least calculation about 800,000 people. The work which the Department of Labor had in hand prevented entering at once upon the investigation called for by the joint resolution referred to, but preliminary studies were made of the cities, resulting in the conclusion that the sum of $20,000 appropriated by the resolution, was altogether inadequate for the collection of the facts called for. An estimate for additional appropriation was therefore made, but Congress took the ground that it was better to make a tentative investigation in accordance with the resolution, even if for only certain districts of certain cities comprehended in the resolution. This was probably a wise conclusion. The results of the present investigation, therefore, relate only to the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Chicago, and to certain districts within the cities concerning which there can be no differences of opinion as to whether or not they are slum districts.

The total population canvassed in the four cities is 83,852. The districts selected by no means contain the whole slum population of the cities included in the investigation. According to the best estimates the total slum population of Baltimore, is about 25,000; of Chicago, 162,000; of New York, 360,000; of Philadelphia, 35,000. The districts selected are among the worst in the city, and may be denominated as the centers of the slum population. The investigation has been conducted relative to this number of people in the four cities named for the sum appropriated in the resolution.

It should be borne in mind that in each city all the inhabitants of the districts selected have been brought under the investigation. In every district there are to be found people of the highest respectability, people of means living in good houses, etc. They have all been considered as inhabitants of the slum districts, and necessarily so, because the enumerators or agents engaged in collecting the facts should not be expected in each case to draw the line.

The following is a brief summary of some of the results of the investigation:

Liquor Saloons—In the city of New York there was, at the time of the investigation, one liquor saloon to every 200 persons, but in the slum district canvassed there was one saloon to every 129 persons. In Philadelphia, in the city at large, there was one liquor saloon to every 870 persons, but in the slum district canvassed there was one such saloon to every 502 persons. In Baltimore, in the city at large, there was one saloon to every 228 persons, but in the slum district canvassed there was one saloon to every 105 persons. In Chicago, in the city at large, there was one saloon to every 212 persons, while in the district canvassed there was one saloon to every 127 persons. In these calculations fractions have been dropped.

Sex—Comparing the sex of the population in the slum districts canvassed with that of the whole city, it is found that in each case the males predominate to a greater extent in the slum districts. In Baltimore, in the city at large, 47.44 per cent. of the population are males, while in the slum district selected the males constitute 49.84 per cent. of the population. In Chicago the difference is between 51.68 per cent. for the whole city and 53.93 per cent. for the slum district. In New York the difference is between 49.34 per cent. of the whole city and 54.61 per cent. for the slums. In Philadelphia it is between 48.82 per cent. for the city at large, and 53.48 for the slum district.

Native and Foreign-Born—The total foreign-born in the city of Baltimore is 15.88 per cent. of the total population, but in the slum distirct canvassed it is 40.22 per cent.; in Chicago the total foreign-born in the city at large constitutes 40.98 per cent. of the population, while in the slum district it is 57.51 per cent.; in New York the foreign-born is 42.23 per cent. of the total population, while in the slum district it is 62.58 per cent., and in Philadelphia the foreign-born constitutes 25.74 per cent. of the total population, and 60.45 per cent. of the slum population. These figures show conclusively that the proportion of foreign-born persons in the slums of each city is largely in excess of the proportion of the whole population. This excess is in Baltimore, 24.34 per cent.; in Chicago, 16.53 per cent.; in New York, 20.25 per cent., and in Philadelphia, 34.71 per cent.

Voters—In the city of Baltimore 20.13 per cent. of all the voters of the city are foreign-born, but in the slum districts canvassed 44.04 per cent. of the voters are foreign-born. The variation in Chicago is not so great, the foreign-born voters of the whole city being 50.62 per cent., and in the slum districts canvassed 61.31. Of the whole number of voters in New York city, 49.93 per cent. are foreign-born, while in the slum district canvassed 62.44 per cent. are foreign-born. In Philadelphia the differences are greater, 29.94 per cent. of the total voters being foreign-born and 58.94 per cent. of the voters of the slum district belonging to that class.

Occupations—The occupations of the residents of the slum districts in the four cities named are as varied, probably, as in the cities at large, but direct comparisons with the occupations of the whole city in each case cannot be made, as the classification of occupations, as shown by the eleventh census, are not yet ready for use.

Earnings—The earnings of the people living in the slum districts canvassed are quite up to the average earnings of the people generally and at large, but as there are no data with which to make comparisons of average earnings, the results of this investigation must practically stand alone, yet from all that can be learned from various sources, the statement made is believed to be correct.

Health—The agents and experts employed in this investigation were nearly unanimous in the opinions they expressed relative to the health of the people of the slum districts. It should be remembered that this investigation was conducted in the most thorough census manner, each and every house and every tenement in every house being visited and the facts taken down for each and every individual living in the slum districts. The testimony of the agents therefore, relative to general conditions, is most valuable. The statistics drawn from the schedule replies show no greater sickness prevailing in the districts canvassed than in other parts of the cities involved, and, while the most wretched conditions were found here and there, the small number of sick people discovered was a surprise to the canvassers. It may be that owing to the time of year (late spring), the people were living with open windows, and thus not subjected to the foul air which might be found in winter. A supplementary investigation, however, made in winter, discloses substantially the same conditions.

Persons to Each Dwelling—According to the eleventh census the number of persons to a dwelling in Baltimore was 6.2; in Chicago, 8.6; in New York, 18.52; in Philadelphia, 5.60. The averages for the slum districts are about the same for Baltimore and Philadelphia, there being in the former city 7.71 persons to a dwelling, and in Philadelphia 7.34 persons, but in Chicago the slum population averages 15.51 persons to each dwelling, and in New York 36.79 persons.

CANCER AND PORK.

It is a humiliating fact that little is known yet as to the most prominent factors in the production of cancer. That a large number of cases occur from local irritation, for instance, cancer of the lips and mouth from smoking tobacco has been demonstrated, but there is a large number of cases where no such cause can be reasonably assinged.

An unusual cativity is being manifested abroad, however, at this time by some of the most renowned investigators. A league has been formed for the purpose of investigating this disease as tuberculosis was investigated, and if possible to require it to give up some of its secrets. That the number of cases is yearly increasing is sadly too true.

Some startling revelations along this line are already being made and promulgated by those eminent investigators, M. M. Verneuil, of Paris, and Roux, of Lausanne. They are, as the result of observation and research, disposed to regard it as being caused most frequently by the use of pork.

M. Verneuil in some former article declared that there was a marked relationship between the abuse of meat food and cancer. In following up this line of thought more closely he was led to conclude that the use of pork was a special source of danger, and said it was well worth considering if this was not the sole cause. He arrived at and enunciated, the following proposition: "In the course of a long and laborious surgical career, it was observed that the sIraelites who follow closely the laws of Moses respecting the use of pork as an article of food, are always refractory to cancer; and that this idea had presented itself afresh in connection with two special cases."

M. Roux gives his experience as strikingly confirmatory of conclusions reached by his renowned colleague.

This is an interesting question and should be looked at without prejudice, and divested of all mercenary or commercial considerations. The position assumed is not illogical. It is well-known that certain animal foods result in special diseases or symptoms. It is well known that in many persons shrimps, lobsters and crabs produce urticaria, and that diseased meat produces intestinal and gastric irritation. It was a common belief among the ancients that pork produced leprosy, and a common belief prevails that the frequency with which leprosy is found in the Bergen district in Norway is attributed to the fact that fish constitutes almost the entire diet of the people. It will be a satisfaction to know that these investigations will not rest at this stage, but will be prosecuted with vigor until the cause of this most alarming and fatal disease has been fully demonstrated.

The good die young—at least so far as chickens are concerned.

RULERS IN EXILE.

What France Has Wrought in this Way.

SOME HOPELESS KINGS INTERNED.

Compulsory Guests of Alien Countries.—Misfit Crown Wearers Scattered Along the Algerian Coast.

A correspondent of the New York "Sun," in Algiers, writes: "When Daudet wrote his 'Rois on Exil,' he only recorded the trials, sufferings, humiliations and banishment of European princes. There is yet another book to write on the vicissitudes of the unhappy Eastern potentates who have experienced the same mortifications and sorrows and have been compelled by superior powers to change the barbaric splendor of their native courts for a life of more or less gilded captivity as the compulsory guests of alien countries.

"Prince Duong Chaer, the little Cambodian prince, has just been 'interned,' to use the euphonious term of diplomacy, in Algeria, by the will of the French government, adding one more name to the list of the rulers once omnipotent, but now condemned to obscure mediocrity and passive inactivity, passing from a throne to the rocking chairs of cosmopolitan hotels, or the spurious comforts of a furnished European flat.

Some, like Duong Chaer's father, Norodom, may be allowed a palace in Africa, where they live on in the straight waitscoat of European politics. But the young are doomed; they will never handle the heavy scepter of their ancestors; they must renounce forever the absolute liberty that was their birthright, their mysterious orgies, their reckless expenditure, and voluptuous cruelty. They will use their eastern craft and subtlery in squabbling over the allowance they receive from the "protecting" government, and, perchance, under the outward semblance of a pacific bourgeois, indulge in dreams of retaliation. After them their children must choose between annihilation or completer neutralization.

At Djelfa, the small Algerian city half-way between Algiers and Laghonat, Duong Chaer will lead the sleepy, monotonous existence which will but rarely be relieved by the scanty distractions offered by the Kzar, or fortress of Boghari, which he was permitted to visit on his way to his ultimate destination.

It is the most interesting of the stations spaced on the road running from the Mediterranean seaboard to the Desert of Sahara. There, now that the era of bloodshed and fatal razzias is past, a population of petty tradesmen has arisen. They offer the varied types of many races, every religion, and every caste. Arabs, Muzabites, Spaniards, Sicilians, Jews, Christians, Mussulmans communicate with one another in a composite language, consisting but of few words, which they all understand, which enables them to exchange a limited number of ideas and to transact their business. At night the Kzar of Boghart magically assumes the aspect it must have originally worn; in the daytime it is a huge market, a noisy agglomeration of busy, hustling men, through whose crowds the Moorish horseman rides majestically or the solemn chanting cortege of a funeral forces its way. But in the upper portion of the city civilization, with its leveling influence, seems to have taken no hold. Figures flit by that might have stood by the tomb of a Cheops or a Sesostris; centuries have passed, mountians have been leveled, seas turned aside; alone the women of Bogbart have remained unchanged. Under their draperies they may still be Cleopatras, Salomes, Delilahs.

Duong Chaer is not the only exile on these shores. At Medeah dwells a prouder ruler than he could ever have been—the ex-King of Annam, Ham N'Ghi. He is a slender-looking young man, with a woman's face, on which it is difficult to decipher a thought, a desire, or a purpose. His delicate exterior conceals muscles of steel and a supple, athletic frame, hardened to every bodily exercise. In his exile the little dispossessed king preserves a royal impassibility.

He endures passively and hopes secretly for some providential intervention that will replace him on the throne of massive gold of his predecessors. He wears the costume of his country and eats after the Chinese fashion, but with the extraordinary adaptability of his race he has in many things adopted the habits of a more refined civilization. He is no longer the unclean object whose neglected and dirty appearance made him the laughing stock of the sailors on the ship that carried him off, whose naively paraded vices excited their censure. Today Ham N'Ghi is educated and clean; he has learned French, reads the papers, fences and shoots, paints in water colors under the tuition of a French artist, who recognizes real aptitude in his pupil, and has taken kindly to the bicycle, which he rides for miles under the burning sun of those laditudes.

Old Norodom is "interned" in the dreary palace of Phnum Penn, at some distance from the river. This edifice is composed of buildings, presenting the different and grotesque styles of the architecture of his native land and of Siam. A gilded dome is surmounted by the elephant tusk, symbolical of Buddha; a brightly painted minaret rears its gaudy crest on another roof. The palace is not one continuous structure; it is abruptly interrupted by open spaces united together by rough sheds and bamboo galleries; there are sharp angles and nicongruous turnings; the mournful silence is broken only by the trumpeting of elephants or the scream of an eagle high in the air, while the carrion birds can be seen hovering over the trenches in which corpses lie decaying.

This is the melancholy abode in which Norodom ends his worthless life. His majesty is very short, enormously stout and repulsively ugly. His eyes are lusterless; it is almost impossible to believe that any ideas have ever germinated under that narrow, receding forehead framed in tanlged, unkempt hair, alive with vermin. His blackened teeth are incrusted with gold ornaments; his long pointed nails are dyed pink. He wears a crimson silken blouse, embroidered with figures of gods and fantastic animals; his neck and arms are laden with necklaces and heavy rings and bracelets of chased gold; his feet are encased in red morocco sandals. He spends his days chewing betel, lying on a mattress with his boxes of aromatics and spittoons strewn around him so that he need have as little exertion as possible; his hands are generally crossed on his fat stomach; he arrely moves, and is surrounded by his minister and chief dignitaries, while his favorite slave is curled at his feet, rising only to replenish his provision of betel or to introduce other women who bring in his meals on silver plates. His chief food is rice and his drink Persian wine. He leaves his couch only to visit his elephants, of which he has a great number, and for which he keeps a special minister. This hideous and miserable old man will in all likelihood end his profitless days at Phnum Penh.

The palace contains numerous and immense rooms, furnished with gaudy and meretricious things purchased for large sums in Paris, which are slowly moldering away. Norodom never enters them; he prefers to wallow on a filthy crapet or worn piece of matting in a dirty shed into which insects, huge spiders, scorpions and cobras crawl at will, to nestle in the royal mattress. Norodom, although apparently unconscious of his degradation, is sad and weary even of his sloth, of his favorite betel root and of the servile adoration of his sycophants crouching round him in a nauseous atmosphere.

At night a slight animation runs through the shed and arouses its occupants; it is the time when women in brilliant and scanty draperies, enter and dance before the king in the attempt to bring a flash of lust before his filmy eyes; but he rarely vouchsafes them more than a vague, indifferent glance. If he thinks at all, which is doubtful, he maybe wonders supinely why these pale Europeans have deemed it worth their while to disturb the tenor of his former life, and why he was not permitted to remain an idle, voluptuous, cruel and imbecile despot, after his own fashion, in the land that was once entirely his own.

Will European politics, the beneficial influence of modern civilization, the presumed necessities of social equilibrium, finally reduce poor little Duong Chaer to the level of his father, or will he, under the paternal protectorate of the French government, abjure the hereditary tendencies of his race and develop into a more useful and intelligent member of society, while still cherishing the silent hopes and ambitions that sustain Ham N'Ghi in his captivity.

THE CHILDREN'S EYES.

That there is a large percentage of the young people and children of these days who are dependent upon the use of glasses for good sight, is a well known fact. That there must be a cause for this is equally apparent.

Formerly it was a rare sight to see a child with spectacles. Today it is a common thing, and especially among the children of the better class. Specialists assign various reasons for this degeneration—our habits of life as a paramount cause.

Plainer food, more out-of-door life, more sleep and less social dissipation, was the rule with our ancestors' children. The living rooms were not overheated with steam or furnace, and the ventilation must of necessity be better, because of the rude construction of the buildings, giving free admission of air through cracks in the walls and about windows and doors.

Whatever demands fixed application of sight is felt to be injurious for the little ones who are hardly more than babies. As the child grows older, study by gas or lamp light is a severe tax on the eyes, especially if the print is fine. The books used for school work ought to be printed in clear, large type.

The light for reading or study should not be a cross light or shine directly on the face, nor from the back, but should come from the left side. This is a point which cannot be too frequently emphasized, as too little attention is given it by teachers and parents.

The six-year-old daughter of a family living in the suburbs returned home the other day from accompanying her father to the train in a high state of excitement. To her mother's inquiries she answered, "I met a man you don't know, papa don't know, just me. He said: 'Good morning, Miss N., but,' with indingation, "he didn't shake his hat at me!"

Judge Ballinger, at Portland, has ruled that the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians had the effect of removing them from under the charge of Indian agents, and gave them the standing of American citizens. As such the United States laws governing Indian wards of the Government do not apply to them, and the selling of liquor to an Indian who is not in charge of a United States Indian agent is not punishable under the United States statutes.

Hutchings and Anderson, formerly of the crew of the notorious schooner Achilles, who are charged by Captain Oscar Bartel with having robbed the schooner's strongbox while the master was in Sitka jail, have been sent from Port Townsend to Sitka.

OLD SLEEPING CARS.

Travel Before the Days of Peripatetic Palaces.

CARS WITH THREE TIERS OF BERTHS

It is Claimed That Theodore T. Woodruff was the Originator of Sleeping Cars.

The labor troubles of the last few weeks, in which the Pullman Palace Car Company has been a central figure, have recalled to many of the older people of the present generation the times when there were no such things as sleeping cars, and travelers who were obliged to pursue their journey at night had only the alternative of trying or not trying to catch a few winks of sleep sitting upright in the uncomfortable, straight-backed seats. The time was not so very long ago, although the splendid and luxurious vestibuled trains of the present day seem perfect enough to have passed through a long period of evolution.

It was just about forty years ago that the idea of a sleeping car for night travel first took tangible form. To say positively that this or that man was the original inventor of the sleeping car would probably be met with protests and expressions of diverse opinions. The sleeping car, like the sewing machine and other modern necessities, was as much the product of popular demand as of the inventive genius of one man. The times called for them loudly, and it is not strange that the response came from a number of quarters at about the same time. Also, it is not strange that the response came from the mechanical genius of the United States.

The "American Railway" says that the prototypes of the sleeping car were used on the Cumberland Valley Railroad between Harrisburg and Cumberland as early as the winter of 1836-37. These cars, however, were not of the combination order, and they were abandoned in 1848.

According to the tradition preserved by the Wagner Palace Car Company, the originator of the sleeping car was Theodore T. Woodruff. The honor is also claimed for "Ben" Field, of Albion, in this State, once a prominent politician. Albion was the early residence of George M. Pullman, and it is to him, it is said, that the Pullman cars owe their origin. Mr. Woodruff prepared his model, it is said, in the office of James Tillinghast, at Rome, N. Y., in 1854. Mr. Tillinghast was then in the service of the Rome & Watertown Railroad. He did not have sufficient faith in Woodruff's invention to advance the money to have it patented. So, like many other inventors, as well as prophets, who have found little honor in their own country, Woodruff was obliged to go out from the original scene of his labors to find somebody to appreciate his new idea and to give him financial support.

Woodruff finally found a patron in Mr. Wason, the car builder of Springfield, Mass., to whom the inventor had gone with his precious model wrapped in an old bandanna handkerchief. Mr. Watson built a trial car, which made its first trip on the New York Central and the Rome & Western Railroad. The car was afterward run to Cleveland, Cincinnati and other western cities, where it was looked on as a great curiosity. It was finally sold to the Ohio & Mississippi Railroad Company, and was regularly run on its line for a number of years.

At first the new sleeping cars were more popular with passengers than with railroad managers. The railroad men looked at all improvements likely to increase the comfort of travel with distrust. They argued that the more convenience travelers had, the more they would want, and the cost of them to the companies would be enormous. They probably realized that more attractive traveling would increase the volume of travel, but their deductions as to the amount of traveling that would probably be done were drawn from the days of stage coaches, and they apparently never suspected what an immense impetus to travel, and what an enormous increase in their business would result from the adoption of such improvements as sleeping cars.

The public had its way, however, as it generally does, and in a few years sleepers were running on most of the prominent railroads of the United States.

The first sleepers that were built would not be considered fit to travel in now, but they were regarded as great luxuries then. A picture showing the interior of a Wagner sleeping car, in use on the New York Central Railroad was published in Frank "Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper" on April 30, 1859, and gives a good idea of the "luxuries of travel," as they existed thirty-five years ago. The fittings and furnishings were of the plainest sort. A shelf was placed across the seats, which accomodated passengers as usual in the daytime, to form the lower berth, and two were let down from the sides, forming three tiers of berths on each side of the car. The car was lighted by kerosene lamps, attached to the ceiling, and warmed by an old-fashioned wood stove, placed near the center of the car. By taking care in selecting the position of the berth, one might on a cold night have the privilege of sleeping in the temperature of the tropics, in the varying degrees of the temperate zone, or in the frigidity of the arctic circle, according as he should be near to or remote from the stove.

The man with a lantern in the center of the car is not the president of the road. He is the conductor. The coats of all the conductors in those days may not have fitted as well as does the one worn by the subject of the sketch, but all the conductors then wore high hats, and so did the engineers and firemen, and almost everybody else for that matter.

The exterior of the cars, like that of other passenger coaches of those days, was unornamented.

Accompanying the picture in "Frank Leslie's" was the following editorial comment, which is especially interesting as showing how this "step in the right direction" was regarded in 1859.

"In days gone by travelers might well have imagined that it was the object of the proprietors of public conveyances to render them as uncomfortable as possible. Now, at least in this country, it appears to be quite the reverse.

"Formerly traveling, among other inconveniences, implied a total abstinence from sleep, or if indulged in it was in such an uneasy posture that the sleeper awoke more fatigued than before. Now American ingenuity has invented a sleeping car which is in use on several of our long lines, in which, for a small increase in the fare, the traveler may enjoy his natural rest and yet not be retarded in his journey.

"Our illustration was drawn from one of the cars in use on the northern branch of the New York Central Railroad, on which line sleeping cars are attached to every night train. The cars may be used as ordinary day ones, but at night two shelves are let down from the ceiling and a third shelf is formed by letting down the backs of the seats. On each of these mattresses and bedding are placed, curtains closely drawn up during the day are let down, and the whole forms a very comfortable sleeping place about the size of a ship's berth.

"We are glad to see that some of the railroad companies have adopted these cars. It is a step in the right direction which will, without doubt, be soon followed by the directors of other railroads. In a pecuniary point of view it will certainly be profitable, as without calculating the income from the increased travel which always follows improvements, every traveler would gladly pay an increased fare for the accommodation."

Woodruff sold to Webster Wagner the right to build and use the sleeping cars on certain roads, and to George Gates, the rights of the patent on the Buffalo & Erie. Gates' establishment was kept up from 1859 to 1873, when it was merged into the Wagner Palace Car Company.

Wagner, who gave his name to the company, which has built all the palace cars for the Vanderbilt roads, was born near Palatine Bridge, N. Y., of German parentage. He learned the wagon-maker's trade, and used his skill to such good advantage that before he died he had the satisfaction of knowing that he was making some of the best vehicles in the world. Wagner made a fortune, and was elected to the State Senate. He was killed in one of his cars in a railroad accident at Spuyten Duyvil in 1882.

George M. Pullman was formerly a miner in Colorado. In 1858 he entered a train on the Lake Shore road at Buffalo. A sleeping car was making a trial trip on that train, and he resolved to try a berth. He was tossed about and made so uncomfortable that he arose before daybreak and spent the remainder of the night thinking what a pity it was that such an excellent idea as that of a sleeping car should be so crudely and uncomfortably carried out. Before he arrived in Chicago he made up his mind to build better sleeping cars than the one on which he was riding. His first cars were run on the Chicago & Alton Railroad in 1859. Abraham Lincoln was one of his early passengers, and the future President took the greatest interest in the invention, and had the construction of the car explained to him.

It was not until 1864 that the first combination day and sleeping car of the present type was built by Mr. Pullman. It cost $18,000, and was named Pioneer. It was lettered "A," for at that time it was not believed that there would ever be cars enough in use at one time to exhaust the letters of the alphabet.

The Pioneer was larger than the ordinary coaches, and it could not pass under some bridges nor by some platforms. When President Lincoln's body was taken from Chicago to Springfield on the Pioneer, however, the railroad company willingly removed the obstructions, and when General Grant took a trip west some months later, more platforms were adapted to the size of the Pioneer. In height and width the Pioneer set the standard for the size of all Pullman coaches, but the length has been increased.—New York Tribune.

KEEP YOUNG.

Judicious mental work may help to lift one out of the ruts of premature old age. Read and think what you read. Don't use your mind as if it were a sieve and you were trying to see how much you could pour through it. There is a belief extant that knowledge, if gained at all, must be acquired in youth. Fallacious theory! Behold Galileo at three score and ten pursuing his studies with unflagging zeal; Cato beginning Greek when advanced in years; Ogilby commenced classical studies when past fifty. Gladstone is as much the student today as when the bloom of youth mantled his cheek. Be kind to the feelings and fancies of youth. If they prove perennial, so much the better. Don't forbid yourself glad, recreative thoughts and action. Don't be ashamed to make yourself as pretty as you can. A sensible woman may feel a thrill of pleasure innocent as a maiden's when receiving a glance of respectful admiration from a manly form. Smile without affectation, be pleasant without being silly—in short, be young as long as you can.—Kate Field's Washington.

INDEPENDENCE, CAL.

FRIDAY, SEPT. 28 1894

The New York Tribune, in speaking of the recent Republican victory in Maine, says "that the good people of the Pine Tree state do not admire the socialistic income tax." The truth is that the people of Maine would have given "the socialistic income tax" their most hearty approval had the question ever been raised during the campaign. McKinley made a dozen of his most persuasive and euphonious high-tariff speeches in the state; but never once referred to the income tax; and the oratory of Hon. T. Buncombe Reed was singularly free from references to this subject. The Republican orators were wise in doing so and leaving the income tax to take care of itself. Everybody knows the object of the income tax. It was to compel non-resident Americans to bear their quota of the maintenance of this government. Such chaps as Mr. W. Waldorf Astor and other renegade Amercans, who "can't live anywhere but in London, you know," are the fellows that the authors of the income tax are after.

Notwithstandig all our political wiseacres have said about the dark days that were sure to come upon the country if a low tariff was inaugurated, the naion once more moves ahead and is rapidly regaining temporarilly her suspended vitality. The only sufferers are the beniciaries of the protected industries, and they have amassed such inordinate wealth under protective legislation that they cannot now well afford to groumble. Merchants are selling more goods because the panic is over, and people are buying more freely. And as the cares and troubles of the last two years recede farther and farther into the dim heretofore, men begin to understand that it was largely an effect of sentiment and that they were "more frightened than hurt."

The feeling that the members of the United States senate should be chosen by a direct vote of the people, instead of being elected by the legislatures of the several states, is one that has been long slumbering in the breasts of a dissatisfied people, but which received an additional impetus from the dilatory action of the late senate upon the tariff bill. And while the American people are gnerally hostile to any suggested change in the government handed down to us by the revolutionary fathers, yet the slow and sure deterioration of our upper house of the national congress has awaken d them to the absolute necessity of some salutary innovation that may inure to the good of the republic.

The old cry of give us lower taxes comes up from every corner of the state and all three of the gubernatorial candidates have already pledged themselves to the relief of an overtaxed people. But let us see what the man who is elected will do. We all well remember that similar pledges before election were made by Colonel Markham, but when once he was fairly installed in the gubernatorial chair all those pledges are fargotten. There certainly should be one man out of the three who has the moral courage to stick up, after election, for what he promised before eleceion.

The idea of Breckinridge contesting the result of last Saturday's primary election, is simply absurd. If by the aid of professional politicians by whom he is and always has been surrounded he should succeed in getting Mr. Owens counted out, what would the result be? Simply that Mr. Breckinridge would be snowed under at the general election and a Republican elected to represent the Ashland district. The people who flocked to the support of Owens in this fight did so from a deep-rooted belief that an untried man is better than one who has been tried with Breckinridge results.

It was a matter of much interest to California in general and his old district in particular, that Mr. Caminetti consented to run for Congress again. He has done much for our section and will be returned to finish up several matters that vitally concern us. People are looking more carefully into the worth of officers than they have ever done before and it goes without saying that Congressman Caminetti will succeed himself this time.

OUR MODERN PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

Ram it in, cram it in,
Children's heads are hollow;
Slam it in, jam it in,
Still there's more to follow;
Hygiene and history,
Astronomic mystery,
Algebra, histology,
Latin, etymology,
Botany, geometry,
Greek and trigonometry;
Ram it in, cram it in,
Children's heads are hollow.

Rap it in, tap it in,
What are teachers paid for?
Bang it in, slam it in;
What are children made for?
Ancient archæology,
Aryan philology,
Parsody, zoology,
Physics, climatology,
Calculus and mathematics,
Rhetoric and hydrostatics;
Hoax it in, coax it in,
Children's heads are hollow.

Scold it in, mold it in,
All that they can swallow;
Fold it in, hold it in,
Still there's more to follow.
Faces pinched, sad and pale,
Tell the same unvarying tale,
Tell of moments robbed from sleep,
Meals untasted, studies deep:
Those who've passed the furnace through
With aching brow will tell to you—

How the teacher crammed it in,
Rammed it in, jammed it in,
Crunched it in, punched it in,
Rubbed it in, clubbed it in,
Pressed it and caressed it in,
Rapped it in and slapped it in,
When their heads were hollow.

A DIPLOMATIC BOY.

His Reformation Was Sudden and Many Sided and Served His Purpose.

I have a little son 8 years old. He is smart and bright, and for mischievousness I think can't be beaten. I was sitting in a room one day reading and smoking, when he came sauntering up to me with the forefinger of his left hand in his mouth. I thought at the time that there was something wrong, but said nothing with regard to the same.

"Pa," he said after awhile, "I didn't get one demerit in school today."

"You didn't, Willie?" I interrogated, throwing a rather fierce look upon him. "Well, I'm sure that's a good showing."

"Yes, and I carried a bucket of coal up for Kate after school," he went on, still keeping that finger in his mouth.

"Why, you are getting very considerate," I returned.

"Yes, and I brushed your coat all off nice and clean."

"No, Willie; you didn't do that?" I asked, looking frowningly at him, for I knew he had been up to something.

"Yes, I did, pa, and I lit the gas in ma's room for her."

"Well, now."

"And I shined your best shoes until they glitter like Sister Lila's looking glass."

"Is that so? What else have you done?"

"Well, I studied all my lessons in school, got out at the regular time, said 'yes, sir,' to Uncle John and helped the hostler around the stable."

"Why, what is the matter with you? Are you going to get sick?"

"No, sir," he replied, twisting around a trifle, "but I'm going to be a better boy—at least for a while."

"You are? Well, I'm glad to hear that."

There was a short pause, and then he said: "Here, pa, are two cigars for you. I bought them with my own spending money. I'll buy you a boxful when I get money enough."

At this juncture he placed both little arms around my neck and sobbed aloud.

"Oh, pa," he asked, "do you like your little boy?"

"Why, of course I do," I replied, getting alarmed. "Are you ill?"

"No, but I've got something to tell you. Would you keep your little Willie from pain?"

"Certainly I would. Tell me what is the matter, my son?"

"All right, pa, I will—dear, good, old pa. This morning Billy Button, Tommy Todd and myself were playing ball, and I couldn't catch very well, so I went and got your brand new stovepipe hat and caught with that. Pa, that hat must be made of awful poor stuff, for the first fly ball went clear through it, knocking the roof out. But never mind, I'll buy you another one," clasping me tighter as I essayed to rise, "and one gooder'n that too!"

What could I do?—Boston Courier.

Paderewski as a Hard Worker.

To be a pet of the public sometimes has its disadvantages. M. Paderewski, for instance, keeps up his reputation only at the cost of tremendous efforts. To an interviewer for Black and White he has confided the fact that he practices at the piano often for 15 or 16 hours a day. Once, in New York, he had to work up eight entirely distinct programmes in little over as many days, and then it was a case of 17 hours' practice daily. One must always be at it, he explains, to keep the fingers right and the memory active. The work is certainly tiring, and M. Paderewski considers that playing billiards—a game he is very fond of—has saved his life by affording him the necessary relief from his arduous work.

Those crashing blows of his on the piano are not, as some might imagine, made with the closed fist. Sometimes they are done with the third finger stiffened out, sometimes with the thumb sideways. He seems to see nothing wonderful in the effect produced, although his hands are so delicate that an ordinarily firm shake makes him wince. It is true that he has a forearm such as a professional strong man might envy, so perfect is it in its muscular development.—London Daily News.

To Kill a Lobster.

When a live lobster is required for boiling or other purposes, here is a simple and comparatively painless mode of killing it: Run a long, narrow bladed knife into the tail at the third joint from the end, having the blade slant downward. This will cut the spinal cord, and death will quickly follow.

ALIAS SUMMONS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE County of Inyo, State of California.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the County of Inyo, State of California, and the complaint filed in said County of Inyo in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

Victor Tapier Plaintiff, vs. Jaques Jalbertque and Manasese Louca, Defendants:

The people of the State of California send greeting to Jaques Jalbertque and Manasese Louca, Defendants:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the County of Inyo State of California, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this Inyo County, or, if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The action is brought to obtain the judgment of this Hon. Court dissolving the partnership heretofore and now existing between you selves and the Plaintiff, under and by virtue of an agreement made and entered into by you on the 30th day of October, 1893, and that the title to the mines or mining claims described in said agreement may be adjudged need from all the conditions thereof and restored as follows: That the Plaintiff is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "American Flag Mine;" that defendant Jaques Jalbertque is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "French Flag Mine" and that Defendant Manasese Louca is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "Mexican Flag Mine," as said mines are described in said agreement and the complaint on file herein; Together with the costs of suit.

Said plaintiff alleges that you have utterly failed, neglected and refused to in any manner whatsoever comply with the term and conditions of said partnership agreement, or to perform any of the duties imposed thereby since on or about the 27th day of January, 1894; as will more fully appear by reference to the complaint on file herein.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, said plaintiff will apply to Court for the relief demanded in said complaint.

Witness my hand and the Seal of said Superior Court of the County of Inyo, State of California, this 27th day of June, A. D. 1894.

[SEAL.] D. J. HESSION, Clerk.
P. H. MACK, Attorney for Plaintiff.

The Independence Land District Will Be Kept Intact.

The following correspondence concerning the Independence Land Office will be of general interest:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
WASHINGTON, D. C., Sept. 9, 1894.

I. H. MULHOLLAND ESQ.
Independence, Cal.

Sir:—The action of the Senate on that bill (removal of Land Office) was only pro forma. It is the practice to rid the files of measures that have performed their purpose. It was a struggle to keep your district intact.

Yours truly,
A. CAMINETTI.

LOS ANGELES, Cal., Sept. 24, 1894.

HON. P. H. MACK,
Independence, Cal.

My Dear Sir:—I forward to you a note herewith which I have received from Josephus Daniels, Chief Clerk of the Interior Department, wherein he states that the order of the consolidation of the Visalia and Independence Land Districts, has been revoked. I am glad that we are able to accomplish this.

Your friend.
STEPHEN M. WHITE.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INERIOR,
WASHINGTON, Sept. 17th 1894.

HON. STEPHEN M. WHITE,
Los Angeles, California.

My Dear Sir:—Your letter of the 10th instant, enclosing a letter from Hon. P. H. Mack, has been received. I am directed by the Secretary to acknowledge its receipt and to state that your request in the matter has been complied with, the President having signed an order revoking his former order for the consolidation of the Visalia and Independence land districts. They will remain in the future, as in the past, as two distinct offices. Permit me to express the hope that the outlook for us in California is good. With sentiments of esteem and high regard, I am,

Very truly yours,
JOSEPHUS DANIELS.
Chief Clerk.

MRS. A. M. HANDY was convicted of murder in the second degree and recommended to the mercy of the court in Reno last Monday for killing M. D. Foley. It is not improbable that she will get a new trial and be acquitted.

A. Schnoke of Bishop spent a few days in town early in the week. Mr. Schnoke is foreman of the Ford ranch at Bishop and reports that Mr. Ford together with R. Love and others in that vicinity will fatten several hundred head of cattle this fall and drive them to Los Angles early next spring.

In Frozen Russia.

In Russia, where the cold is very intense, the markets are very curious things. The meat is frozen; the carcasses of dead animals, as sheep and pigs, stand upright outside the stalls; everything, even game and poultry, requires to be thawed before it can be cooked, and the market people's dress is as picturesque as it is warm and comfortable.

Then the rivers are frozen over all the winter long, and so thick is the ice that every one can skate, anywhere and any time. Stalls are put up on the ice and busy markets held there.

In the Asiatic part of Russia the people live chiefly by hunting and fishing, and the fur of the Russian animals is very beautiful—the ermine, fox, sable, sea otter and others.

At the end of the winter, when the snow melts, the huntsman pursues the elk wearing long shoes, in which he can glide over the snow very quickly, while the poor elk sinks into the snow deeper and deeper every step and is at last overtaken and killed.—Good Words.

John Reginald.

In Canada's last famous murder case the accused was "John Reginald" Birchall. In the present one the prisoner is "John Reginald" Hooper. Have John Reginalds a propensity for becoming notorious?—Ottawa Journal.

U. S. Gov't Baking Powder Tests.

The report of the analyses of Baking Powders, made by the U. S. Government (Chemical Division, Ag'l Dep't), shows the Royal superior to all other powders, and gives its leavening strength and the strength of each of the other cream of tartar powders tested as follows:

	LEAVENING GAS. Per cent.	Cubic in. per oz.
ROYAL, Absolutely Pure,	13.06	160.6
The OTHER POWDERS TESTED are reported to contain both lime and sulphuric acid, and to be of the following strengths respectively,	12.58	151.1
	11.13	133.6
	10.26	123.2
	9.53	114.
	9.29	111.6
	8.03	96.5
	7.28	87.4

These tests, made in the Gov't Laboratory, by impartial and unprejudiced official chemists, furnish the highest evidence that the "Royal" is the best baking powder.

Beatrix Randolph.

By JULIAN HAWTHORNE.

"I can—understand her being happy, though," said Miss Randolph, almost in a whisper. Then Wallie's heart smote him that he had played upon her. After all, what did he know about what had occurred between her and Geoffrey? There may have been a veritable tragedy instead of an ordinary lover's misunderstanding. As a matter of fact he had no suspicion of the tragi-comic mistake which was the immediate cause of their separation. He thought it probable that she had revealed her true name to him, and supposed that they had differed on the "public career" question, which he had just illustrated in his fable.

In order to give himself and her time for reflection he took up the conversation at another point. "In the event of your accepting another engagement,' he said, "I suppose Inigo would be the fortunate man?"

"Nothing has been decided about that," she replied, falling with a sense of relief into the business tone. "I have been told—that is, it seems that there may be a difficulty I had not thought of—a legal trouble. This money that I have been receiving," she went on, after a pause, "has been paid, of course, to Mlle. Marana. The agreement according to which it is paid is signed by her—that is, not by me. So it seems that legally I am only her representative—her deputy, as it were, and she can, if she chooses, demand that I make over all the money to her. But of course all the money, or most of it, has been paid away for—to my father, so you see there would be trouble."

"Humph!" ejaculated Wallie, taking a pinch of his mustache between his thumb and forefinger. He meditated for a while, staring at the owl, which silently returned his gaze. "Who is your lawyer?" he inquired at length.

"I haven't any."

"Was it Inigo who"——

"No—he—I don't know whether it had occurred to him." The truth was that Hamilton Jocelyn, in requital of the injury to his feelings, had written the prima donna a letter, in which he had advanced the above suggestion; and he had further announced that it was his purpose immediately to acquaint the real Marana with the position of affairs, and to offer her his services in the event of a prosecution. It is doubtful whether he really contemplated any action of the kind, but it would not have softened the unloveliness of his present sensations could he have known that Beatrix was not in the least surprised or shocked at the position he had taken. It seemed to her quite in keeping with his character.

"She might give you some annoyance," Wallie admitted, after further consultation with the owl, "but I'm by no means sure she could obtain a verdict. I imagine she must have written to Inigo, definitely withdrawing from the engagement, and hence his substitution of you. Was that the way of it?"

"Yes; and I believe she paid the forfeit."

"Then I don't think you need worry. There can at any rate be no doubt that you have done the singing, and as singing is paid nowadays, four thousand dollars a night is none too much for it."

"It was three thousand the first month, and thirty-three hundred afterward," put in the prima donna.

"Inigo certainly told me when he returned from Europe last June that he got Marana for four thousand a night," Wallie affirmed. 'But probably he took advantage of your being a debutante to cut it down."

"Mr. Jocelyn—that is, I think not; I was told that I received the same that she was to have had."

"Hamilton Jocelyn? Is he mixed up in this affair?" inquired Wallie, with an air of dissatisfaction.

She had intended not to bring Jocelyn's name into the conversation, but as it had slipped out she now thought it best to say, "It was he who introduced me to Gen. Inigo, and he has been acting as my agent—paying me the money. And he said," she added, wishing to do her enemy justice, "that it was by his exertions that Gen. Inigo was persuaded to raise my salary after the first month."

Wallie threw away his cigarette and rubbed his nose. "Well," he said, presently, "I dare say Jocelyn knew what he was about. I should like to hear what he has to say in Inigo's presence. Impresarios and agents are human, and need looking after occasionally."

"What I thought was," she resumed, "that if it should turn out I had no legal right to the money, I should really have to make some more, whether I liked it or not. It would have to be made in some way, you know, and papa—and there seems to be no other way but for me to go on singing, if I can get an engagement."

"As to that," said Wallie smiling, "if I wanted to make a fortune I would turn impresario and make you my single investment. Let us assume, for argument's sake, that from the pecuniary standpoint you are perfectly free either to go on or not. Now, of course there are ways in which you might cultivate music without keeping in opera. You could sing at a church, or, when you felt in the mood, at a private or public concert. But there is something else in the profession besides the singing—there is the audience. Do you know what I mean?"

"Yes," said she, in a low voice.

"It is a magnificent stimulant," he continued. "There is no other to compare with it in the world. They say when you have once felt the delight of it nothing is so difficult as to give it up. There is nothing that you would exchange for it."

"That is not true!" said she, lifting her head. In a moment she added: "But I have felt that it would be a great consolation." Wallie glanced up, and she blushed.

He rose again from his chair and took another cigarette from the box on the low bookcase. Then he went to another place for a match, which he scratched underneath the mantelpiece. Then he lit the cigarette and threw the burnt end of the match in the fire, after having shaken it rapidly to and fro to extinguish it. She watched him half absently, thinking what a good fellow he was, how quiet, how honest, how kind, how quick of apprehension. But through him, beyond him, in his place she was seeing another figure, which she never hoped to behold again in reality. Oh, the perversity of human affairs! The goodness that we meet with is not the goodness that we want; the evil that happens to us is not the punishment of our evil!

Wallie glanced at her through the smoke of his cigarette with a sympathetic interest, half sad, half humorous. The heavy fur lined cloak that she wore was thrown back on the chair; her head leaned backward, showing the white throat; her richly made, close fitting black dress revealed the lithe beauty of her figure; there was a soft dimness about her eyes; a little strand of bright hair had strayed across her forehead. How mournful she looked! How easily she might be happy! How gladly he would make her so! But those who have the good will have not the power, and those who have the power— "I hope to gracious!" exclaimed Wallie to himself, "that he is suffering the torments of the damned! I may have been a fool in my time, but nothing should ever have made me turn my back on a woman like that!" And he reseated himself with a resentful vehemence that drew a creaking remonstrance from his armchair.

"Do you think, Miss Randolph," he asked, "that the time would ever come when you would prefer the consolation to the—thing it consoled you for?"

"A consolation is only—a consolation," she replied, with a little smile. "But you must not think that I am—was meaning anything except in a general way. I should only find it more tiresome than usual to have nothing to do now that I know what it is to do something."

"Speaking in a general way, however, don't you think it would be unwise to seek consolation as such until one was quite certain, beyond the possibility of a doubt, that consolation was the thing one needed?"

"Oh, of course there can be no doubt!" she answered. But there was in her tone, and in the sudden, inquiring expansion of her eyes, a feeling less of conviction than of misgiving and suspense, as if the earnest emphasis with which he had spoken had led her to suspect that he might know something of great moment to her. He had no such knowledge, but he had a strong persuasion that she was the victim of a misfortune that might be set right; and he perceived that the time was now come when he might speak to her openly on the subject which had all along been in both their minds. But as he opened his mouth to do so there was a knock at the door, and the servant came in with a letter.

"The messenger boy's waiting, sir," he said, "and wants to know if there's an answer."

"Tell him," said Wallie sternly, "to go to"— He stopped. The handwriting on the envelope had caught his eye. "If you will excuse me?" he said, glancing at his visitor, while he tore the letter open. He took in its contents with a look. "No answer—I'll answer it in person," he said to the servant, who withdrew.

"Miss Randolph," said Wallie, standing in front of her with the letter in his hand, and a peculiar smile on his face, "this is from a friend of mine whom you know. There's nothing in it that you may not see; will you read it?"

She took the letter, saw the signature, let her hand fall to her lap for a moment, then lifted it again and read as follows:

DEAR WALLIE—I returned this morning. In Ireland I met a young fellow named Randolph, with a lady, who turned out to be Mlle. Marana. I didn't know what to think, but came on at once in order to warn her namesake here. At the hotel I found Randolph and his father. It appears that the former and Marana had arrived a few hours before me on another steamer. Our Marana went out this morning, no one knows where. From something I happened to hear old Randolph say to his son I begin to suspect I have made an astonishing and wicked blunder. I will explain when I see you, which must be at once. The two ladies must not meet at present, if we can help it. If you get this in time meet me here at 1 o'clock. G. BELLINGHAM.

"Shall we go to the hotel together?" said Wallie, when she had read the letter.

"No, I cannot see him. Oh, my brother!" she pressed her hands over her face, and bent her head down on the arm of the chair.

"I think," said Wallie gently, after a pause, "that Mrs. Dinsmore has just come in. I know she'll want you to stay to lunch. Shall I tell her you're here?"

"Let me go to her," said Beatrix, rising suddenly and moving blindly toward the door. Wallie drew her arm beneath his and led her out. Ten minutes later he was on his way up town.

CHAPTER XIII.

HOW HER BROTHER WAS PUNISHED.

"After fifteen minutes I await Gen. Inigo."

When Wallie reached the hotel he met Geoffrey in the vestibule. "You had better have stayed at home and built my cottage for me," remarked the former, as they shook hands. "You don't do going-to-Europe well."

"I have something to tell"——

"I know all about it. I've been chatting with the lady the last hour. I'm disappointed in you. You should have married her first, and she would have left the stage of her own accord afterward."

"That was not the question. But how did you know"——

"That you wanted to marry her? I am only mad north-northeast. When the wind is in the south * * * But she's too good for you."

"The point is, that she is the daughter"——

"Great Scott! Do you mean to say you didn't know who she is?"

"Did you?"

"I? Of course. I knew the other one, in the first place. But didn't she tell you?"

"Do you suppose," said Geoffrey gravely, "that I would have gone to Europe if I had known that the man whom I saw * * * that there was all that mystery about, was her own father?"

Wallie stared at his friend a moment and then laughed. "This is very sad," said he. "And, if I am not mistaken, you were with me that day when Randolph came in and gave himself away—However! What are you going to do?"

"The real Marana is here, or rather, at the Albemarle. I want to know what she is going to do. She may decide to make trouble."

"There is one obstacle in her way, fortunately."

"What?"

"Well, it would be awkward for her to prosecute the sister of her lover."

"He is her lover only in the sense that he wants to marry her."

"What about that hundred thousand dollars he got rid of?"

"It is as I say, nevertheless." And Geoffrey gave his friend a synopsis of what Helwise had told him on the subject.

"In that case there is all the more reason for her to keep quiet," said Wallie.

"Then why did she come to America?" Geoffrey inquired.

"Have you seen her on the subject?"

"I have had no opportunity yet."

"Well, leave it to me. You are not a diplomatist. This young Randolph has got himself in a nice position! If Miss Beatrix was not his sister, or if Marana were not his lady love, he could take a hand on one side or the other; but as it is he's helpless both ways. I should think he would feel tired. What sort of a fellow is he?"

"He seemed well enough the little I've seen of him."

"I see; you think of him as your future brother-in-law," said Wallie smiling. "But don't be too comfortable. That young lady is not to be played fast and loose with."

"Oh, I'm not comfortable!" said Geoffrey gloomily.

"Well, I won't hit you while you're down, but if you get up again, look out! Where is this young scamp?"

"Up stairs, I believe, with his father."

"I'll have a hack at him, to begin with. You may as well keep yourself to yourself until you hear from me again. We can't afford any more blunders."

He sent up his card, and was conducted to the room where the Randolphs, father and son, were. The latter was walking up and down the floor, while the former stood with his back to the fire, looking as high shouldered and dignified as possible.

"I am here," said Wallie pleasantly, after the formalities were over, "unofficially, on behalf of the lady who has been singing the past season under the name of Mlle. Marana."

"Mr. Dinsmore," said Randolph, Sr., twisting his eyebrow sternly, "you are perhaps not aware that the lady is under my especial charge."

"I have known for some months that she is your daughter, Mr. Randolph, but no one is aware that she is under your especial charge."

"I do not understand you, sir!" said Mr. Randolph fiercely.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

The Prevalence of the Dress Suit.

"No doubt," said a citizen, "men wear better clothes now than ever before, and no doubt more men than ever conform to polite usages in dress. There are now many men who can wear a dress suit with almost faultless unconsciousness who once never wore one at all, and the purchasers of dress suits nowadays are by no means confined to any particular part of the city, and there are many men who, while they may not provide themselves with a dress suit as a part of their regular equipment, yet wear one upon special occasions.

There was a time, and it is well within the recollection of the oldest inhabitant, when the business of the man who kept dress suits to hire was a theme for the local newspapers and for the correspondents of newspapers out of town, but there are many places in the city now where dress suits may be hired, including not a few in districts quite remote from Broadway and Fifth avenue.—New York Sun.

The Prickly Pear of Africa.

Mischievous though the prickly pear is it is not without its good qualities. Its juicy fruit, though rather deficient in flavor, is delightfully cool and refreshing in the dry heat of the summer, and a kind of treacle is made of it.

Great caution is needed in peeling the prickly pear, the proper way being to impale the fruit on a fork or stick while you cut it open and remove the skin, and woe betide the fingers of the unwary "new chum" who plucks the treacherous fruit.

In dry weather at the cape these spiteful little stings do not even wait for the newly arrived victim, but fly about, light as this thistledown, ready to settle on any one who has not learned by experience to give the prickly pear bushes a wide berth.—"Home Life on an Ostrich Farm."

An Enemy to Fire.

A bigger enemy to fire than water has made its appearance. It is bottled up in a sheet iron cylinder about 1½ feet long and comes out in a thin stream for six or seven minutes consecutively. The inventor, who is a Frenchman, to prove the efficacy of his tool filled a big box with tar, poured on kerosene oil and set it alight. After it had burned furiously for some time the contents of the extinguisher (the constituents of which are known only to the inventor) were directed against the flames, which quietly went out in less than a minute.—London Standard.

An Advantage from Fogs.

In speaking of fogs a medical journal draws some consolation from the fact that even fogs have one compensating advantage, which has often been overlooked. "It is," it says, "reasonable to suppose that a fog effects a partial purification of the atmosphere. This is borne out by the fact that when a fog subsides the deposits contain the carbon, sulphur, organic bases and other injurious and irritating particles which formerly existed in a state of suspension in the atmosphere."

A Woman's Rebuke.

When one woman rebukes another the cynical bystander thinks it well to have his ear open. She was a woman whose clothes were better than her manners.

She walked into the railway car, tilted her head superciliously, sniffed once or twice and asked in a loud voice:

"Is this the smoking car?"

"No, ma'am," answered a demure young woman in the first seat, "I think you'll find it three cars forward."—Washington Star.

KNOWLEDGE

Brings comfort and improvement and tends to personal enjoyment when rightly used. The many, who live better than others and enjoy life more, with less expenditure, by more promptly adapting the world's best products to the needs of physical being, will attest the value to health of the pure liquid laxative principles embraced in the remedy, Syrup of Figs.

Its excellence is due to its presenting in the form most acceptable and pleasant to the taste, the refreshing and truly beneficial properties of a perfect laxative; effectually cleansing the system, dispelling colds, headaches and fevers and permanently curing constipation. It has given satisfaction to millions and met with the approval of the medical profession, because it acts on the Kidneys, Liver and Bowels without weakening them and it is perfectly free from every objectionable substance.

Syrup of Figs is for sale by all druggists in 50c and $1 bottles, but it is manufactured by the California Fig Syrup Co. only, whose name is printed on every package, also the name, Syrup of Figs, and being well informed, you will not accept any substitute if offered.

BRACE THE NERVES.

Sedatives and opiates won't do it. These nervines do not make the nerves strong, and failing to do this fall short of producing the essential of their quietude—vigor. And while in extreme cases—and these only—of nervous irritation such drugs may be advisable, their frequent use is highly prejudicial to the delicate organism upon which they act, and in order to renew their quieting effect increased and dangerous doses eventually become necessary. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is an efficient substitute for such pernicious drugs. It quiets the nerves by bracing, toning, strengthening them. The connection between weakness of the nervous system and that of the organs of digestion is a strong and sympathetic link. The Bitters, by imparting a healthful impulse to the digestive and assimilating functions, promotes throughout the whole system a vigor in which the nerves come in for a large share. Use the Bitters in malaria, constipation, bilious and kidney trouble.

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure now known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers, that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of Testimonials.

A SONG.

Free is thought? not so!
For a word may fetter;
Who truth's soul would know
Oft blind eyed doth go
Stumbling o'er the letter!

Fair thy speech and fine?
Thou thyself, ah, better
Than all words of thine;
Oh, the life divine,
That eludes the letter!

—Heinrich Heine.

THE DEATH JOURNEY

Among all the bad men who troubled the peaceful little settlement of Dona Ana, the name of Pete Ramantaro led all the rest. He enjoyed such distinction in this respect that throughout all Dona Ana county, whenever any special piece of devilment was committed to which there was no clew, it was placed at once and by common consent to Pete's credit. To be sure some who knew him well said that Pete was not as black as he was painted. Nevertheless it was decided that he must "go," preparatory to the firm establishment of an orderly and law abiding community.

"Mebbe Pete's square enough," admitted Scotty Short, proprietor of the Jack Rabbit saloon, "but he makes lots of trouble. He's killed two men in my place, and it ain't no way to do."

"They was mighty tough customers, them two," said the storekeeper, "and Pete ought to had a vote of thanks for wipin 'em out."

But public opinion on the whole was dead against Ramantaro, and such little matters as the above, which should have been counted in his favor, were not made much of. The community decided that it would feel better if he were well out of it.

A bit of news will circulate about an adobe village in the southwest in the same rapid and mysterious manner that it percolates through a New England hamlet. So when Ysabel Manetta came to Dona Ana that afternoon on a combined errand of business and pleasure—to buy some meal at the store and to gossip awhile with a crony—she learned that matters of grave import were afoot.

"There will be trouble here this night," said the Dame Maria Salgado, shaking her head wisely. "They are not going to have any more shooting and killing, and your brave Ramantaro had better think twice before he comes again and puts his head into this lion's mouth."

"Pouf," replied Ysabel, tossing her head and scornfully curling her red lips. "Do you think Ramantaro would be afraid?"

"I know what I think," answered the dame. "I think he would better keep away."

The sun was yet high when Ysabel remounted her patient little burro and took her way home across the desert plain. It was a good three leagues to the corral where Vicento Manetta herded a few goats and basked in the sun all day, asking little in life except to be let alone. The way thither was along a sandy trail that wound between patches of cactus and Spanish bayonets.

Ysabel's home was a low adobe hut—brown, like the earth from which it was made. Beside it was the corral, inclosed by a dusty green cactus hedge, where the goats were kept at night; behind it a piece of dense chaparral, and beyond that the terrible waterless desert—the very desert of the desert—the Jornado del Muerte—the Journey of Death.

The old man was lazily bringing the goats home. When he had put them in the corral he squatted down on his heels and watched the girl prepare the evening meal.

"What do they say at Dona Ana?" he asked after waiting for the girl to volunteer some speech.

She replied to this with another question.

"Has Pete been here today?" she asked.

"No. He said he would not come until tonight. Don't you remember?"

"He could have changed his mind."

Then after a pause she added:

"He must keep away from Dona Ana."

"Eh!" said the old man, with a quick suspicion of one familiar with the scent of danger. "But how will you manage it?"

"I shall find a way," answered the girl briefly.

"You tell him to hold, and he will be the more fierce to go," grumbled Manetta.

The sun went down and the moon and the stars came out and made the world white with their light.

The two sat upon the ground before the hut, their backs against the adobe wall, their blankets drawn well about them. The night was as still as it was white, except for the faraway yelping of a coyote or the hoot of an owl.

After a time there was a sound of distant hoof beats. They drew nearer, and a well caparisoned rider halted in front of the hut.

"You are glad to see me," he said sarcastically, as neither the man nor the girl stirred. "It is worth riding far for such a welcome."

"We are tired," answered Ysabel indifferently.

"Yes, Ramantaro! We do something besides play—we," grunted Manetta.

The horseman swung himself down beside Ysabel.

"Tell me," he said.

"We have lost the new goats."

Ramantaro muttered an oath.

"The ones you got from the English man?"

Manetta chuckled a silent assent, remembering how he had got them.

"Did he come for them?"

"Bah! No. He has not that courage. They have strayed away up the arroyo."

"Then they will come back?"

"Yes, when the wolves have eaten them."

"And you followed them?"

"Until I could go no farther."

The man arose and looked across the plain.

"The arroyo is a cursed place," he said, "but Juan is sure of foot. Yes, I could bring them back. But I must be in Dona Ana tonight."

"Don't let our goats interfere with your pleasures," said Ysabel. "Doubtless some one will miss you if you are not at Dona Ana."

"The devil! No, you know it is not that, Ysabel. But there will be some good play tonight. I must not miss it."

"Oh, very well. I shall go for the goats again when I have rested."

"What! up the arroyo? Nonsense. See here. I will go if you will promise me"——and he bent over and whispered in her ear.

"I will not promise. If you cannot do this"——

"I but jested. I shall go and find your goats."

As he road away Ysabel stood and watched until he was well beyond hearing. Then she went into the chaparral behind the corral and soon returned driving a half dozen fine Angora goats.

"If he rides until he finds them he will not be in Dona Ana tonight," she said contentedly, as she fastened the flock securely in the corral.

Ramantaro had ridden but a little way up the arroyo before he began to slacken his pace and to ride as a man undecided in his course.

"Bother the witch," he muttered. "I shall lose half a life's fun by this. I can win more money in play at Dona Ana tonight than these goats and their increase will be worth in a hundred years. I will tell her," he said finally, turning his horse resolutely about, "that I found the goats, but that the wolves had found them first."

Then he put spurs to Juan and rode toward Dona Ana.

It wanted yet two hours of dawn when Ysabel, lying awake, heard again the noise of approaching hoofs. She arose and threw a blanket about her and went outside.

Ramantaro leaned from his horse and whispered:

"Get me some pistols, quick! I have but one, and the regulators are close behind."

Without pausing to question, the girl went into the hut, put on some clothing swiftly, came out and ran to the corral, where in an instant she had saddled and mounted her father's horse. Then, wheeling to the side of Ramantaro, she handed him a pistol and placed two in her own belt.

"Two can fight better than one," she said.

Ramantaro laid his hand gently upon her arm.

"Have you thought?" he asked.

"Yes," was the firm reply.

"If you go now you cannot return."

"I know."

Just then the goats, aroused by such an unusual stir at that early hour, began to move restlessly behind the cactus hedge. This seemed to remind Ramantaro of something.

He spoke hesitatingly:

"Ysabel, I did not go after the goats."

"I know. It does not matter. They were not lost. You have been to Dona Ana. I wanted to keep you from that."

"They were not lost? We are quits, then."

With that the outlaw bent toward his companion and drew her to him and kissed her full upon the lips.

Then they seated themselves well in their saddles, laid their reins loosely on the necks of their horses and rode away toward the coming dawn.

For a long time they rode silently, neck and neck. When the day began to show across the bare plain the girl looked about her and shuddered.

Ramantaro saw the look and spoke:

"It is our only chance. They will not dare follow here."

"It is the Jornado del Muerte."

"Yes. It is the Journey of Death."

Then they rode forward calmly into the brown horror.

A little later the leader of the regulators, without slackening his pace, extended his right arm before him and said to his companion:

"Do you know where he has gone?"

"Into the Jornado del Muerte," was the awed answer.

"Yes, into the Journey of Death." Then he added grimly.

"We shall have him now, like a rat in a hole."

As they rode on the hot sun came out and burned upon the brown sand that had already been parched in the furnace of many thousand years. Its heat was reflected into their faces, and the alkali dust dried their throats and tongues almost beyond endurance. Some began to mutter discontentedly, and to look back over the way that they had come.

Later, when they discerned some moving specks a long way off, they gathered up their courage in both hands, rode grimly on to seize their prey.

Ramantaro looking back saw his pursuers. He laid his hand upon Ysabel's rein.

"They come," he said. "I can escape only by going on. It is twenty leagues yet. Few have ever crossed the Jornado del Muerte and lived to tell it. But you—they will not harm you. Will you turn back?"

The girl shook the reins upon her horse's neck and urged him forward.

"I will go where you go," she answered.

"He is a long way off," said the leader of the regulators, halting his pace and watching the moving specks ahead of him. "One cannot tell here how far. Distance cheats the eye. It lies to one."

"We will go back," he said again after a little while. "I am ashamed to go back, but it is only death to go farther. But he is just as safe, nodding in the direction of the fugitives, repeating, "just as safe as though we had a rope around his neck."

When he saw that his pursuers no longer followed Ramantaro rested a little. He unslung the leather water bottle from his shoulder and gave to Ysabel to drink. Then he made a motion as if swallowing some himself and poured a little of the water into his palm and moistened the horses' mouths with it.

He used it sparingly, for upon that and the endurance of their horses now rested their hope for life.

All through the long afternoon they rode on, straight across the brown desert. They grew faint and weary, and once Ysabel would have fallen but she was stayed by her companion's hand. He gave her water again, and when the moon came up they yet rode—riding for life.

Ysabel's horse stumbled and fell and could not rise again. Ramantaro lifted her in his arms.

"Leave me and ride," she whispered. But he raised her to his own saddle, and the good Juan bore them both forward. Finally he, too, fell.

Then, knowing that his own strength was all that they could depend on, Pete rose and lifted the girl in his arms again and madforward as best he could, weakly, blindly staggering and falling sometimes, but always forward with a strength born of despair. And so he struggled on through the long night.

When the Indians who live in the old peublo of San Miguel, which is just upon the eastern edge of this terrible desert which men yet know by name as the Journey of Death, came out in the morning to draw water from the single well that God has placed there to mark the limit of the "cursed place," they found a man and a woman lying asleep beside it.

The half empty gourd which the woman clutched in her hand showed that they had drunken, and when they awoke and told whence they had come the Indians crossed themselves and murmured:

"She is a saint. For no woman ever came across the Jornado del Muerte and lived."—Detroit Free Press.

NOURISHING JUICES.

When Disease Shall be Almost Unknown.

FRUIT IN ITS RELATION TO HEALTH.

Of all Fruits, Apple is King, With the Grape as Queen.—Diet of Fruit and Nuts.

The prophetic intuitions of man, as well as data from experience, point to an era when disease shall be almost unknown, and death shall only take place from a natural and painless physical decay. And every improvement in the art of living, every added light upon the tortuous path by which humanity ascends to a higher plane of existence, is a help toward attaining that period.

That nature has abundantly furnished fruits and nuts for man's nourishment as well as delectation, is no novel theory.

It is well-known that the three principal classes of foods—the carbonaceous, the nitrogenous and the phosphatic, required in every human system, are found in a diet of fruits and nuts. Moreover, they are found in the right proportion. When to this fact is added the ease with which they are cultivated, the large variety to be obtained in all localities except the frigid zones, their delicious toothsome qualities and the ease with which they are digested by all moderately healthy persons, we have a series of strong arguments in favor of their constant use.

It is as if Nature said: "Here my children, I distill from my alembic the choicest elements, the finest flavors, the most delightful colorings, the most graceful forms, in order that you may slake thirst and hunger with my largest. Watered by dew and rain, fed by glorious sunshine, grown through that wondrous alchemy that no chemist has yet rivalled, I offer you the ultimate of all juices and potencies that can heal and nourish. Take, eat, without the barbaric sacrifice of animal life."

In that good time coming her mandate will be obeyed. Who can doubt it that believes in progress?

That we have wandered far from the period when man subsisted on this ideal diet, no one can doubt. An excess of starchy food has, doubtless, changed and deteriorated the process of digestion.

In the mental stress and strain involved in modern life, a stimulating meat dietary is needed or supposed to be needed—(which is the same thing, in effect) by a majority of persons. With a higher grade of development along all lines, there must come a surer, slower, truer mode of living, a period when less concentrated food is needed and craved. Until that time, the acids and salts of fruits will be necessary to counteract unhealthy states induced by rich, highly seasoned concoctions.

Meanwhile, the use of nature's diet is continually on the increase. Car loads of sub-tropical friuts from California and the South supplement the smaller and richer products of the Northern States, and the poorest families now revel in oranges, bananas, figs, dates, pineapples, berries, and all sorts of toothsome delicacies.

Of all fruits, apple is king, with the grape as queen. Mrs. Rorer, than whom there is no better food authority known—declares that she is glad to see her son consume a dozen or more every day of his life. Space fails me to mention the various acids and ingredients packed in this fragrant globe; every school-boy will practically testify to their notable qualities. Like other fruits, it is more wholesome cooked, at least for many stomachs, and the methods by which it may be prepared and compounded, are practically exhaustless.

In regard to health, such an article as this must naturally touch upon salient points alone.

A high authority, the English "Lancet," recorded a remarkable cure. It was that of a child three years of age, who, during half of his little life, had been ill, covered with ulcers from head to foot, blinded and suffering continually, eight medical men had declared that death, alone, could relieve his sufferings.

The ninth decided to change the whole method of treatment, discard medicine and let nature cure.

Fruit with a little honey alone, was fed to the sufferer, either in their ripe state or cooked, he was fed on grapes, cherries, apples, pears and plums.

Within three days amendment was visible. Soon, for the first time in over a year, the little fellow began to open his eyes. In fifteen weeks the child was cured. A remarkably fair skin had replaced the eruptions and the swollen features had assumed a healthy, pleasing appearance. So much for he use of fruits alone.

Among the friends of the writer is a young journalist who has filled and still holds, a fine and noteworthy position. Two years ago he came to New York, broken in health, nervous, weak and utterly discouraged.

Fleeing from city life, he sought the Shaker community at Mt. Lebanon, N. Y. Under the advice of that noble Elder Frederick Evans, so well known to many of the readers of "Health," the journalist decided to give up all food but cereals, fresh vegetables and above all, a plentiful supply of fruits.

Under clouds and doubts he began the change. But gradually gaining strength, good spirits, and health, he left that abode of peace a transformed man. Whereas he had eaten meat three times each day, he now never touches animal food. Yet he daily accomplishes an immense amount of intellectual work.

Starchy food involves a great strain upon the organs of digestion. Of this element fruits contain very little, while they are rich in glucose which is ready for digestion and assimilation. Now, while the mechanical process of digestion in the stomach is the same for starch as glucose or for nitrogenous food, which is made assimilable by the gastric juice, it still remains undigested. Consequently, the starch must pass to the intestines to undergo there a second process, thus increasing the expenditure of vital force in the act. This is the reason why, in persons of weak digestion, a meat diet is more easily managed than one of cereals, which are rich in starch. Yet, to the wise, I fully believe the better way is, as soon as practicable to pass to a diet largely made up of fruit, with, perhaps, a small proportion of nuts.—"Health."

A SPECIMEN OF EAST INDIA MAGIC.

On the occasion of the visit of the Prince of Wales to Calcutta during the winter of 1875-76, I saw a marvel of leviation performed in the presence of the Prince and some 50,000 spectators. The place was the Maidam, or Great Plaza of Calcutta, and the old fakir, who was the master magician of the occasion, did his work out in the open plaza. Around him, in raised seats and on and under the galleries of the neighboring houses, the native princes and begums were gathered by the score, arrayed in their silks and jewels, with a magnificence to which our western eyes are little accustomed. After a salaam to the prince the old fakir took three swords with straight cross-barred hilts, and buried them hilt downward about six inches in the ground. The points of these swords were very sharp, as I afterward informed myself.

A younger fakir, whose black beard was parted in what we now call the English fashion, although it originated in Hindustan, then appeared, and at a gesture from his master stretched himself out upon the ground at full length, with his feet together and his hands close to his sides, and after a pass or two made by the hands of the old man, appeared to become rigid and lifeless. A third fakir now came forward, and taking hold of the feet of his prostrate companion, whose head was lifted by the master, the two laid the stiffened body upon the points of the swords, which appeared to support it without penetrating the flesh. The point of one of the swords was immediately under the nape of the man's neck, that the second rested midway between his shoulders, and that of the third was at the base of the spine, there being nothing under his legs. After the body had been placed on the sword-points the second fakir retired, and the old man, who was standing some distance from it, turned and salaamed to the audience.

The body tipped neither to the right nor to the left, but seemed to be balanced with mathematical accuracy. Presently the master took a dagger, with which he removed the soil round the hilt of the first sword, and releasing it from the earth, after some exertion, quietly stuck it into his girdle, the body meanwhile retaining its position. The second and third swords were likewise taken from under the body, which, there in broad daylight and under the eyes of all the spectators, preserved its horizontal position without visible support, about two feet from the ground. A murmur of admiration pervaded the vast throng, and with a low salaam to the prince, the master summoned his assistant and lifting the suspended body from its airy perch, they laid it gently upon the ground. With a few passes of the master's hand the inanimate youth was himself again.—Professor Harry Kellar, the Magician.

SOME ODDITIES IN ETIQUETTE.

In Holland a lady is expected to retire precipitately if she should enter a store or restaurant where men are congregated. She waits until they have transacted their business and departed.

Ladies seldom rise in Spain to receive a male visitor, and they rarely accompany him to the door. For a Spaniard to give a lady—even his wife—his arm while out walking is looked upon as a violation of propriety.

No Turk will ever enter a sitting-room with dirty shoes. The upper classes wear tight-fitting shoes with goloshes over them. The latter, which receive all the dirt and dust, are left outside the door. The Turk never washes in dirty water. Water is poured over his hands, so that when polluted it runs away.

In Syria the people never take off their hats or turbans when entering the house or visiting a friend, but they always leave their shoes at the door. There are no mats or scrapers outside, and the floors inside are covered with expensive rugs, kept very clean in Moslem houses and used to kneel upon while praying.

In Persia, among the aristocracy, a visitor sends notice an hour or two before calling, and gives a day's notice if the visit is one of great importance. He is met by servants before he reaches the house, and other considerations are shown him, according to relative rank. The left and not the right is considered the position of honor.

In Sweden, if you address the poorest person on the street, you must lift your hat. The same courtesy is insisted upon if you pass a lady on the stairway. To enter a reading-room or a bank with one's hat on is regarded as impolite.

Rice water is recommended in which to wash challies. Boil a pound of rice in five quarts of water. Cool it to the tepid point; then put in the goods and wash well, using the rice as soap. Pour off the water, leaving the rice sediment. Rub the challie well in this, rinsing in the poured-off water. Use no rinsing water, but hang the materials to dry direct from the rice water.

HEALTH CULTURE.

Custom Rules the Great Majority of Women.

PLEASURES CURBED TO SUIT ILLS.

Wrongs That May Not Revert to the Mother, but Surely Will be Visited Upon Children.

There is nothing that impresses the mind of a guest more sadly than the absence of health in American homes. One can scarcely call on a friend where the conversation is not largely the condition of some invalid member of the family absent or present, who claims the sympathy of loving hearts. Health, absolute and unimpaired seems phenomenal; and daily headaches, backaches, indigestion, etc., are as fully anticipated as is the earth's revolution. The question does not seem to be "how can I prevent a recurrence of my ailment?" but "how much can I accomplish before its recurrence?" It is not entirely the fault of the present generation of women and girls. Their parental influence is hurry; and they also have the misfortune to have been reared in ignorance of the true knowledge of the laws of correct living. Restricted as thay have been in these respects whether from mistaken ideas of delicacy, or from tradition how can they be brought to understand economy of their powers? Custom has demanded that education of the body be neglected, and custom is a recognized leader in every circle regardless of hygienic laws, Nature's laws, God's laws, if so strong argument is needed to claim attention of women. It is custom, not health, comfort or duty that rules the majority of women. A woman sees delicate health resulting from the imprudence of others, yet continues her own ways not thinking she will surely be called to account for these wrongs done in the flesh; wrongs that may not revert to her but most surely will be visited upon children. Would the true mother but pause and consider that her child is far better fortified for intellectual adult life with health thoroughly established granting no concessions to any ailments, than with a crowded mind toppling over a poorly developed body, education would not be the incubating process it is now, and we should have strong, enduring men and women in lieu of a people destined to succumb early to nervous disease and heart failure. Mothers deplore their condition after they are once present and censure the imprudence of other mothers, yet no one mother in a thousand works earnestly to prevent it in her own case. She must follow custom's demands instead of Nature's—the piano, the school books, the easel, everything that encourages concentration of will power. What wonder hearts and nerves are overworked and yield early to disease.

Let the women of our counrty aim earnestly and strongly at restoring their privileges of health and their consequent power of healthy influence and the men of our country will be stronger in body and more enduring of mind.

The men look to the women for mental influence. How can men live and thrive when the women that make home home, are delicate, and when they see only delicate emotional girls being reared to fill the places of this generation of delicate women? The strength of every nation depends on the women. Men not properly reared reflect discredit on the women whose influence shaped their lives.

If the boy saw only invalidism at home, how could his child mind be well grounded for vigorous growth. The mental environments of a cihld's mind are never obliterated. They are stamped there and they shape the individual for better or for worse. What then can be worse for the reflective mind than pictures of tired women, mothers and teachers?

The home should be a picture of comfort, of health, of peace, whether it is the dwelling place of the wealthy or of the poor; and the element that wrecks the harmony of most of our American homes is covered by the word invalidism

I have many times publicly made the remark that not the invalid but those who sacrifice for her, should claim our sympathy. The remark, before it is mentally digested, sounds harsh and unfeeling. Let us analyze it briefly, laying aside the isolated cases of unselfish invalidism, and those who suffer continued acute pain, and consider the mass, those who sit at every fireside, and there's scarce a home exempt. Pleasures are curbed to suit her ills. Company can be invited only in accord with her condition of nervousness, every member of the home must shape his life, business, pleasure of domestic interests to suit the demands of the invalid, which unconsciously have become selfish through months, perhaps years of delicate health. Noises are checked and topics chosen to suit the invalid's peculiarities, and everyone she influences is more or less a slave. In the home of moderate means, luxuries are purchased at a sacrifice of the necessaries of life for the healthy ones, and many valuable lives embittered. The invalid whether wealthy or otherwise, does not realize the sacrifice of her own pleasure; her mind is less active than the minds of the healthy friends who surround her, and she has fewer desires. The husband bends his stronger ambitions ever to suit her needs. Parents, brothers and sisters are also her subjects while the child grows to recognize her in no stronger light than as an object of sympathy and tender love. Even his obedience is the demand of emotional love. What wonder that the boy has weak morals and the girl delicate health? The invalid does not realize these great wrongs, but the child is never free from the environment, and the world in consequence suffers from the unhealthy influence thus emanated. No one lives simply. Every one's life no matter how obscure is radiatory. Progression or retrogression spreads broadly not only to those in touch but through them throwing out influence to the multitude.

What then can be a higher, nobler aim than perfection of bodily powers, the foundation of mental health and endurance? and why do our women value so lightly this blessing, and pay so little heed to the need of preserving it, and escaping the curse of invalidism, a curse which is once pronounced seldom withdrawn. I say women, not that men are exempt from disobedience to the laws of health, but that the health of the women involves the health of the nation. They are the mothers, and in the main the educators, and on their abilities rest the interests of our country.

The question arises, whence cometh this enemy Invalidism, and where shall we turn to escape its ravages? The answer is clear. It is born of ignorance twofold in its power, ignorance of the body and ignorance of the natural laws that govern it. The remedy is education in this and these laws. With rare exception we are born free and perfect. From babyhood on, unhygienic living and the environment of custom enslave us with ills that too often are encouraged through the mad rush we call living, to a permanent stay. We pray our Creator to rid us of these ailments and still continue to follow the rule of custom regardless of rational habits and physical economy. Experience compels me to say that the instances are rare when women truly aim at respecting nature's laws. They work diligently in one direction, losing courage in others, compromising with custom as carefully as possible so that Mrs. Grundy's curiosity need not be aroused. I rarely find even the careful mother who does not encroach on her delicate child's health to encourage mental development, so deep-rooted is the craze for mental pabulum.

I will quote here an incident to prove how dangerous a craze this is in America. I am a frequent visitor at a hospital where crippled children are treated. One day I was attracted to their school-room, where are present scores of patients, moulded into different plaster casts, the able work of our skilled physicians. Noting the need of better organic condition among them, I said: "I presume you give them excercises for the members free from braces, and for good breathing, don't you?" "Oh, no," the teacher replied, "we don't have time for any." The remark is so ludicrous, it deserves a corner in a comic paper rather than here, but it will help illustrate my theme that the sentiment of the average American woman is to cultivate the element called mind, regardless of its dwelling-place, the body.

I will repeat again, and the words should be written in letters of fire in every home—not the invalid but those whom she enslaves, are the real sufferers, and I trust the remark will sink deeply enough into every reader's mind to inspire them to make self-preservation their highest aim, and thus to save their circle and their country the misfortune of posessing an invalid.—Margaret Lindley in Health.

THE COMING DEMAND FOR HORSES.

The "Breeders' Gazette" is disposed to make a hopeful view of the future of horse breeding in spite of present depression. It says Horse breeding is not "gone to the dogs" in this country nor will it ever together. What is wanted is a little more brains in the business—a little clearer knowledge of what is wanted and how to produce it.

There are several things that in this connection may be profitably taken into account. As to the present and probable near future of the demand, the rapid increase in the luxurious style of living that is now prevailing calls for an enormously increased supply of carriage horses, well bred, shapely and thoroughly trained; the extension of trade and commerce calls for a large, heavy animal, that can draw heavy loads a short distance and at a rate of speed that is consistent with safety in the crowded streets of our cities, and such horses, weighing 1600 to 1800 lbs. are in demand at prices that would astound many farmers. The roadster, too, is in demand. This is a sinewy, robust animal that is capable of speeding for hours at a gait of not less than eight or ten miles an hour, and covering a few miles at even a quicker pace.

This is a horse of luxury and is an animal of high breeding and thorough training to fit it for use in all circumstances. Horseback riding is also steadily growing in popularity as a fashionable amusement and recreation, and here is a field for intelligent breeding as well as training that can very properly go hand in hand with the ordinary work of the farm. In short, the growing demands of commerce, of business, of pleasure and of fashion in the matter of horses will furnish to farmers a pretty sure market for such as can be brought up to the standard required by these demands.

LITTLE PEOPLE.

A little boy was coming home with his mother from church, when he heard her saying that the sermon was not worth much. The little boy immediately turned round and said: "Oh, mother, what could you expect for a halfpenny?"—Tit-Bits.

Security—A five-year-old girl had been attending Sunday school for several weeks, learning weekly to repeat the golden texts. A few days ago her mother had occasion to administer a severe reproof, when the little one looked up undismayed, and slowly and calmly observed: "The Lord is on my side; I will not fear." It was her golden text of the Sunday previous.—Boston Herald.

GUESSES.

You bring me the words of an old refrain
And ask me to make the meaning plain;
Three little people who wonder why
The world is wide, and the heavens are high.

But how would a guess from each one do?
So, Master Harry, and first come you:
For the ships on the sea, and the stars in the sky,
The world is wide, and the heavens are high.

And what do you think, with your dreamy air,
Little Blue Eyes on the cushion there?
For flowers to blossom and birds to fly,
The world is wide, and the heavens are high.

Last and least of the wondering three,
Here is wee Freddy, and what says he?
To play with marbles and kites to fly,
The world is wide, and the heavens are high.

Ah, well, a reason you each have found,
So now the riddle to me comes round:
And this is the guess I venture why
The world is wide, and the heavens are high.

Up the great hillside our feet to set
A little farther and farther yet;
To try forever and still to try,
The world is wide, and the heavens are high.

—Kate Putnam Osgood in St. Nicholas.

Peddlers In Japan.

The horse is practically unknown in Japan, and the peddlers must carry their wares on their shoulders. Those who sell food carry it about in square boxes slung over each shoulder on a large pole. In one box is usually a charcoal furnace, with a pot of soup over it. The other contains a sort of curd, made of beans, which is sold in square slices that look like clear salt pork. On selling a slice the dealer transfixes it with a stick and besmears it with the soup, which is red and so thick as to form a paste.

The vender of sweetmeats often carries his goods on his head in a box surmounted with paper flowers. He beats a drum as he goes along, and the children, who seem always happy and smiling in Japan, gather about him. The toy peddler has a little cart (everything in Japan is little) covered with paper windmills or other paper decorations.

In the country districts no other street merchant is so frequently seen as the lamp dealer, who has a box of lamps over one shoulder and one of chimneys over the other. He stops everywhere, and it would seem that the Japanese, like Goethe, want "mehr licht." Close at this dealer's heels follows the kerosene merchant, with can and measure.—Washington Star.

Rousseau's Affectation.

Rousseau lived long on his fifth floor in Paris, forgotten by the world which he affected to despise, and from affectation really shunned, when an accident happened to him in one of his solitary walks. He was met in a narrow part of the street by M. de Fargeau, driving very fast in his carriage, and in his attempt to get out of the way was pushed down by a large Danish dog running before the horses. M. de Fargeau immediately stopped his coach and hastened to assist the person whom his dog had thus knocked down, but when he saw it was the author of "Emillus" he renewed his apologies and attentions.

The next day he sent to ask after Rousseau.

"Tell your master to chain up his dog," was the only answer.—Paris Journal.

A Cure For Love.

Take a grain of sense, half a grain of prudence, a dram of understanding, one ounce of patience, a pound of resolution, a handful of dislike. Intermix them altogether, fold them up in the alembic of your brain for 24 hours, set them on a slow fire for hatred. Then strain them clean from the dregs of melancholy. Sweeten them with forgetfulness. Put them in the bottle of your heart, stopping them down with the cork of sound judgment. There let them stand 14 days in the water of cold affection. This, rightly made and properly applied, is the most effectual remedy in the universe and never was known to fail.—Sala's Journal.

Half Rates.

Very Old Man (at ticket office)—Give me a half rate ticket to Chicago and return.

Ticket Agent—But you are not eligible for one, my man. Such tickets are only good for children.

Very Old Man—Ain't I in my second childhood?

Ticket Agent—Then you'll need two children's tickets.—Hallo.

If vinegar, milk or anything of that character crusts on the inside of a bottle, don't bother poking rags in it to clean it. Push back the stove hearth and dip into the bottle a spoonful or two of the fine ashes. Pour in some water and shake thoroughly, and the bottle will rinse out as clean as a whistle.

FRIDAY, OCT. 5 1894

It is to be hoped now that the tariff question is definitely settled until after the next presidential election. The next thing will be the passage of some law to surpress the malign spirit by which our merchants' exchanges and chambers of commerce are being converted into gambling dens and bucket shops. To stand within the chamber of a produce exchange on a day when fluctuations in the grain market mean countless thousands to Brown, Clark and Jones, while bringing wholesale ruin to Smith, Weeks and Robinson, is a sight that one does not care to see repeated. It is a panic that one might occasionally see in the "desperate ward" of some state insane asylum, but for which he would hardly be prepared to find among enlightened and intelligent men bred up to the honorable vocation of merchant. And yet, through all this frenzied excitement, this rending of garments, this tearing of hair and this occasional punching of noses, the farmers who produce this wheat or corn, as the case may be, do not receive one dollar whether the bulls triumph over the bears or vice versa. The reason of this is that the grain that was being bought or sold was not real but fictitious in character. The transactions in this staple, therefore, had not the slightest resemblance to legitimate business, or anything looking that way. It was nothing more or less than gambling—pure and simple gambling. And it is unjust to elect one man who gambles in wheat to be a congressman or mayor, and then to send the next man to jail for playing poker or dealing at faro bank. Gambling in mining stocks is bad enough, but when it comes to gambling in the crude staples from which is made the bread of the poor, it is infinitely worse. This gambling in options demands an immediate surpression at the hands of congress. There is no law to stop a man from buying what he does not want, but he should be enjoined by law from selling what he has not gotten into his possession. If that can be brought bout the present evil of grain gambling will be abated more than one-half. The plea that it will throw a large number of broker's clerks out of employment should not be heeded for one moment. Let them pull off their coats and find work for a while at some more reputable business.—L. A. Herald.

A return to bimetalism means the opening up of new and valuable mining properties in all the far western states. It means the creation of new wealth and will prevent the centralization of capital in our larger cities. It means a general curtailing of power of the trusts that have grown up through class legislation and which would fetter the business of the nation for their own selfish ends.

The low price of wheat in this state is owing to the abundant crop of the same staple in the Russian empire. The warehouses of Odessa are filled to overflowing and in many places the farmers are stall feeding their cattle on wheat and exporting live beef to Holland and other western ports of Europe.

Estee never has a word to say against bossism in party management, and for obvious reasons Should he talk against that destroying evil in political parties Burns would probably take him off the ticket. He put him on and he might take him off.

Estee tells his hearers that the Democrats demonetized silver The "demonetization" was effected in 1873, when Congress was Republican in all its branches and Grant was President Estee shouldn't think the people are all fools.

DANGEROUS DERELICTS.

Need of an International Agreement For Their Marking or Removal.

A Washington dispatch anent the resolution of Congressman Cummings providing for an international agreement for the reporting, marking and removal of derelicts in the north Atlantic ocean says:

Secretary Carlisle, in a letter to the committee on the subject, says that the necessity for such an agreement among the governments concerned was emphasized by the international marine conference held in Washington in 1889. He believes the resolution a proper one and recommends its passage. Accompanying his letter are extracts from the report of the commissioner of navigation on the subject.

Commissioner O'Brien in his report especially invites attention to the subject of derelicts and other obstructions to navigation. He refers to it as a matter of international concernment and one of great importance. President Mink of the American Steamship association, in a letter to Mr. O'Brien, says that he is informed that the commissioner is making heroic efforts to get rid of derelicts off the Atlantic coast. He is rejoiced at this, as the members of the association are complaining bitterly at these unlighted and unmarked obstructions. They have been so frequent of late that no captain feels easy in going up or down the coast.

Mr. Mallory says that precious cargoes and still more precious lives are greatly threatened every time a vessel passes between the United States and Europe and along the North American coast, and they are not infrequently destroyed. Charts have done much for the safety of commerce by showing the positions of 332 vessels abandoned on the high seas and by marking the drift tracks of 139 of them. But they have utterly failed, and this is an alarming fact, to show the tracks of 625 derelicts which have been reported. It is another alarming fact that they have tracks and do drift. They are here today, yonder tomorrow. They are a roving fleet that always hover upon the pathway of commerce. They are more dangerous than a fleet of pirates, because they are vastly more numerous, because they strike even more by night than by day and because they are more merciless when they do strike. To destroy them is the only effective way of dealing with them.

ALIAS SUMMONS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE County of Inyo, State of California.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the County of Inyo, State of California, and the complaint filed in said County of Inyo in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

Victor Trepier Plaintiff, vs Jaques Jalberque and Manasese Louca, Defendants:

The people of the State of California send greeting to Jaques Jalberque and Manasese Louca, Defendants:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the County of Inyo State of California, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this Inyo County, or, if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain the judgment of this Hon. Court dissolving the partnership heretofore and now existing between yourselves and the Plaintiff, under and by virtue of an agreement made and entered into by you on the 30th day of October, 1893, and that the title to the mines or mining claims described in said agreement may be adjudged freed from all the conditions thereof and restored as follows: That the Plaintiff is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "American Flag Mine;" that Defendant Jaques Jalberque is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "French Flag Mine" and that Defendant Manasese Louca is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "Mexican Flag Mine," as said mines are described in said agreement and the complaint of file herein; Together with the costs of suit.

Said plaintiff alleging that you have utterly failed, neglected and refused to in any manner whatsoever comply with the terms and conditions of said partnership agreement, or to perform any of the duties imposed thereby, since on or about the 27th day of January, 1894; as will more fully appear by reference to the complaint on file herein.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, said plaintiff will apply to Court for the relief demanded in said complaint.

Witness my hand and the Seal of said Superior Court of the County of Inyo, State of California, this 27th day of June, A. D. 1894.

A. N. BELL,

Be on your Guard.

If some grocers urge another baking powder upon you in place of the "Royal," it is because of the greater profit upon it. This of itself is evidence of the superiority of the "Royal." To give greater profit the other must be a lower cost powder, and to cost less it must be made with cheaper and inferior materials, and thus, though selling for the same, give less value to the consumer.

To insure the finest cake, the most wholesome food, be sure that no substitute for Royal Baking Powder is accepted by you.

Nothing can be substituted for the Royal Baking Powder and give as good results.

Beatrix Randolph.

By JULIAN HAWTHORNE.

"You told me several weeks ago, in the presence of my friend Bellingham, who remembers it, that you had but the slightest acquaintance with her. And your charge of her has amounted to so little that she has today come to me, who had no right to expect such an honor, for counsel and protection."

This was said quietly, but with a certain warmth and emphasis that abashed Mr. Randolph a good deal. He turned red, and opened his mouth once or twice, as though to speak, but no words came.

Hereupon Edward Randolph put in his oar. "Whatever may have been my sister's position before my arrival, sir," said he, "it's another thing now. I'll look out for her."

"If you do it will be but a tardy return for the services she has rendered you during the last few months," returned Wallie, with a peculiar brightness in his gray eyes.

"I don't recognize your right to meddle in our family affairs," cried Ed angrily.

"Your family affairs are liable to be public property before long. I intend for the sake of Miss Randolph to prevent it if possible," said Wallie composedly.

"Perhaps Mr. Dinsmore will explain himself," suggested Randolph, senior, in a less defiant tone.

"I wish to find out from you, before resorting to other means, whether Mlle. Marana means to take measures to assert any rights she may believe herself to have in this matter," answered Wallie, fixing his eyes on Ed.

Ed looked at his father, but made no reply.

"And in case she does," Wallie resumed, "I wish to know whether you, Mr. Edward, intend to act with her or against her?"

"He will act against her; I will answer for that!" put in Randolph, senior, with decision.

"I prefer to answer for myself, sir!" retorted Ed, frowning upon his parent.

"Answer for yourself, sir?" repeated the older gentleman excitedly. "You'll have enough to answer for then, I can assure you! You will have to answer for the fortune that you have dissipated, sir—a fortune which belonged to you no more than it does to this gentleman here present. Where would you be, I should like to know, if your sister—your sister, who had never before been out of her father's house—had not paid your dissolute debts with the money which she earned with her own hands—voice, I mean—sir? How is a good for nothing fellow who robs his father of money to spend on a loose woman, and lets himself be supported by his sister"——

"Father, Mlle. Marana is not"——

"Hold your tongue, sir! Never mind what Mlle. Marana is not; I and everybody else know what she is! And you stand there before me a beggar, without a cent in your pocket, except what your mistress may have had the compassion to give you, and tell me you will do as you please! By the Lord, sir"——

"I will not permit any man alive to slander that lady," called out young Mr. Randolph, in a white heat of wrath. "She is a lady, every inch of her. Whoever says the contrary lies! You may revile me all you like—I'll not say a word; though, as Mr. Dinsmore here told you, you abandoned my sister to the insults of all the blackguards in town, for the sake of the money she was putting into your pocket. Mr. Dinsmore," he added, turning to that personage, "you are a gentleman and I'll speak to you. You see how I stand, and you can't wish me to feel more humiliated than I do. I love my sister—God knows it—in spite of all the trouble I've brought on her. She has replaced the money I spent, and not a cent of it will I ever touch, if I have to starve in the streets. But when I found on landing in New York today that it was my sister who had been taking Mlle. Marana's place, I knew I was done for. The two women in this world whom I love and honor, by George! are set against each other, and I who would defend either of 'em with my life, can do nothing. After punishment like that, it's not your shrieking and stamping that can make me feel any worse," he said, looking his father in the face.

At this point Wallie thought the time was come to interpose. He had less sympathy with the father than with the son, whose chief crime, after all, seemed to be that he had lost his head and his sense of personal responsibility for love's sake. It was no more than justice that both of them should be arraigned for their behavior, and it was poetical justice that the arraignment of each should come from the other. But it had gone far enough, and was not in itself agreeable for a third person to listen to.

"I think the best thing to do," he said, "is to go to Mlle. Marana at once and learn how she feels about it. The matter may perhaps be arranged quietly. If you'll come with me, Mr. Edward, we'll do what we can."

"All right," returned Ed, whose fit of rage had left him in a very depressed and tractable state. "I'll do whatever you advise."

"And I wash my hands of you, sir!" exclaimed Randolph, Sr., to his son, as the latter moved toward the door. But Ed took no notice of this farewell shot, and he remained pretty much silent all the way down to the Albemarle, where they presently found themselves in the private sitting room of Mrs. Peters, as she still preferred to call herself.

She had been sitting at the piano, but as the gentlemen entered she rose and came to meet them.

"I have the memory of meeting you before," she said to Wallie, as she gave him her hand, whose softness contrasted with the bright hardness of the jeweled rings she wore. She looked at Ed, but made no remark to him.

"I had given up the hope of seeing you this season, Diva," observed Wallie, with a smile. "You drove Gen. Inigo to his wit's end."

"That would be farther than I would like to go myself," she replied quietly. "I think he did not stay long there himself." Her beautiful face was calm and quite impenetrable. If she meant mischief, she meant it very deep down. She did not smile, but neither was there any sign of suppressed anger in her tranquil bearing.

"It is my fortune to be well acquainted with the lady who has been singing here in your stead," said Wallie, who perceived that it would be useless to beat about the bush with a woman of her caliber and temperament. "As she is the sister of your friend Mr. Randolph, I hope to see you friends with her also."

"It is my way to keep the things of business apart from the things of friendship," returned Marana with the slow distinctness that marked her utterance of English. "Edward," she continued, turning to that unhappy young man, "M. Dinsmore has your confidence? He knows of your—foolishness, yes?"

"He's all right," asserted the youth, with a heavy sigh.

"Be so good, then, mon cher, to go down stairs a little and smoke your cigar. It is not three who are company," said she, with a certain aroma of tenderness in her tone, which (Wallie fancied) was more involuntary than conscious.

"Now, monsieur," she continued when they were alone, "after fifteen minutes I await Gen. Inigo. Up till that I am all yours." And she leaned back in her chair and rested one hand within the other in her lap.

"The general will no doubt answer for himself—that is not my affair," said Wallie. "But I should like to know whether you perceive any distinction between his accountability and that of this young lady?"

"You would say it is his fault, but only her misfortune."

"To tell you the truth, Diva, the fault seems to me to lie between all three of you, but less belongs to her than to either Inigo or you."

"It is not I who apportion the fault, monsieur; but if I say the truth shall be known then the affair must turn out as it will."

"But you know that the only one to suffer would be the sister of Mr. Randolph."

A slight movement of the under lids of Marana's eyes showed that she appreciated the significance of Wallie's paraphrase for her rival. "In our profession, monsieur," she said, shrugging one shoulder and looking aside, "we have the necessity to each defend himself without regard of person."

"There are two reasons why people fight—one to inflict injury, and the other to get some advantage for themselves. Is yours the first?"

"Why should you assume it, monsieur?" inquired the Russian.

"Because in this case there is no advantage to be derived. And, besides, though I can imagine Mlle. Marana wishing to crush a rival, I cannot imagine her condescending to make a question of money."

"I had begun to think that M. Dinsmore was too truthful to make any compliments," said Marana with a leisurely smile that enhanced the beauty of her face.

"There may be more respect in what one leaves unsaid than"——

"Ah! I comprehend that also. But—consider it; if I have spent all my life in trying to sing well, and then I find that some one has borrowed my name, so that her singing is thought to be mine—then all that I have done in my life is for nothing. We singers, monsieur, have only our voice; when that is still there is no more of us. If it is taken from us we have nothing left. We put into it all our souls and our hearts, and we work many years—it is work and not play, monsieur—and we have many hard things, many struggles, sometimes we lose everything that other persons love, even love itself. Well, you see, I would more gladly give to some lady all the money that I have earned in my life, and my jewels, and my dresses, than I would permit that, when she sings, the audience should say, 'That is Marana!'"

Wallie looked down, and made no answer.

"You have reminded me," she went on after a few moments, "that this lady is the sister of Edward. Yes, he has very often told me of her; and that we were a little alike—poor boy, he means of one aspect, one presentment; as for the rest, he knows of me only what I have been to him. My other history was not of interest to him; perhaps he would not believe it, even if I told it to him; but, at least, he asked me to be his wife, and though I said no it was not because I feared that he might cease to love me because of what he might afterward come to know. You may laugh at it, monsieur, but I think he would still love me, notwithstanding all of it."

There was something noble and touching in the way Marana said this. Wallie did not feel at all inclined to laugh, and his face perhaps showed it.

"I said no," she resumed; "but later, when I found what he had done, I said yes, so that I might help to make right, and also because it is pleasant for a singer like me to think she can give something to her husband in return for being his wife. But then he would not; in that he was like other men who wish in every way to be the master. But yet, monsieur, there is time to think again," she added, suddenly altering her tone, and looking at him keenly; "a woman has much power over the man who loves her, if she will use it!"

"I do not doubt it at all," said Wallie, meeting her look.

"Do you think I would have power to make him say, 'Well, she is my sister, but she has done what was not just? You shall treat her as if she were any other woman, and I will say nothing; I will help you?'" continued the Russian, with a subtle smile.

"I really believe you might," Wallie answered. "But I can't conceive that you would care to have him do it, or care for him if he did do it."

"Ah! but with us singers it can be different," rejoined Marana, bending upon him a gaze of dark, ambiguous brilliancy. "It is much for us to know, and to prove it to the world, that we are loved beyond measure; yes, beyond honor. It is a triumph, and we love triumphs—ah! who knows how dearly? Men do all they can to ruin us, monsieur, and the world laughs and gives us no mercy. Do you not think it might be sweet to make one man your slave, so that he would do your bidding in all things and worship you?"

"Are you so much in need of a triumph of that kind?" demanded Wallie. Now, whether he so intended it or not, Marana evidently interpreted the question as a covert but bitter satire. She gave a little soft laugh and arose.

"At last, then, we understand each other!" she said. "It is much easier so, is it not? You are too clever for me, M. Dinsmore; you are not a man to be deceived. Yes, in this world, as the French say, il faut accepter les hommes pour ce qu'ils sont—des moyens! We singers especially must use all things for our protection or profit. Tiens * * * drole! Did you think, for your part, you should persuade me to forgive Ma'm'selle Randolph because I make a fool of her brother? Bah! I am a business woman. Business is not sentiment, I think! Enfin, m'sieu', I have enjoyed very much the honor of your visit; foi de Marana, vous etes ambassadeur parfaitement accompli! But your little Ma'm'selle Randolph has a future already happy in the protection of a man like you; she will not grudge me the little that belongs to the true Marana! Au revoir, cher ami!"

And, laughing once more, she gave him her hand with a free gesture, and Wallie bowed over it with a mingling of admiration and vexation such as he was seldom kindled to. He had recognized his mistake the moment after it was irrevocable.

"Well?" said Ed, getting up with a haggard face from his chair in the smoking room as Wallie entered.

"Well," responded Wallie, "there is no doubt about one thing—she is the great Marana! I think you may as well come with me and see your sister."

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

The Equality of the Sexes.

Whenever a girl takes walks abroad how many signs she sees that she is admirable! Girls get blamed for vanity and all that, but remember what is expected of them. If a man is baldheaded he needn't care. He can go out in the world and let the sun shine on his head, and if people say anything they say how distinguished he looks. Now what an awful howl there would be if a baldheaded woman went into public view without her front piece! Of course some men wear front pieces, but they don't have to.

As to teeth also, a man is not obliged and constrained by public opinion to keep his rows of pearls apparently intact, no matter what happens, but a woman is. Poor thing! Of course she usually wants to—she wouldn't be a woman if she didn't—but in these days when women have so many grievances it is just as well to realize this one. It is as big a one as lots of the others about which they make speeches and cry out against in public. It shows just as clearly that there is really no such thing even yet as "equality of the sexes."—Washington Post.

Horace Porter's Airy Flight.

General Horace Porter says that being called upon to speak at a public banquet in London, soon after he had arrived in that city, he made a playful allusion to the "ocean lane," referring to the main route of the steamers, and said that the passengers beguiled the tedium of the voyage by gathering the flowers that grew beside it and listening to the songs of the birds in the overarching elms. The remark was received with silence, and after he had taken his seat he heard one solemn Englishman say to another solemn Englishman: "Picking flowers along the ocean lane! Now did you ever hear of such a thing as that? What liars these Americans are!"—New York Sun.

For a week she had felt an exalted assurance that the titled foreigner would ask her to be his wife, and when she finally saw him at her feet in the attitude of supplication she was enabled to bear herself with fortitude. She had read that the women of his country never blushed, and she was averse to doing that which in his eyes would be unbecoming. Consequently no sanguinary tint mantled her cheeks.

"My dear count."

She extended her slender hand assuringly toward her suitor.

"Pray rise."

He did as she bade him. Presently they might have been seen sitting together upon a lavender divan.

"My dear count"——

He was noticeably thrilled by her manner of address.

——"you have been married before?"

His ardent gaze fell.

"Yes," he replied hesitatingly.

"My dear count"——

She smiled sweetly.

——"I am informed that your former bride brought a dowry of $100,000."

The titled foreigner murmured assent.

"My dear count"——

Her eyes were turned to his, full of soulful earnestness.

——"I take this occasion to inform you that you need not expect more than $50,000 with me."

He started violently.

"No, sir," she declared, with a suggestion of vehemence, "no more."

"But"——

"My dear count"——

She raised her hand as if to deprecate argument.

——"the rule is, half price for second hand goods. That's what pa says for pork barrels that have been used, even though they are as good as new."

After a few moments' reflection he protested that he loved her.

And so they were married.—Cincinnati Commercial Gazette.

Billy's Forfeiture of Confidence.

Mr. McSwat came home tired, hungry and impatient, and found that his supper wasn't ready or likely to be ready for an hour or more.

If there is any point on which Mr. McSwat is inflexible and uncompromising it is meals.

"Now you know well enough, Lobelia," he said, throwing his overcoat on the lounge and walking up and down the room, "that I don't like to be kept waiting for my supper in this way. When a man has been working hard all day"——

"Billiger," exclaimed Mrs. McSwat in a broken voice, "don't reproach me. I have had something else to think of, and I didn't speak to Sally about supper till a few minutes ago. I have had such a shock—you don't know!"

"What is the matter? Any bad news from the relatives?"

"No, no!"

"Had a quarrel with the neighbors?"

"No. It's"——

"Aunt Jerusha coming?"

"I'll tell you if you'll give me a chance, Billiger," said Mrs. McSwat, wiping her eyes. "It's Billy."

"Billy who?"

"Billy the canary."

"Oh, its the canary, is it? If he's got away, Lobelia, I think I can stand it. That bird, madam, has cost me in cages and feed and medicine since you first got him, three years ago, about sixteen dollars, and"——

"He hasn't g-got away, B-Billiger!" sobbed Mrs. McSwat. "It's—it's not that!"

"Is he dead?"

"N-no, no!"

"What then?"

"Billy has—has—has laid an egg!"—Chicago Tribune.

Early New England Society.

The first most forceful and most conspicuous society fact in the early New England community, where almost everybody was a farmer, was the leveling of the class distinction. The soil tiller who owned his land might have to toil for a living like a serf, but he never incurred the serf's degradation. Around him and on the same level the great mass of the community were his fellow farmers, whom he never gazed upon from below, either as a matter of social rank or from the plane of inferior vocation.

Slightly beneath him were the class of farm laborers—not many, when wooded lands were cheap, nor profoundly lowered as a class, in days when farmers themselves interchanged services and toiled even harder than their own fieldhands. The country merchant was, unless exceptionally rich, the farmer's peer—no better, no worse—in the social scale. Above the farmer stood only the men of the professions, usually college graduates, including the minister and the squirearchs. But those, while they formed a certain distinctive "cult," were too few to be a very strongly emphasized group or impress the class distinction harshly.—Yale Review.

THE LAND OF PROMISE

Is the mighty West, the land that "tickled with a hoe laughs a harvest;" the El Dorado of the miner; the goal of the agricultural emigrant. While it teems with all the elements of wealth and prosperity, some of the fairest and most fruitful portions of it bear a harvest of malaria reaped in its fullness by those unprotected by a medicinal safeguard. No one seeking or dwelling in a malarial locality is safe from the scourge without Hostetter's Stomach Bitters. Emigrants, bear this in mind. Commercial travelers sojourning in malarious regions should carry a bottle of the Bitters in the traditional gripsack. Against the effects of exposure, mental or bodily overwork, damp and unwholesome food or water, it is an infallible defense. Constipation, rheumatism, billiousness, dyspepsia, nervousness and loss of strength are all remedied by this genial restorative.

A FACTOR IN DIET.

An Exposition of the New Dietetic Faith.

NATURAL FOOD SOCIETY'S AIM.

Food Which Gives the Heathiest Nourishment With the Least Strain to the Digestive System.

There is unquestionably a growing disposition among civilized people to constitute fruit and fruit products a larger factor in diet than heretofore. There is, in fact, an association of frugivors undertaking a propaganda in promotion of an approximately straight fruit diet. How far this extreme tenet will command adherence cannot be foretold, but unquestionably the movement in its behalf is calculated to accomplish good both for those who eat more largely of fruit as the result of its agitation and obviously for those who are in the fruit-producing industry. For both these reasons we are pleased to lay before our readers an exposition of the new dietetic faith as held by Mr. W. S. Manning, an educated Englishman, who is now in California in the interest of this reform. At a meeting of the State Horticultural Society, Mr. Manning read a pointed essay in explanation of his theory and practice, which we present as follows:

Those who produce the food supplies of mankind from the soil cannot afford to neglect to study occasionally the signs of the times as to the trend of the teachings of science, as well as of the popular taste in regard to any impending and possibly radical change in our diet. We are living in transitional times, and in these days when preventive hygiene is in all quarters searching out the sources and origin of man's many physical ills, there will be an increasing tendency to go for that form of food which gives the healthiest nourishment with the least strain to the digestive system, especially if available without sacrifice of the reasonable enjoyment of the pleasures of the table, and the more attractive it is, so much the quicker will the rate of progress be.

Health is recognized to be very largely a question of the conservation of energy, especially in the process of assimilating our food, and, of course, in the avoidance of those other habits that are contrary to natural laws. Disease is looked upon as merely an avoidable penalty for some wrong done to our bodies by transgression of law, and it becomes of infinite importance to learn wherein we are most liable to transgress. The thorough comprehension of law is therefore the supreme human attainment — especially in chemistry, physiology and anatomy—if we wish for accurate knowledge as to our right food.

Science, since the days of Cuvier and Linne, declared unquestionably that man is of the frugivorous order as an animal, and they use neither grain nor meat naturally, that starch foods, like bread, only become blood by being first transformed into glucose (or fruit sugar), such as the fully ripe fruit supplies ready made in the purest form and without strain on the system. It holds that the lower bowel of our intestinal canal is the chief digestive apparatus of starches, and this entails a constant and needless drain and drag on the system; that blood once formed gives the same force as muscular power, whether it be blood derived from meat or fruit or bread, but that with grain or bread we also get an excess of lime and salt that set up often very serious diseased conditions, like rheumatism and premature death.

The milk cure, the grape cure, and the lean meat and hot water diet of Dr. Salisbury, have been each famous and effective in restoring health to tens of thousands—and they all agree in being non-starch systems of diet.

At the San Bernardino Insane Asylum the medical superintendent claims that a diet of milk and prunes is the best for his patients, as it gives the best results. Other noted physicians in that city have confessed to me that a non-starch diet is always their prescription in disease. From Pomona, Riverside, Los Angeles, Santa Barbara and Stockton the same testimony from prominent physicians has been volunteered to me—that they warn their patients uniformly against starch foods.

If it be bad in disease, can starch be good in health? As we allow the straw and the smoke to show us the way of the wind, should not the frail and delicate be the best guides to the healthiest foods for the sound and strong?

The world is governed and guided gradually by facts and science as well as by mere sentiment, but the food reformer has hitherto been guided by sentiment or intuition alone. His intuitions have led him to abandon, as a rule, all fish, flesh and fowl, and he has been satisfied with the arguments, humane and aesthetic, that if we abstain from food that once had life we are on the straight road for our ideal or perfect diet. Food is, however, a severely scientific question and no permanent solution of it will be arrived at without the guidance of the exponents of those natural laws that relate to our physical welfare. If we are living in a progressive world, therefore, in regard to diet, we can only make headway by the guidance of the scientists, and by practical experience, and by carefully watching the experiments of others.

The experiments of natural food friends (some 4000 or 5000 in Europe, and probably fully as many in America) in a dietary that excludes bread and other starch foods, as suggested by Dr. Densmore, all prove that we can much benefit our constitutions and conserve our nerve energy by the mere substitution of fully ripe fruits for cereal and other seed or starch foods, even if we continue that other unnatrual habit of flesh-eating, which is recommended for a time.

Mr. Gladstone, addressing his neighbors and farming friends at his county agricultural meetings, has always urged them to go on planting fruit trees, because the markets will open out to receive all that is supplied. It is only needful to produce the best of each respective sort, and make the markets as nearly as possible tempt the palate equally the year round, with grapes, apples, pears and oranges in the winter, and the consumption of fruit will go on increasing by leaps and bounds for both food and drink, as the schoolmaster of the scientist is more heeded as to the design of nature regarding our physical welfare. If it is once realized that we can conserve our vitality and stamina and insure increasing health and strength by simply attending to the easiest digested diet, and to other laws of hygiene, then all who can command the requisite self-restraint and willpower will not much longer continue on that "go-as-you-please" road as to our regime, which has mainly brought about the present universal reign of doctors, druggists and dentists.

Those travelers who have seen South Sea Islanders, Arabs and colored folks of West Indies, whose ancestors have lived mainly on fruits, testify to their stalwart forms and usually uniform good health.

And what is it, after all, that the Natural Food Society today designs to bring about? Just simply to substitute for those least enjoyable and most insipid of all foods in their natural stage the grain and seeds of others that are the most gratifying and luscious of all to the natural palate. Instead of that class which entail the most toiling and moiling to produce and cultivate and prepare and render palatable, to substitute that which is the least trouble of any to cultivate and needs no preparation whatever. For those that are the hardest to get into blood and are most risky and difficult of all to assimilate, to substitute those that are the easiest of all to absorb—containing all the elements for making up all our frame in right proportions, with abundance of heat and force material in nuts, olives and the sugar of fruits. Yes, we should begin to see now that, while ample exercise, fresh air, strict temperance, backed up by a good constitution, together with absolutely pure food, are needful to attain the soundest health and longest life, there is something else equally indispensable that has not hitherto been insisted upon or realized, except in case of illness, even by the most prudent and cautious physician, and that is that the food must be of the kind specially suited and best adapted to the organism. This both experience and science unite in affirming can be got best from raw, fully ripe fruit and nuts, for, although each may at times be found to disagree with those using cooked foods of meat or meal, when taken upon a stomach freed for a few weeks from the strain and incubus of starchy dishes, they relieve nature so much that she thus cures the most obstinate and chronic stomach troubles. The oil of nuts, when emulsified with saliva, becomes as easily absorbed by the intestinal canal as the sugar or glucose of the fruits, and they both are the most pure and perfect of the carbon or heat and force-giving elements that form four-fifths of a complete nutrition.

Man, like the rabbit or the sheep, need not be at all a drinking animal any more than he requires to be a cooking animal when he has by gradual experience proved that he enjoys better health and strength, as well as a really more constant and unfailing delight in a well-selected fruit diet, with its 80 to 90 per cent. of distilled water, than by any of the concoctions of the cook or confectioner, with the brewer or distiller thrown in. Thus as the palate becomes purified from its craving for condiments, rich and pungent flavorings, moderations and temperance are more easy to those who find that table excesses are the chief bane of their lives; even excess in a fruit diet can be indulged in comparatively without risk. —Pacific Rural Press.

THE AMERICAN GIRL'S WALK.

"Why don't Americans teach their daughters to walk properly?" asked a foreigner as he watched the throng of shopping feminity. As he spoke a charming girl approached. She was beautiful, well dressed and perfectly groomed, and in repose would have been a ravishing spectacle. But she moved with a rapid, ungraceful motion that can only be described as a "hustle." "Now that girl if she had been born abroad," said the critic, "would have been taken in hand when she was ten years old and broke to harness. The haut ecole is what she lacks. She has a certain natural grace, like most American girls, but the finishing touches of poise and carriage that give distinction are wanting." "What do you think of this girl coming toward us?" asked his companion, indicating a girl plainly habited in black. "That just illustrates the difference," said the critical gentleman. "Look at that repose, that quiet dignity and that action. Magnificent!" "Well, I happen to know that girl," said his companion. "She went to school for two years and then her father died and she had to wash dishes in a restaurant to keep the family together. She's a cashier in a drug store at present. Now what becomes of your theory?" But the foreign gentleman was speechless.—Portland Telegram.

"What's the matter that there is no dinner ready?" asked the labor leader. "The cook quit," replied the wife, leaning back in her chair and fanning gently. "Why didn't you get it ready yourself? You know how well enough." "Me? I'm out on a sympathetic strike with the cook."—Indianapolis Journal.

DOWN DEATH VALLEY.

Hundreds of Miles of Desert.—Mormon's Skeletons.

VERY FEW LIVE WHO ENTER THERE.

Story of Monsen's Explorations in the Shadows of Funeral Mountains.—Story of Lost Gun-Sight Lead.

Leaving the Needles on the Colorado River and crossing the Mojave desert in southern California, one sees mountains in the northern distance that look like hills of dusty snow. Across the shadowless waste of sand from Daggett, on the railroad, to those mountains is the old trail by which the pioneers reached southern California from the overland trail through Nevada. And in the heart of the range—a part of the Sierras—is Death Valley. It is a grewsome place, as the name suggests, and full of relics to prove its right to the ghastly title. Few men have seen it and come out alive. But only two, so far as is known, have ever traversed its length and lived to tell what they saw.

One of these two is Frederick I. Monsen, a native of Norway, perhaps 35 years old, an explorer, linguist, photographer and scientist. Mr. Monsen is in Chicago, and has with him a collection of photographs that tell an eloquent story of his journey's dangers.

"I began the trip the last week in September of last year," said Mr. Monsen in response to a query, "and intended to be gone three weeks. Instead of three weeks it took me months before I got back to my starting point, and it was counted lucky for me that I got out at all.

"I started from Daggett, on the Atlantic & Pacific Road, with a bronco team and buckboard, provisions, two barrels of water and a tank under the buckboard seat with a capacity of forty gallons more of water. It is 166 miles from Daggett to Death Valley, through the dessert all the way, with practically no water, except at two springs called Garlic spring and Cave spring, where the water is alkali. The longest single stretch between water holes was sixty miles, and it took us three days to make the drive in the sand, traveling from early morning until dark every day.

"When we had got within striking distance of the valley my driver gave out, died in my arms and is buried in the desert under a pile of stones to mark his grave. About the same time my team showed signs of exhaustion and I concluded to make for Pahrump, Nev., a little settlement just across the line and about thirty miles from where my team finally gave out and died. I walked that thirty miles, leaving the buckboard and my traps until I could get back. When I got to Pahrump I found the only show for a team was to take a pair of wild 'cayuses,' and break them to harness. Two weeks found the team tractable enough, as teams go in that country, and I went after the buckboard, brought it into the town, stocked up with supplies and headed for the valley again.

"My route was down the canon called Furnace Pit Wash, a name probably suggested by the heat of the valley and the washed appearance of the ground, due to cloudbursts. In the center of the valley is the plant of a borax company, attended by a lone watchman, who, with his Indian wives and their children, comprise the whole population of the valley. Cub Lee is the watchman, and it is said he was a bad man in his early days, deserted from the United States Army and went to Death Valley to live, because no one was likely to follow him there. However, I made my headquarters at the works because the only water in the valley was there. Cub's oldest son is called One-Sock-in-the-Wash, one of his daughters is named Peanuts, and the other children have titles that would shock the ordinary eastern mind unaccustomed to desert humor.

"After I had reached the valley and taken my bearings I found there were practically three valleys—the central one where the spring and borax works were, the northern and southern valleys separated from the main sink by hills cutting across the length of the depression. Altogether these three valleys aggregated about sixty miles in length and from six to eight miles in width. I should have said the borax plant, costing, I was told, $250,000, was abandoned because no workmen could live in the valley, not even the Chinese, who are able to endure almost anything.

"During my explorations I came across the skeletons of the immigrants whose fate gave the valley its name. They were Mormons and were headed for San Bernardino, then a mormon settlement. Thinking to make a short cut across the desert, they left the main trail, which went around Death Valley, and went into the place by Furnace Pit Wash. It was never known exactly how many were in the party or how they were, but I judge from the remains there must have been more than 100 of them. The skeletons that have not been buried in the sandstorms are clustered around a salt-water hole in positions that show they were huddled together near the water. Wagons shaken to pieces by the heat are scattered about everywhere, with the bones of ox teams and mules.

"It was said that two of the party got out of the valley alive, one of them named Townsend and the other was John C. O'Brien. The story of the Gun Sight lead originated with Townsend. He took a piece of ore to a gunsmith and asked him to make a sight for his gun. The smith worked on it a little and finally told him it was pure silver. Townsend said he had found it coming out of the valley, but the location was never made plain. O'Brien claimed to know where the silver had come from, and started out from Daggett to locate it. Everybody thought he was a little "queer," the result of his hardships, and paid no attention to his trip. He was found dead not long after he started and was buried near the Calico Mountains, where he had died. Numbers of expeditions have tried to find the Gun Sight, but none has ever been successful.

"Well, to come back to the valley; I staid there three weeks traveling back and forth. The place was the kind to inspire Dore in his conception of the Inferno. A great salt marsh fills the central valley, the product of a river which sinks there and has never been known to show water in its bed. On either side are mountains that rise to a height of 8000 and 10,000 feet. One range is called the Funeral Mountains and one of the passes is called Bloody Gulch, probably to cheer the tenderfeet who pass that way. Immense deposits of borax, of sulphur and nitrate of silver contain enough wealth to make a nation rich if only there were some way of getting them out.

"The temperature of the place is about 137, making it hotter than the Red Sea regions by 10 degrees, and they were supposed to be the hottest on earth. The valley is 430 feet below the sea level, giving the additional distinction of being the lowest place known on earth. The depth of the depression, the isolation of the sink in the midst of a desert surrounded by high mountains, accounts for the difficulty with which life is sustained there. There was so little humidity in the atmosphere that I never perspired except a little under my hat-band, and that dried almost instantly if it happened to roll down on my face. It was no uncommon thing for me to drink two gallons of water a day, both on the desert and in the valley, and that is a pretty fair indication of the dryness of the air.

Even the animals in the valley seemed to be armed for a battle with everything and everybody. The only living creatures were snakes, horned toads, lizards and their kindred. The rattler I photographed was a fair specimen of the valley's product. He was nearly four feet long and full of fight. There was a colony of owls in a cave that I went into, but they were the only winged creatures about, and how they managed to live is more than can be imagined, with frogs and lizards as their only diet.

"The depression one feels in the valley is something awful. No matter which way one travels he sees something to remind him of the men who have lost their lives there. It may be only the wreck of a wagon, a wheel or a piece of camp equipment. More often it is the skeleton of a man or horse, and frequently a pile of stones where friendly hands have marked the scene of a tragedy.

"It was December when I got back to the railroad and civilization, after various delays and adventures, and I found my friends had given me up for lost. The trip took forty pounds off my weight, and the borax and alkali I had taken in drinking water along the way nearly ruined my health."

SPONTANEOUS COMBUSTION.

When charcoal which has been allowed to absorb as much sulphurated hydrogen as it can take up is introduced into oxygen gas, the charcoal will burst into flame, owing to the energy of the action of the oxygen upon the sulphurated hydrogen.

This fact is stated in most text-books on chemistry, but no description that I have ever seen of this experiment is claculated to bring about the effect with certainty. The following is a simple method for illustrating this reaction upon the lecture table, which I have never found to fail:

A few grammes (from five to ten), of powdered charcoal, are introduced into a bulb which is blown in the middle of a piece of combustion tube about twenty-five centimeters long. A gentle stream of coal gas is then passed over the charcoal, which is heated by means of a Bunsen lamp until it is perfectly dry. This point may be ascertained by allowing the issuing gas to impinge upon a small piece of mirror, and when no further deposition of moisture takes place the charcoal may be considered to be dry, and the heating may be stopped. The charcoal is then allowed to cool in the stream of coal gas until its temperature is so far reduced that the bulb can just be grasped by the hand, when the coal gas is replaced by a stream of sulphureted hydrogen. The sulphureted hydrogen should be passed over the charcoal for not less than fifteen minutes, by which time the bulb and its contents will be perfectly cold, and the charcoal will have saturated itself with the gas. (In practice it will be found convenient to prepare the experiment to this stage, and allow a very slow stream of sulphureted hydrogen to continue passing through the apparatus until the experiment is to be performed.) The supply of sulphureted hydrogen is then cut off, and a stream of oxygen passed through the tube. Almost immediately the charcoal will become hot, and moisture will be deposited upon the glass. The supply of oxygen should be sufficiently brisk to carry the moisture forward from the charcoal, but not so rapid as to prevent it from condensing on the glass tube beyond the bulb. In a few moments the temperature of the charcoal will rise to the ignition point, when it will inflame and continue to burn in the supply of oxygen.—G. S. Newth, in Nature.

INTERESTING FROGS.

How the Males Care for the Young.

FAMOUS "BATTLE OF THE FROGS."

Darwin and Other Naturalists Considered Them Worth Watching.—Curious Facts Concerning Them.

Boys are perennially interested in frogs—boys and snakes and naturalists.

Boys usually make their observations by means of a triple hook and a piece of red flannel, but a boy in Connecticut, known to the writer, took twenty-eight one day with his bare hands.

Connecticut is a fine State for frogs. There at old Windham was fought the famous "Battle of the Frogs."

It was during the French and Indian war in 1758. Windham was then the most important frontier town of Eastern Connecticut. Colonel Dyer, a prominent citizen, was raising an army to oppose the Indians at Crown Point. The town was alive with excitement. One very dark night the people were awakened by strange sounds, and at once thought the Indians were upon them. Seizing guns, swords and axes, the men rushed out to meet the enemy. But no enemy was to be seen. Still they felt a force of French and Indians must be at hand, for hoarse voices could be heard calling for Windham's prominent military leaders:

"Colonel Dyer and Elderkin, too!" "Colonel Dyer and Elderkin, too!"

The town was up all night. When day broke the mystery was accidentally solved. A mile away from the village lay a big marshy pond, inhabited by myriads of frogs. A drought had nearly dried up the waters, reducing it to a tiny streamlet, and for this scanty supply the poor thirsty creatures had fought each other, until thousands lay dead on either side of the rill.

This battle made Windham famous. For years the inhabitants felt badly teased and insulted by its mention. Now, however, the story is no longer a joke but a prized tradition.

Snakes are as fond of frogs as the traditional Frenchman who esteemed them a delicacy. A frog has often been found swallowed whole and alive in a slaughtered snake. One snake known to a friend of the chronicler fared badly enough by his greed for his favorite dainty. He had swallowed one frog and then had started to crawl through a crevice in a stone wall. Before he had dragged through his entire length he espied another plump little fellow and took him in, whereupon he found himself securely fastened down under the stones, unable to move either way, and was dispatched by the spectator.

Naturalists consider the frog a very interesting fellow, and other observant people have learned curious facts concerning these amphibious creatures.

A gentleman living in the southern part of France had a large frog pond on his grounds, and was very fond of studying the habits of its inhabitants. One day he saw a great change in the appearance of a certain frog of which he had made a pet. It looked as if it had in some way acquired a pair of the puffed breeches which gentlemen used to wear in the courts of James the First, of England, and Louis the Thirteenth, of France. The change made him curious to know what it meant, and all the more so when he found that almost every day more and more of the frogs were wearing the same queer looking things.

By watching carefully the gentleman soon found the cause of the strange, new article of frog dress.

The mother frog, it seems, considers that her duty is discharged when she has laid her eggs. These all adhere together, forming a long chain of many links. As soon as she has deposited these on the bank of the pond she hops away, seeming to forget all about them, and they would never hatch out if the father frog did not come to the rescue. With no difficulty he winds these chains of neglected eggs around and around his own short thighs—thus producing the appearance of the puffed breeches.

He then proceeds to hide himself among the marshy grasses around the pond until the eggs are ready to hatch out. Then he goes into the water. In a little while the shells burst, letting out the young tadpoles, which immediately swim away without so much as a "thank you!"

Another very motherly father of the frog family is found in South America, in Chili. He is provided with a large sac, or pouch, which extends over the whole surface of his belly, from the mouth downward. There is no external opening into this sac, and when Mr. Darwin first saw a male frog apparently swallowing the eggs, he thought he was the worst kind of a fellow to be eating his own children.

But this thought was a great injustice. On opening the frog's mouth, Mr. Darwin discovered that on each side of the tongue was an aperture down which the eggs rolled into the sac, which soon became distended with them.

As the eggs hatch out in this sac, the young frogs find their way up into their careful father's mouth, and thence out and away into the pond, which is to them the wide world.—Inter-Ocean.

FACTS ABOUT BREAD.

Styles change in bread as in everything else, and shapes that were more or less familiar ten years ago are now not made at all. Every baker tries to have something distinctive about his output, and almost every baker thinks his bread is the best. So everybody who buys baker's bread knows there is really a great difference in it in appearance and in taste. The housewife makes wheat bread of one kind of flour; the baker makes it generally of three, two brands of spring wheat flour and one of winter wheat, mixed, with the result of making a finer, whiter, smoother loaf. Bakers do not all agree as to the exact proportions in which these flours should be mixed.

Graham flour is made of the entire grain of the wheat ground up together; gluten flour of that part of the wheat grain which contains the gluten. Rye graham flour is made of the entire grain of the rye; the rye flour used in the ordinary rye bread is usually mixed with wheat flour in proportions varying from a little wheat up to half wheat. Of the bread sold in American bakeries, about 85 per cent. is wheat, the remaining 15 per cent. being divided about equally among graham, rye and gluten. In German bakeries the proportion of rye bread sold is very much greater.

Bakers are all the time getting up new shapes in bread, and there can scarcely be said to be any absolutely standard form, though there are some that are practically so, the oblong, the round, the long round, French stick, Vienna stick and Vienna loaf; there are now about fifteen shapes that are more or less commonly sold. And these breads are made of about as many different kinds of dough; for instance, there is a New England dough, a Vienna dough, and so on, each being composed of a different blend of materials and mixed and handled differently.

Perhaps as nearly standard as any of these shapes is the one known as New England; this is an oblong loaf with square corners. Almost all of these breads are made in different sizes; the New England is made in at least five, which are sold at 5 cents, 8 cents, 10 cents, 25 cents and 30 cents; usually the 30-cent loaf is made to weigh a trifle more than three 10 cent loaves would weigh.

The smallest-sized New England loaf is the one most sold, as is the case with all breads made in sizes, but the 8 cent and 10 cent loaves are in large demand, and there is a steady sale for the loaves at 25 and 30 cents; the larger of the two big loaves is sometimes cut in two and sold in halves. The big loaves are sold to boarding houses and to private families also. Some folks like crust and some like the inside; the big loaves are especially desirable for those who like the inside; they have proportionately to weight less crust than the smaller loaves, and they can be so cut as to be served in almost any form that may be desired, with crust or without.

Breads for hotels and restaurants are generally made in special shapes. They use a shape corresponding to New England, and many restaurants that don't want so much crust take a bread that is made in loaves about eighteen inches in length, and not very wide, baked not separately, but laid close together so that the loaves have crust on the ends only. Some hotels buy this kind of bread, but hotels generally use more French bread and Vienna sticks. Taking all the people together, old and young, it is probable that about three-quarters like their bread crusty.—New York Sun.

SLIGHTLY PROVOKING.

A colored man living on Onion Creek, near Austin, who had contracted a debt some years ago with one of our merchants, came to town yesterday and called upon his old creditor.

"Didn't you 'splane to me dat if I settled up dat account you would give me a discount?" said the darkey to the merchant.

"Yes, I did say so, Sam," said the merchant; "if you are ready to settle your bill now I will make a good discount," and the merchant waited for the colored individual to pull out his pocketbook.

"Well, sir, I hasn't got de money just now, but I thought I'd come in and get de discount right now, for I ain't gwinter hab no use for it after de circus hab left town."—Texas Siftings.

NOVEL POSITION OF AN EX-PRESIDENT.

In his capacity as a practicing attorney it became necessary a few days ago for ex-President Harrison to argue a case in the United States Circuit Court before Judge Woods. There was one thing peculiar about the incident except the fact that Judge Woods was appointed to his place on the bench by Lawyer Harrison. Such happenings illustrate the mobility of our free institutions. A man may be President one day and simple citizen the next; but whether he be one thing or the other, his chiefest distinction lies in the popular sovereignty of which he is never divested so long as he shall behave himself.—Philadelphia Record.

A TEMPLE MADE FROM A SINGLE STONE.

Mayalipmam, India, has seven of the most remarkable temples in the world, each of these unique places of worship having been fashioned from solid granite bowlders. Some idea of their size and the task of chiselling out the interior may be gleaned from the fact that the smallest of the seven is 24 feet high, 17 feet long and 12 feet wide. Travelers who have carefully examined them are of the opinion that it took centuries of work to carve these graceful edifiecs from native rock.

The principle of trial by jury was inaugurated in 468, every accused person to be tried only by his equals.

ON LONGEVITY.

Many Live Up to the Centennial Mark.

THE LIMIT OF 135 YEARS REACHED.

Men Live Much Longer Than They Used to do, Particularly in America.—Data on the Subject.

A writer in the Washington "Post" calls attention to the many instances of remarkable longevity which from year to year have been reported. Passing by the hundreds of years asserted to have been lived by the antediluvian heroes of Hebrew tradition, the apparent numbers in which may mean something entirely different from what they would mean in our decimal scale of enumeration, and down through the Greek and subsequent ages, whose method of counting we do not understand, we find a continuous record of persons arriving at an advanced old age. These, from one point of view, constitute a very small minority, and yet, from another, form a considerable and important element.

The number of deceased persons who had attained an exceptional old age was probably greater in the year 1893 than in any recent period. During the last three or four months of the year the general public became familiar through a perusal of the daily papers, with the remarkable obituaries of those who had departed, having lived to a great old age. A month or so since we read of a life that had reached the extraordinary limit of 135 years. We have since read of the death of a woman at Hartford, Conn., who was old enough to give warning of the approach of the British fleet in 1812, and so saved the New England coast from threatened devastation. And still later we have been apprised of the death at Terre Haute, Ind., of a man 104 years old, who attended the funeral of Washington, cast his first vote for Madison, and was a soldier in the war of 1812. From other data it is apparent that great longevity has been on the increase for many years, particularly in America.

But it may be remarked that the constitutions that carried these persons up to the centennial mark or beyond were formed very many years before Americans began living at the present rate, and that the best part of most of these old lives was passed before the modern suicidal rush of the society and business worlds. To have a good chance for longevity it is almost unnecessary to say that an originally good constitution is of the first importance, though to this primary excellence carefulness in the art of living must be added. The secret of long life is one of which nature alone holds possession. A remarkable fact is that intellectual activity and success have been no barriers to long life. Even deep philosophical studies have proved a help rather than a hindrance to men of literary pursuits. Voltaire, who at birth was put in a quart pot, could never have attained his eighty-fourth year had he not followed the strict, sober, active life which he chose. Gladstone exercises the highest powers of successful statesmanship at an age of eighty-four years, after having undergone the constant turmoil of political contest for considerably more than half a century. Bismarck is practically an octogenarian. Von Moltke was nearing ninety when he died. It seems that the review of these and numerous other instances would sufficiently establish the theory that continuous intellectual activity is conducive to the perpetuation of good health and the prolongation of life.

THE BREADBOARD.

This is looked upon by most women as an indispensable kitchen auxiliary, and it certainly is one upon which no little time, labor and money is expended. But there are a few households in the land where the best board in the world would not be accepted even as a gift if the conditions were that it must be used for its original purpose. Anyone who has become accustomed to the use of a bread cloth will not willingly return to the old and unwieldy board. To make this cloth about two yards of ordinary table-cloth goods will be found desirable. Hem it and fold so that there will be six thicknesses of the cloth to work on. Spread it over the table, flour it well, and if the dough is in proper condition there will be no sticking or trouble of any sort.

Once the cloth is well-filled with flour, bread can be kneaded much softer than on any board. This alone is quite important, as it has been again and again demonstrated that bread made on the cloth is better, because it is softer and more moist than when mixed on a board. There is neither washing, scraping nor clearing up. The edges of the cloth hold all of the crumbs, and the flour rarely flies beyond it. During the mixture the cloth may occasionally be raised at the corners and the loose flour shaken over the dough. Aside from its mere convenience, the cloth is a great advantage from an economical standpoint. It answers equally for pastry, doughnuts, crullers and the like. When done with it, fold it up—the floured part inside—put it in a clean paper bag, and hang it up away from the heat or dampness.—New York Ledger.

FRIDAY, OCT. 12 1894

It is a striking fact that the Democratic meetings throughout the State are unusually large and enthusiastic. The people turn out to hear Democratic speakers more than ever before. Mr. Budd is met everywhere with an ovation and his canvas is a triumphant march to victory. The popular tide is clearly with the Democrats. In Sonoma county the meetings are everywhere large and enthusiasic. The people seem eager to hear the principles of the Democratic party discussed. What brighter omens of success could there be? The calamity howl of the Republican orators is met by enthusiasm on the part of the Democrats.

The G. A. R. National incampment which was held at Pittsburg in September was a well-attended reunion of the "boys in Blue." The committee reported that Congressional interest in the Vets seems languishing. Henry Watterson invited the G. A. R. to hold the next encampment in Louisville, in the following speech, he said; "I have come with a message from your countrymen who dwell on what was once the other side of the line, but whose hearts beat in ready response to your hearts, and who bid me tell you that they want to see you. Candor compels me to say that there was a time when they did not want to see you. There was a time when, without any invitation whatever, either written or verbal, without so much as an intimation of hospitality, you insisted upon giving us the honor of your company, and, as it turned out, when we were but ill prepared to receive you. It is a pity, now that we are prepared, now that the lid is off the pot and that the latch string hangs outside the door, you should refuse us the happiness of entertaining you, not with bloody hands to hospitable graves, but as friends and brothers, fellow-citizens who learned to value one another amid scenes that lent no time for equivocation, and transactions applying to human virtues the very highest test." Louisville was selected by a unaminous and rising vote.

It is not generally understood that while Democrats did not get all they wanted in the matter of a reduction of duty on refined sugar, still they made a very material reduction on the old McKinley law. Under the McKinley law the sugar refiners received a protection of one-half of one cent per pound, and an additional one-tenth of one cent per pound of sugars imported from bounty paying countries. Under the new law the refiners have a protection of one-eighth of one cent per pound for bounty paying countries. The duty under the McKinley law was equal to 60 cents per hundred pounds; under the new law it is 22 1-2 cents per hundred pounds. Now if the Sugar Trust under the McKinley law was equal to 60 cents per hundred protection, were enabled to exact from the people $15,000,000 in one year, when it is clear that under the new law with the duty cut to 22 1-2 cents per hundred pounds, it can only exact $9,375,000 in one year; a clear saving of 15,625,000 per annum. As a matter of course the whole of this rascally duty ought to have been wiped out, yet when we consider the difficulties in the way of this, it must be admitted that our representatives in Congress did well to make such inroads on the profits of this powerful corporation. With the united Republican opposition in the Senate, aided and abetted by selfish and desiging Senators who claimed to be Democrats, it is a matter of wonder that our people accomplished so much. In the language of the "Tall Sycamore of the Wabash," the Hon Daniel W. Voorhees, United States Senator from Indiana, chairman of the Senate Finance Committe: "The repeal af the Mckinley act, when all the circumstances and conditions are calmly considered, will be found to have been the most stupendous sruggle against power and consolidated capital ever made before in American history. Protected millions without limit rallied to the defense of that infamous act."

ALIAS SUMMONS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE County of Inyo, State of California.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the County of Inyo, State of California, and the complaint filed in said County of Inyo in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

Victor Topier Plaintiff, vs Jaques Jalberque and Manasese Louca, Defendants:

The people of the State of California send greeting to Jaques Jalberque and Manasese Louca, Defendants:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the County of Inyo State of California, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this Inyo County, or, if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain the judgment of this Hon. Court dissolving the partnership heretofore and now existing between yourselves and the Plaintiff, under and by virtue of an agreement made and entered into by you on the 30th day of October, 1893, and that the title to the mines or mining claims described in said agreement may be adjudged freed from all the conditions thereof and restored as follows: That the Plaintiff is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "American Flag Mine;" that Defendant Jaques Jalberque is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "French Flag Mine" and that Defendant Manasese Louca is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "Mexican Flag Mine," as said mines are described in said agreement and the complaint of file herein; Together with the costs of suit.

Said plaintiff alleging that you have utterly failed, neglected and refused to in any manner whatsoever comply with the terms and conditions of said partnership agreement, or to perform any of the duties imposed thereby, since on or about the 27th day of January, 1894; as will more fully appear by reference to the complaint on file herein.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, said plaintiff will apply to Court for the relief demanded in said complaint.

Witness my hand and the Seal of said Superior Court of the County of Inyo, State of California, this 27th day of June, A. D. 1894.

Oh, no, he is a candidate—
He wants to kiss the baby.

Don't forget the Democratic speaking Monday evening.

Hon. A. J. Gould started for Darwin on last Monday's train.

P. A. Chalfant and P. A. Bevins came down from Bishop last Monday.

A. W. Eibeshutz was quite sick the first part of the week, but is around again.

Candidates for office this year wear a much broader smile than of yore—a sort of a four year smile.

Rev. S. W. Albone delivered a lecture on "Sights in London" last Thursday evening at the M. E. Church.

J. D. Lewis, Esq., arrived in Independence Wednesday, returned to Big Pine Thursday morning and left for Darwin this afternoon. He is interviewing the voters of the various towns relative to the coming election.

The Brooklyn Eagle says: A journalist is a man who talks about being on a newspaper, but is not. A newspaper man is one who is on a newspaper and makes no fuss about it. A farmer is a man who works the soil, and an agriculturist is a man who works the farmer, while a promoter is a man who works everybody.

Young men becoming 21 years of age close to election days, have the right to get registered within the latest time required, or before, even though not of age at the time of registry. The necessary requirement is that he will be 21 years of age on the day of election, a resident of the State one year, of the county 90 days and of the precinct 30 days.

It is estimated that the Act of Congress, suspending for the year 1893 and 1894 the clause in the United States Mining Statutes requiring $100 worth of labor to be performed annually on unpatented mining locations, has resulted in a saving of more than $10,000,000 to the owners of such claims in the various silver producing States and Territories.

SUPERVISORS' PROCEEDINGS.

[THURSDAY's Proceedings Continued.]

Ordered, That notice be given that at the said General Election to be held on Tuesday, November Sixth, 1894, the following County, District and Township officers are to be elected in the County of Inyo, State of California, viz:

1. A Sheriff and Tax Collector.

This road is laid out forty feet in width.

Petition accompanied by bond, of residents and freeholders of Road District No. 4, praying that a new road be laid out and established therein as follows:

First. Commencing on the county road at the corner common to sections 13, 14, 23 and 24, in T 14 S, R 35 E, M. D. M., and running thence west on the section line dividing sections 14 and 23, (taking 25 feet on the north and south of said section line its entire distance), on land owned by the estate of Wm. Meyer, deceased, a distance of ½ mile, thence west, following said line ¼ mile on land owned by the estate of Wm. Meyer, deceased, on the south and John Strohmeyer on the north; thence west following said line ¼ mile on land owned by Fred Albers on the south and John Strohmeyer on the north; thence west following said line ¼ mile on land owned by Fred Albers on the south and Fritz Strohmeyer on the north, thence west following said line ¼ mile on land owned by John Strohmeyer on the south and Fritz Strohmeyer on the north, and thence west following said line ¼ mile on Government land to the corner common to sections 15, 16, 21 and 22 of same township.

Second, Commencing at the first mentioned and following the present established county road south ¼ mile on land owned by Chas. Skinner on the east and the estate of Wm. Meyer, deceased, on the west to S W corner of the N W ¼ of the N W ¼ of section 24, and running thence east ½ mile on land owned by Chas Skinner; thence east following same line 1 mile on land owned by W. H. Jenkins; thence east ¼ mile, running through W. J. Jenkins land; thence east ¼ mile on land belonging to John Stewart on the north and William J. Jenkins on the south, to Owens river.

Being under consideration it was Ordered, That the said petition be accepted, and that County Surveyor Seely, Jas. R Moffett and J. V. Skinner be and they are hereby appointed Viewers of said proposed new road.

Board took recess until 7 o'clock p. m., at which hour reconvened all the members present.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this Board be and he is hereby authorized and instructed to make due and legal publication of the Proclamation issued by the Governor of State calling a general election on Tuesday the Sixth day of November, 1894, and that in said notice the Clerk shall also publish the order of this Board, heretofore made directing the election of the several County, District and Township officers therein designated.

Claims of Supervisors for per diem and mileage, were examined, approved by the District Attorney and warrants therefor ordered drawn upon the Salary Fund as follows:

Robert Love	$44 70
A C Freeman	42 00
W H Uhlmeyer	39 00
John Wilson	34 80
Frank Fitzgerald	50 40

Whereupon the Board adjourned to meet on Monday, November 12, 1894.

Our Congressman.

Hon. A. Caminetti, regular Democratic nominee for Congress, will arrive in Independence Monday evening, where he will address the people on the political issues of the day. Mr. Caminetti has filled the office of Congressman for the past four years with such honor to himself and justice to the people whom he represents, that he was literally forced, by the earnest and urgent entreaties of his friends, and the people of the District generally, to again be the nominee for the honorable position which he has so ably filled. Mr. Caminetti was here two years ago and the impression he created then, by his logical arguments, made him many true and lasting friends. Inyo, a strong Republican county, usually giving the head of the ticket from 145 to 165 majority, gave Mr. Davis, Mr. Caminetti's opponent, only 18 majority, thereby showing the high esteem in which Mr. Caminetti is held by the voters of the county. This year he again appears before the people of Inyo with a Congressional record that will withstand the closest scrutiny. As our Representative he has worked with untiring energy for the best interests of the State and the people of the District. Everybody should turn out and give Mr. Caminetti the generous welcome which he so richly deserves.

NOTICE

Of revocation of so much of Executive order of September 11, 1893, as directs the consolidation of certain land offices in California, Colorado, and Wyoming.

Notice is hereby given that the President of the United States by Executive order dated September 11, 1894, has, pursuant to law, directed that so much of his Executive order of September 11, 1893, relating to the consolidation of certain United States land offices, be revoked so far as it relates to the following:

In the State of California—
INDEPENDENCE with VISALIA.
In the State of Colorado—
GUNNISON with MONTROSE.
STERLING with AKRON.
HUGO with LAMAR.
In the State of Wyoming—
LANDER with BUFFALO.

And the registers and receivers at the offices above named will take no further action in the matter.

Given under my hand, at the city of Washington, this eighteenth day of September, A. D. 1894.

By the President:
S. W. LAMOREUX,
Commissioner of the General Land Office.

By reference to our advertising columns the card of J. G. Smith, People's Party nominee for the assembly and endorsed by the Democrats, appears. Mr. Smith is a man of sterling integrity and if elected to the office for which he has been nominated and endorsed the voters of the District can rely upon a clean, upright and never flagging interest for the welfare of the people of the whole District. Voters should not fail to notice that the name of J. G. Smith is voted for.

George Meads and Rudolph Schober passed through town Wednesday with two eight-horse teams en-route to Mojave, where they will have two weeks hauling for the Salt Wells Borax Company, before returning with a load of freight.

Alfred Chartz the well known stenographer, passed a successful examination on Saturday last before the Judges of the Supreme Court of Nevada, and was admitted to practice law in all the Courts of that State.

D. J. Hession and P. W. Forbes of Independence are circulating among the voters of the north end of the valley. While P. A. Chalfant and W. T. Bunney are doing the same in the southern end.

All voters who have obtained registration transfers from other counties, must in addition to filing the same make the usual registration affidavit at the County Clerk's office or before any authorized Clerk or Assessor's deputy's.

Congressman Caminetti will address the people of Big Pine on the political situation on Tuesday morning, Oct. 16, at 9 a. m. and Bishop in the afternoon at 2, p. m.

Webb Walker, Independent candidate for Assessor, is again interviewing the voters of this section. If earnest work counts for anything Webb will surely get there.

Jack Welch and R. Dunlap of Fish Springs, were visitors in Independence during the week.

LOST.

CHAPTER XIV.

HOW THEY WERE LOST IN THE STORM.

"So you have returned, Mr. Bellingham!"

From the Albemarle to Wallie's house was not a long distance, but it had begun to snow, and the keen northerly wind drove the flakes straight into the faces of the pedestrians and afforded Wallie a good excuse for keeping his mouth shut, or opening it only for monosyllabic answers to the questions which Ed from time to time addressed to him. With all his pains he had undoubtedly bungled the interview with the Russian star—just at the juncture, too, when he was beginning to entertain the best hopes of success. How swiftly and effectively she had turned the tables upon him! What terrible versatility and self command she had! With what a wicked roguishness had she fired that parting taunt at him about his motive in espousing her rival's cause! "At any rate I'm glad I let her have the last word!" said Wallie to himself; but that was somewhat cold comfort.

He left Ed in the drawing room and went to find Mrs. Cadwalader and Beatrix. He sent the latter to her brother and remained in conference with the former.

Beatrix came softly into the drawing room and saw Edward standing near the farther end of it with his back toward her. She paused, and remained motionless, gazing at him. Her heart went out toward him, and yet she shrank from him. She wished to be in full sympathy with him, but Marana seemed to stand between them. For when she had learned from Geoffrey's letter to Wallie that Marana was Ed's companion she had been forced to the conclusion that the relation between them must be an unlawful one, and the circumstance that Marana, rather than any other woman, should be the person holding this position had affected her with a peculiar horror. There seemed to be something wantonly repugnant in it. She might have prevented herself from definitely realizing the fact had a stranger to herself been involved; but Marana!—she had lived under her name and occupied her place so long as to make her feel that she was in some way personally mixed up in the catastrophe.

In a few moments Ed turned round and saw his sister.

The personal magnetism of eye to eye with those who are really dear to each other overcomes, for the time being, all scruples and recoilings. When, therefore, her brother gave a glad start, and stepped toward Beatrix with an inarticulate exclamation of affection, she forgot everything except that he was her brother, with whom she had spent her childhood, who had cut his initials on the banister of the old staircase, whose white roses she had worn on her bosom until within the last few months, by whose side she had ridden, and in whose company she had ransacked the woods; she found herself with her arms round his neck, kissing him, smiling with wet cheeks, and murmuring: "Dear Ed! dear, darling boy! Oh, I am so glad to have you again!"

"How well you are looking, sis!" he said at length, taking her by the elbows and looking at her. She was, indeed, beautifully dressed, and her face was rosy with the emotion of the moment, and, passion aside, he cared more for her than for any one else, but he had not the eyes to discern the traces of fatigue and anxiety on her face; it takes a lover to do that. When a man looks at his sister he thinks of the past; when he looks at his mistress he thinks of the present and the future.

"Why, but you're a great swell now, aren't you?" Ed continued laughingly. His temperament varied quickly, and without any moral reason, between extremes of depression and joviality. "I had no idea my little sis was going to come out on the top of the heap this way. I always said nobody could beat you singing, though, and nobody can, though Vera is perfect in her way, too."

"Vera?" she repeated, glancing up quickly.

"That's her name—Vera Marana. Ah, my dear, I've got a heap to tell you about her! By the way," he said, laughing, "people here, I suppose, think you know more about Marana than any one else. Well, you do look a little like her—that's what first made me look at her. But I want you to know her; I'm certain you'd take to each other. She's the dearest woman in the world, and as generous and good as she is lovely."

"Good?" repeated Beatrix, whose face during this speech had run through a gamut of expressions and now rested in bewilderment.

"Good! I should think so. Do you imagine I'd want you to know her if she wasn't everything a lady should be, and a great deal more? You ought to have heard the way I sailed into poor old dad just now for calling her names. I guess he won't do it again!"

Beatrix clapped her hands together under her chin with a cry of almost hysteric joy, and instantly embraced her brother again with all the added ardor that can be given to affection by remorse. She had wickedly wronged him by allowing herself to imagine, even for a moment, that he or anybody connected with him could ever be anything but patterns of honesty and virtue. For fear of making bad worse she forbore to explain to him the cause of her sudden demonstrativeness; he should be made conscious of her repentance only by the tenderness and observance which she would lavish upon him. The thought came into her mind also that, by her love for her brother, she could in some degree compensate herself for the loss of her other love—for she told herself that it was lost, and had been repeating the statement with tenfold diligence ever since learning that Geoffrey had returned to New York.

Ed, who was never particularly observant of the feelings of others, except when his own feelings were bound up in them, passed over all this little tumult of emotion without any suspicions, and, in response to his sister's eagerly expressed interest in the subject, talked about himself and his affairs to the heart's content of both speaker and listener. He no longer felt the humiliation and helplessness of his position so keenly as an hour ago. The companionship of this sister, whom he had so recklessly impoverished, and to whose energy and genius he was under such weighty obligations, insensibly began to put him in better humor with himself and his prospects. It is not difficult to take a reassuring view of our conduct when our natural bias thereto is stimulated by the sympathy of one who emphasizes the significance of all the favorable features and brushes out of sight all the ungainly ones.

Ed gave his sister a picturesque and stirring account of his first meeting with Marana, their mutual captivation, what she had said, what he had answered, what she had answered, and what he had said. He made it appear plainly that his spending a hundred thousand dollars was a proceeding rather meritorious and self-sacrificing than otherwise, inasmuch as it would have been unworthy a Randolph not to make a splendid appearance in the eyes of the woman he loved, and amidst such rivals as those with whom he had to contend; and, moreover (as he truly observed), he himself was the worst off of any of the family when the money was gone. "And of course," he added, "I had no idea at what a rate I was going it; I declare, sis, I never was more floored than when dad wrote me that we were 'ruined by my criminal extravagance,' as he put it. Besides, we shouldn't have been ruined at all if he hadn't gone blundering down into Wall street. That's the way the money went, after all, and I can't help suspecting the old gentleman is as much to blame as I am."

"Well, dear, that's all right now; and I'm glad the money was gone, since it gave me a chance to help. But, Oh, Ed! do you think Mlle. Marana minds much? She can't think worse of me for doing it—in that way, I mean—than I do of myself; but what should we have done, you see, if I hadn't done it?"

"I don't blame you a bit, sis—remember that!" her brother replied. "I'm proud of you; there's not another girl in the country who could succeed as you have. And it's a great deal pleasanter for me to come home and find the bills paid than if I'd found you all living in the poorhouse—which was what I expected. All I'm sorry for is—however," he broke off magnanimously, "that can't be helped. It's only my luck!"

"Dearest boy! do tell me everything!"

Ed heaved a sigh. The sense of his misfortunes, dispelled for a time by the animation of his self vindication and anecdotes, now returned upon him. "I'm the most unlucky devil alive, and there's no use talking about it," he declared despairingly.

"Oh, Ed! if you can be married what greater happiness could there be?" said his sister, with a suppressed sigh for her own unimportant misery.

"Exactly! but we can't."

"Oh, you can! Who says not? Don't ever let anything prevent you!" Beatrix exclaimed with great energy. There is sometimes a bitter consolation in urging upon others conduct which we would fain embrace ourselves. "If you love a person everything is right and wise, except to let yourself be parted from them. But that is almost wicked!"

"What must be must!" responded Ed in a still more hopeless tone, but not without a secret hope that some method might be devised to escape the inevitable.

Beatrix paused, thinking intently, and with increasing agitation.

"I believe I know what you mean," she said at last, with a deep undertone of sad affection in her voice. "You think you ought not to marry her because I am your sister—that is, because I have wronged her. Oh, Ed, that is it! You can't deny it, dear. You would sacrifice all your happiness so as not to seem to take her part against me. I might have known that it could be nothing less noble than that; but it shall not be—you must not dream of it! When she knows how sorry I am—and she shall know—everybody shall know it! I'll tell you how it shall be," she continued, springing up from the sofa on which they were sitting together, and pacing up and down, passing the fingers of one hand at intervals over her forehead and hair. At length she stopped in front of him.

"To-morrow evening is my last performance," she said. "After it is over I will ask Gen. Inigo to tell the audience, or perhaps it would be better if I went out and told them myself, all the whole story, how I came to take her place, and who I really am, and all! After that she will forgive me; I'll make her forgive me for your sake; and then, Ed, dear," she concluded with a misty smile and a tremor of the lip, "you need not be afraid to make her my sister!"

"It's splendid of you to think of such a thing, dear little sis!" exclaimed her brother, drawing her down to him and kissing her. "But it would never do to go to work in that way; in the first place it might knock all your popularity on the head. The public doesn't understand generous and elevated conduct as I do."

"No matter if they don't understand it. I have already made up my mind to one thing, I shall never sing on the stage after to-morrow."

"What a notion! See if you don't."

"No, indeed. I had decided on that before—before I knew anything about your affairs, you dear boy! The debts are paid, and papa and I can live in the old house again, and that is all I ever meant to do. Being on the stage is not pleasant in some ways, and besides—well, at any rate I'm determined, and when I am determined I never change; and I will tell the audience so to-morrow night."

"No, no! I tell you," cried Ed, becoming lively again, "if singing won't do for you on the stage speechifying's out of the question. You'd be like these women's rights geese. There's no necessity for it, either. If Vera knew that you wouldn't feel hurt at my marrying her I dare say she'd come round all right. The only difficulty then would be that I should seem to be, in a certain way, dependent on her. But I have been thinking the last few days that I'd go into some profession—engineering, or architecture, or something of that kind—and then I guess I could be making money enough in a year or two to take the edge off the thing. I'm not a fool, sis, though maybe I have acted rather like one."

"You are the dearest and best brother in the world," said Beatrix, with the gentleness of profound conviction; and on the heels of this moderate statement Wallie Dinsmore came into the room and invited Edward to sit down to a cold lunch with him. "The ladies would not wait for us," he observed, "and it would be foolhardy for us to wait for dinner. Of course Miss Randolph and Mrs. Dinsmore will pour out our beer for us."

Edward assented; but Beatrix, after a moment's hesitation, excused herself on some feminine plea, and, refusing any escort or offer of a carriage, set out on foot toward her home, as she had accustomed herself to call it. The evening was now at hand, though it lacked something of 4 o'clock. The sidewalks were covered with a drifting layer of white, and the flakes still swirled and dangled downward from the obscure blankness overhead. As Beatrix, walking briskly, approached Madison square the frigid glare of the electric lamp, from the summit of its immense mast, marked itself out on the storm like a gigantic tent of light.

Warmly wrapped in her fur lined cloak Beatrix did not mind the snow and wind; they gave her a kind of pleasure; she felt strengthened and heartened by the robust pungency of the atmosphere. It reminded her of her winters in the old place far up the Hudson—the days of frozen forests and gigantic snowballs, and the long icicles hanging from the eaves on the southwest corner. Well, her work was all but done, and she might begin that life again as soon as she pleased. But could that life ever begin again for her? After all the events and experiences of this season could she, in a moment, become Beatrix Randolph once more? Had not the name of Marana carried some spell with it, whose effects would never leave her? As she speculated thus, and her heart began to sink again, she turned the corner of Fifth avenue and came into collision with a gentleman who was proceeding swiftly in the opposite direction.

Her head was bent, her veil was over her eyes, the air was full of snow and the confusing dazzle of street lights; it was impossible that she should know who this man was, and yet she did know at once, and she even fancied that she had anticipated the meeting a moment before it occurred. And, first, a great wave of joy seemed to swell and murmur in her heart, and then she called to mind all manner of unwelcome and crippling considerations, and drew herself together in a defensive attitude. Physically she stopped, breathing quickly, and removing one hand from her muff to keep down her veil. She thought he would perhaps not recognize her. But a man can recognize the woman he loves by a glimpse of the movement of her shoulder far off in a crowd—nay, by the toss of the feather in her hat. The magic of love consists mainly in its stimulating us to use our senses; and then we are surprised to discover what a marvelous capacity and keenness those senses have. The heavenly intelligence of angels can only be the result of the depth and ardor of their power to love.

"Mademoiselle"—he began, and stopped, for he had never called her by her real name, and though he knew now what it was it had no personal association with her in his mind. "I was going to find you," he continued.

"I was not lost. So you have returned, Mr. Bellingham?"

"I must speak to you, Miss Randolph!"

"Is it necessary on this corner? A singer must be careful of her throat, you know."

"Take my arm. I'll get a hack for you."

"Thank you; I am doing very well."

She walked on and he walked beside her. The facilities for conversation were certainly not good, even had the readiness been there. He was six or seven inches taller than she, and he was obliged to stoop and speak loud in order to insure her hearing him, while he was in danger of missing or misinterpreting the muffled murmur of her replies. But there was in Bellingham a great deal of constancy and concentration of purpose.

"I don't expect you to forgive me," he said. "Only understand that I can never forgive myself. Such a blunder should have been impossible to a man who felt toward you as I did. If I had been worth your caring for I should not have made it."

"It was natural; you could not have done anything else; I do not blame you," said Beatrix through her veil. Geoffrey did not wholly catch her words; he understood her to say that such a mistake was only to be expected of him, and his face fell. She perceived the change in him, and faltered out, "I mean that I do forgive you!" But a Fifth avenue stage, rattling by just then, drowned this sentence altogether.

THE LAND OF PROMISE

Is the mighty West, the land that "tickled with a hoe laughs a harvest;" the El Dorado of the miner; the goal of the agricultural emigrant. While it teems with all the elements of wealth and prosperity, some of the fairest and most fruitful portions of it bear a harvest of malaria reaped in its fullness by those unprotected by a medicinal safeguard. No one seeking or dwelling in a malarial locality is safe from the scourge without Hostetter's Stomach Bitters. Emigrants, bear this in mind. Commercial travelers sojourning in malarious regions should carry a bottle of the Bitters in the traditional gripsack. Against the effects of exposure, mental or bodily overwork, damp and unwholesome food or water, it is an infallible defense. Constipation, rheumatism, billiousness, dyspepsia, nervousness and loss of strength are all remedied by this genial restorative.

ASSIST NATURE

a little now and then, with a gentle, cleansing laxative, thereby removing offending matter from the stomach and bowels, and toning up and invigorating the liver and quickening its tardy action, and you thereby remove the cause of a multitude of distressing diseases, such as headaches, indigestion, biliousness, skin diseases, boils, carbuncles, piles, fistulas and maladies too numerous to mention.

If people would pay more attention to properly regulating the action of their bowels, they would have less frequent occasion to call for their doctor's services to subdue attacks of dangerous diseases.

That, of all known agents to accomplish this purpose, Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets are unequalled, is proven by the fact that once used, they are always in favor. Their secondary effect is to keep the bowels open and regular, not to further constipate, as is the case with other pills. Hence, their great popularity with sufferers from habitual constipation, piles and indigestion.

THEY SOOTHE. NEVER IRRITATE.

Some people have a prejudice against plasters, because, as they think, they burn and blister. That is true of many, but not of ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS. They never irritate the skin, but always have a soothing effect.

They are useful in cases of any local pain and as a rule will bring immediate relief. If they do not, it is because the trouble has been allowed to become so serious that no external remedy will reach it, and the chances are that any treatment will fail.

For stitches in the side, weakness or lameness of the back, stiffness of the joints ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS have been proved again and again to be not only a relief, but a cure.

SHIPPING STRAWBERRIES EAST.

A carload of Florin strawberries were shipped recently to the East. Speaking of this shipment, G. H. Appel, agent for the Fruit Transportation Company, said: "This in the beginning of regular and expensive shipments of Florin strawberries to Eastern points, should the market there warrant its continuance. I see no reason why California strawberries should not meet with the same favor that other fruits from here receive. There has been a large increase in the acreage of strawberry culture, and should the eastern demand for the berries prove satisfactory that industry will certainly grow to large proportions. The Florin growers produce berries of excellent quality, and their long experience in the business has taught them how to pack the berries for shipment. I feel quite hopeful of this new branch of the fruit industry, and the result of today's shipment will be looked for with interest."

SCHOOL EXCURSIONS.

German Method of Imparting Practical Instructions.

THE PREPARATION OF THE PUPILS.

Dr. J. M. Rice Writes of an Excursion Which He Attended Through the Luther Country.

Dr. J. M. Rice is one of the most careful students of the public shool system of the United States. Some time ago he visited the public schools of thirty-six of the principal cities of the country, and his account of his inspection is one of the most elaborate studies of the American system of public education. For the September number of "The Century," Dr. Rice has written an article on "School Excursions in Germany," with particular reference to one expedition, made by the Pedagogical Seminary at Jena through Luther's country in connection with a study of the Reformation. Dr. Rice was a guest on this excursion, which gave him much food for thought. He writes as follows:

"The principal purpose of instructive excursions, as conducted by the schools of Germany, is to lead the child, by guided observation, to acquire a broad knowledge of his environment. Indeed, the study of the home surroundings of the child is recognized in the German schools as a special branch of knowledge, and it is included in the curriculum for the first three school years under the name of Heimathskunde (home-ology).

While in some of the German schools instruction in this branch is still limited to class-room work, in others—perhaps the majority—the teachers are in the habit of taking their pupils upon instructive walks for the purpose of introducing them, in a natural manner, into almost every branch of knowledge. Cannot everywhere material be found for teaching, from nature, botany, zoology, geology and the elements of geography. Are not the works of man represented by the streets and buildings, the shops and factories? Does not the government of every town contain the elements of general government? And may not the local historical associations serve to introduce the child into the study of universal history.

The most progressive German teachers are accustomed to take their pupils upon an excursion whenever occasion calls for one, whether the interval be a month, a week or even a day. And, depending upon the aim of the particular outing, they walk with their pupils over the hills, or along the banks of streams, or visit instructive buildings, such as museums, castles and factories. As a rule, sufficient material is collected on a single outing to serve as a basis for a number of lessons in home-ology in the class-room.

But in some schools of Germany objective teaching has reached a still higher stage of development. In these schools the idea of the Heimthsunkde is extended so as to include, after the third year, the study of the broader home—the fatherland. On many occasions even Switzerland and Italy have been visited by German schoolmasters, accompanied by large classes of children. Where the broader aim is found, the children, after entering upon their fourth school year, are taken annually on an excursion, the duration of which is from one to two weeks. Long outings are usually termed "school journeys."

Extremely novel as the idea of the extended tour may appear, it is, nevertheless, true that journeys were undertaken by the eminent pedagogues Basedow and Salzmann, a hundred years ago. Since the initiative was given by these educators, pedagogical journeys have been constantly growing in favor. At the present time they are regularly conducted by a rather large number of German schools, both public and private. During the course of time not only has the number of followers increased, but the journeys themselves have become more scientific in their management. Generally speaking, the work now undertaken on a tour is more organically connected with the curriculum than was the case in former years, and the material to be studied is more definitely selected with reference to the interests and mental capacity of the pupils. It is necessary to add, however, that even at the present time the journeys conducted by some schools are much more scientific in their aim than those undertaken by others.

Dr. Rice then proceeds to describe the particular expedition made by the Jena Seminary in 1893. This was undertaken for the purpose of preparing the pupils for the study of the history of the Reformation, it involved, first, a visit to Bavaria, in order that the pupils might become somewhat acquainted with the appearance and customs of a Catholic country, and secondly, a tour through the Thuringian Forest, and particularly through the districts where Luther spent much of his time while translating the Bible into the German language.

The last school-day before the start was devoted entirely to the final preparations. On that day the boys made their appearance with their knapsacks packed, ready for the tour. The things to be taken had been definitely prescribed, and they were now inspected by the teachers. The footwear was examined with particular care, as imperfections in this direction would be liable to incapacitate the pupils for the long tramps. Besides the necessary clothing, each pupil was required to be provided with a piece of soap and a towel, and every third child with a clothes brush, a blacking-brush, needles thread, and buttons. The school supplied for the benefit of the party the following articles; a medicine-chest, a field-glass, a compass, a magnifying-glass, a barometer, and a tape-measure. When the knapsacks had been inspected the boys were drilled in packing regard being had for both speed and order.

Next, the class was divided into sections or committees of three, for the performance of special duties. These committees were: first, an advance guard, whose duty consisted in leading the way, and thus determining the rapidity of the gait; secondly, a rear guard, whose members were obliged to search through rooms and cars, in order that nothing might be forgotten on leaving hotels and trains, and further, to coax or push along children inclined to fall behind during the march; thirdly, the purchasing committee, who attended to the purchasing of the lunches required by the party during the day; and lastly, the committee of inquiry, to ask the way when necessity required, and to search for points of interest which the party would not be likely to come upon naturally. In order that the pupils may become trained in the performance of these various duties, each section serves in the small capacity only one day at a time. During the excursion each section is placed in charge of a teacher or a student, who is required to observe that the duties are properly performed by the children. The hotel arrangements are made by the principal of the school a week or two in advance.

The session concluded with a final recitation concerning the special points of interest to be observed. During this recitation a map of the route was drawn on the board, and copied by the pupils in their note-books. Each child was provided with a memorandum-book containing notes taken during the preparatory lessons, each alternate page being left blank for entries to be made on the way.

When the children had been dismissed, the teachers and students who had decided to take part in the journey met for their final conference. During the journey, however, conferences were held every evening after the children had retired. At these meetings the work of the day was criticized, and special traits of character that had been observed among the children were discussed. While the excursion was conducted under the general supervision of one of the regular class teachers, the direct instruction was, as a rule, left in the hands of the students, each student who had volunteered to take part in the instruction being placed in charge of the excursion for a whole day. Again, a number of students were appointed each to make a report of the proceedings of a single day.

The account of the excursion, with its progress day by day through beautiful country, rich in historical associations, is very entertaining. The boys climbed the mountains, studying geography, botany and geology by the way; they visited factories and workshops, and learned about familiar industries. Then they saw all the places associated with Luther's life, and sang his hymn in the room in which it was written. Dr. Rice was astonished at the powers of observation and reflection developed by the boys, and by their facility in rectiation. The children put up with many hardships, eating the simplest and scantiest of meals, and several times being compelled to sleep on bare floors without proper covering.

The expense, he says, although fully as high as on other occasions of a similar nature, was almost incredibly small.

All things included, the cost, per capita, did not exceed 60 cents a day.

The highest amount paid in any one inn for dinner, lodging and breakfast was 32 cents—18 cents for dinner, 9 cents for lodging and 5 cents for breakfast.

Fifteen cents covered the cost of the three lunches. The remainder was spent on railway fares, and on entrance fees to castles and observatories. To school excursionists railway tickets are sold at a reduction of 66 per cent. from the regular rates, and still greater reductions are made on entrance fees to instructive places. Thus, in Germany, school excursions are in every way encouraged. The funds required for the journey are in part provided by the university, and in part given in the form of donations by the students of pedagogy and other friends of the school. The pupils are not obliged to contribute, but a few of them usually pay a small sum.

Dr. Rice advocates the introduction of similar school excursions in this country, and last year, at his suggestion, one was undertaken by the public school authorities of Anderson, Ind., and proved very successful.

MICROBES IN IRONCLADS.

A chemist in the Navy has observed that the ironclads remained intact when in open sea, or in certain parts of ports. When in stagnant water they were attacked by a destructive agent, which manifested its action by the presence of small holes in the metal. This condition occurred more rapidly when the vessels were anchored near an outlet for sewage. Experiments proved that a sample of the iron immersed in sea water, taken from sea at a distance from the shore, remained intact; samples immersed in sea water taken near the coast, were attacked more or less quickly according to the distance that the water was from the shore; where polluted sea water was sterilized by heat the metal was attacked by it very slowly, and this action, instead of increasing, was quickly arrested; the microbes and the spores being destroyed, fresh toxines were not produced. The action of those present being soon exhausted, the metal ceased to be attacked. These biological facts have evidently a close relation with sanitation.—British Medical Journal

CURRANT GROWING.

Not Widely Profitable as a Commercial Fruit.

IT FAILS IN HOT DRY SITUATIONS.

M. C. Latta Gives His Views Before the Whatcom Horticultural Society.—The Bush Form Preferable.

Although currants may be successfully grown in many parts of California, they are not widely profitable as a commercial fruit. The area of currants grown for the market does not increase—in fact it is probably less than it was ten years ago. It is so easy to produce in excess of the demand that planters have reduced their acreage. Even as it is, the San Francisco market price usually drops during the height of the currant season to a price too low for profit to the grower. As a fruit for home use or for sale in nearby local markets, the currant is always worthy of attention.

The currant fails usually in the hottest, driest, interior situations, but even in unfavorable places one can succeed measurably well by growing the bushes under the cover of fruit trees and maintaining moisture enough in the soil to supply both the bushes and the trees. The currant is exacting about a constant moisture supply and protection from fierce dry heat. If this is borne in mind and the conditions ensured by shade, by irrigation and by mulching or continuous surface cultivation, the currant will probably yield satisfaction in many places where it is now regarded as a failure.

There is one point about California currant growing which has been noticed from the earliest years, and that is that varieties which are of lesser value elsewhere become our most trustworthy sorts. The Cherry currant was condemned at the East before it achieved its great triumph in California. Fay's Prolific has, if we mistake not, proven of greater value in Califorina than elsewhere. On the other hand, we grow but few of the sorts which are most highly esteemed elsewhere. In veiw of this fact, the following statement of the behavior of varieties in Washington, as given by M. C. Latta, before the Whatcom Horticultural Society, is of interest:

Of the several varieties, such as the Fay's Prolific, Red Dutch, Cherry, White Dutch, White Grape, Victoria Red, etc., after several years of trial and observation here in Whatcom, we have found Fay's Prolific an entire failure, its enormous crops of blossoms in every instance failing to set and mature fruit, and from reading and noting its successes and failures throughout the broad extent of our land, I am of the opinion that from continual booming it has received a reputation altogether undeserved as to its being a desirable variety in all parts of the country. The Cherry never fails to produce crops of very fine large berries, but is a very shy bearer, which fault becomes more objectionable as the bush grows older. The Red Dutch is an enormously prolific variety, but its berries are rather small, but upon the whole, if we could by careful selection and cultivation succeed in increasing the size of the berries somewhat, there probably would be no better kind as far as now known for general and profitable cultivation. For a late variety the Victoria Red is perhaps the best, especially of the older kinds. As a white variety I find the White Grape a very desirable and prolific kind, and from their present knowledge, would prefer it to any other. The white currant is not found a native in any part of the world, but is a cultivated variety of the red. For general and profitable cultivation, we would confine ourselves to neither of the above—in fact some of them, if tolerated at all in the fruit garden, would be only as varieties.

Mr. Latta's plan of propagating and training the currant is sound according to our experience. We quote as follows:

In order to obtain the most satisfactory and profitable returns we take cuttings for propagation from bushes that produce the largest amount of good-sized berries, marking them at the time of picking the fruit for that purpose, and our largest yields are invariably obtained in this way, in some instances picking thirteen pounds of fruit from a single stock, as trained in tree form, while under the same conditions it would take an average of three or four of the Cherry variety to yield an equal amount. While the currant will bear as much or more neglect than any other of the edible fruits, yet none of them responds so generously to high and thorough cultivation, nor pays a greater percentage on care and labor. The plant is a gross feeder and will assimilate readily any of the coarser of the barnyard or other manures; it is easily propagated from cuttings of about eight inches in length, of the new wood taken from the bush at any time from the falling of the leaves in late summer until the buds are fairly out in the spring; we take cuttings in the fall and heel them in the ground during the winter, covering them lightly with mulch or rough litter, and plant them out as early as the ground can be properly worked in the spring; if heeled in the fall, during the winter the callus for the development of the roots is formed at the base of the cutting, and they make better growth the following season than if taken from the bush and planted out in the spring.

In planting out cuttings we rub off all buds excepting the two nearest the top, we place in the ground, with the top bud about on a level with the surface, and tramp or press the soil very firmly around them; if these methods are carefully observed there will be no difficulty in getting a large proportion of the cuttings to grow.

Mr. Latta approves growing currants in bush form rather than as standards. He does not state all the reasons for growing several stems. Perhaps they do not have the stem borer at the north. In California the advantage of having several fruiting stems is very apparent when borers get into one or more of them. If the borer gets into the trunk of a standard the bush is ruined until new shoots come from below. It is not so with bushes. When the injured stems are cut out, the bush usually has enough left to pursue its growth and fruiting. As to training and yield Mr. Latta writes as follows:

Our method of training has been the single stock or tree form, and while this is neat and attractive, in garden cultivation for the largest returns of yield and profit I would train a stool of three or four stalks instead of one. In the fruit garden, for the best convenience in cultivation, gathering, handling, etc., I would plant the stools three feet apart in rows six feet from each other, thus making 2420 stools to the acre. From the above we may be able to make a fairly approximate estimate of the amount and value of an acre of this fruit; at a conservative estimate each stool the second year from the planting of a one-year-old stock would produce an average of three pounds, and the fourth year when in full bearing would average seven pounds of fruit. These are conservative estimates, and under liberal fertilizing and high cultivation they would yield much more; but taking these estimates we would have at the end of the fourth year about 17,000 pounds of fruit as the product of one acre, and placing the market value at five cents per pound we would have $850.

These figures are of course sometimes realized, both in weight of crop and price, but very seldom is the outcome anything like his figures. Probably if the grower can average one-quarter as much he cannot complain.—Pacific Rural Press.

CIGARETTES.

Many of our readers have no doubt wondered what it was that made the cigarettes usually sold here have such a vile mephitic smell, so unlike tobacco or anything else but just sickening cigarettes. We think we have discovered the secret. In visiting a large machine shop lately we were shown an ingeniously constructed press which we were told was intended to press out flat and as thin as tobaccco leaves, the stems of tobacco after they had been steamed. As these stems are nothing but wood we can easily reconcile the smell of burning or rather smouldering wood in the cigarettes which rowdyish young boys and impecunious young men try to smoke and poison the atmosphere with. Upon mentioning our discovery to a gentleman who has access to one of these cigarette factories he said he had seen tobacco stems in bundles and bales there, but could not imagine what they used them for, but thought it likely they were waste products to be sent out. He added a little to our stock of information by telling us of the purchase by one of the cigarette factories of beet tops, which he said were dried, saturated with tobacco juice, and also made up in cigarettes. These two items together would rationally account for the vile suffocating stench of these cigarettes and for the rapid increase of throat diseases among the smokers of cigarettes. Every specialist in throat and lung diseases states positively that the use of cigarettes in this country has rapidly and enormously increased the death rate among young men. What have our health boards and legislators done about it? We are aware that these cigarette factories are closely guarded against outside inspection, but official examination cannot be resisted. Why should not proper health officers examine these poison manufactories and at one sweep kill this source of danger to young men and annoyance to the community, the cigarette evil?

A BONAPARTE PRINCESS ON A BICYCLE.

Recently, says a report from Turin, a Major of the Piemonte Reale Regiment, marching with his battalion, met the Princess Letitia, the widow of the Duke of Aosta, on a bicycle, accompanied by some friends. The Major who did not recognize the Princess, neither stopped his men nor saluted, and was immediately reported to headquarters, placed under arrest and asked to explain. He pleaded that he could never have imagined that her highness would run about in public on a bicycle. His case was reported by the corps commandant to the Minister of War and by him to King Humbert, who was intensely annoyed and ordered the Major to be released at once. The Princess is a daughter of the late Prince Napoleon, and sister-in-law, as well as niece to King Humbert. The King severely and publicly reprimanded his sister-in-law, intimating to her that by way of punishment for thus making an exhibition of herself she would for the space of two months be debared from the privilege of making use of the royal liveries, which, as in England, are scarlet. Inasmuch as court etiquette exacts that a princess of the blood should make use of no other livery either when driving out or when receiving and entertaining people at home, this is equivalent to placing the princess under arrest for eight weeks, an arrest which not only deprives her of driving or of going out to any entertainment, but likewise of receiving friends and acquaintances at her palace.

The "Pall Mall Gazette" says the German Emperor is ambitious to be the first crowned head to make a balloon ascension, and the areonautic section of the German Army is now experimenting in Berlin with a new-fangled balloon of the captive kind, which will have the honor of elevating his Majesty.

LAW AND THE LOBBY.

To Do Away With the Third House.

MASSACHUSETTS ATTEMPTS IT.

The Names of all Counsel to Appear Before Committees Must be Entered With the Sargent-at-Arms.

Mr. Joseph B. Bishop has written for the September number of "The Century," a paper entitled "The Price of Peace." This is a startling revelation of the blackmail levied upon business and corporate interests by legislative strikers in New York State. The following is an extract from his paper:

In writing about the lobby, in his "American Commonwealth," Mr. James Bryce says: "All legislative bodies which control important pecuniary interests are as sure to have a lobby as an army to have its camp-followers. Where the body is, there will the vultures be gathered together. Great and wealthy states, like New York and Pennsylvania, support the largest and most active lobbies." This was written several years ago, and was, like all the same author's comments upon American affairs, singularly penetrating and accurate. The lobby evil was then substantially the same in all the older and wealthier States, and the problem of coping with it by means of laws for its regulation was a subject of current discussion. But within recent years there have been developments which have resulted virtually in the discontinuance of the lobby in the richest State, and in the establishment in its place of the political boss as the disposer and regulator of all legislation. Since Mr. Bryce wrote also one State, Massachusetts, has passed a law for the regulation and restrait of the lobby.

The Massachusetts statute went into effect at the legislative session of 1891. It requires the sergeant-at-arms of the Legislature to keep two dockets, one for the names of all persons employed as counsel before committees, and the other for the names of all agents employed in connection with any legislation affecting the pecuniary interests of any individual, association or private or public corporation. Upon these dockets the names of each counsel and agent must be registered within one week of the date of his employment, with the length of time it is to continue the special subject or subjects of legislation to which his employment relates, and the name and business address of his employer. Whenever additional subjects of legislation are assigned to an agent or counsel, they must be entered on the books in such a manner that the entries opposite the name of each employer will show all the subjects of legislation in relation to which any counsel or agent is employed by him, and that the entries opposite the name of each agent or counsel will show all subjects of legislation with reference to which he is employed. No person whose name is not registered is allowed to appear as counsel before any committee, or to act in any manner as agent in respect to any legislation, and no person, or corporation, or association, is permitted to employ as counsel or agent any person who is not registered. Each register or docket is closed at the end of the session, and new ones must be opened at the ensuing session. Within thirty days after adjournemnt, every person, corporation or association, whose name appears on the docket as having employed any counsel or agent, must render to the secretary of the Comonmwealth a full, complete and detailed statement, sworn to before a justice of the peace, of all expenses paid or incurred in connection with promoting or opposing in any manner, directly or indirectly, the passage of legislation. Violation of any provision of the act is punishable by a fine of not less than $100 or more than $1000 for each offence; and any person seeking to act as counsel or agent, contrary to its provisions, is liable to the same penalties, and in addition will be debarred from acting in such capacity for a period of three years from the date of conviction.

The law demonstrated its usefulness in one respect immediately upon going into operation. At the first session of a legislature acting under its provisions, many professional lobbyists, including all those of the most notorious character, declined to put their names upon the dockets, and departed forever from the statehouse. Some of them took up their occupation in the hotel lobbies and other places frequented by members of the legislature, but they plied their trade under such disadvantages that most of them abandoned it permanently not long afterward. The regular counsel of the railway companies and other corporations appeared as usual and put their names on the dockets. At the close of the session of 1891, the Secretary of the Commonwealth sent to the Attorney-General the names of sixty-seven employers of counsel and agents who had failed to make sworn statements in accordance with the law. The attorney-general submitted the cases to the grand jury, but no indictments were returned. Since 1891 the attorney-general has sent notice to persons whose names have been given to him as those of employers failing to comply with the law, and they have all thereupon made the required returns.

As to the general working of this law, it is the verdict of all observers that it has made the air of the statehouse steadily clearer each year, the number of lobbyists growing smaller at each succeeding session, as the official figures show.

Let us now consider the case of New York, in which State, as I have said, the lobby has been superseded by a political boss, who dispenses and regulates all legislation. It has been a part of my professional duty for many years to keep close watch upon legislation at Albany, and to examine every bill that was introduced in either house of the legislature. I began to notice four years ago that certain forms of "strikes"—that is, bills against corporations, designed to reduce their profits or otherwise injure them, which had been familiar for many years—were not so plentiful as formerly. This was in the session of 1891. In the session of 1892 a still further diminution was perceptible. In 1893 there was a total void. Not a "strike" of any size or consequence was to be found among the bills from the opening to the close of the session. In 1894 a few of the familiar ones reappeared again, but they were of comparatively slight importance, and were able to make no progress. When the "strikes" began to fall off in 1891, loud complaints were heard from the lobby, and when the supply failed entirely in 1893, the lobbyists disappeared from the capitol, and what was no less significant, members who for years had been notorious legislative jobbers, began to complain audibly that there was no longer "anything in the business," since the bosses took all the profits.

During the session of the legislature of 1892, there were rumors in circulation that a new system had been put in operation, and that instead of "sending up the stuff to Albany" to quote Mr. Tilden's phrase in description of the lobby method—a way had been opened for the direct application of the "stuff" in New York city. I asked one attorney of a powerful corporation, who had spent much time at Albany every winter for many years, if he had any information on the point which he could give me. His answer was that he could only say that for the first time since his connection with the corporation he had not been asked to go to Albany to oppose any measure either in committee or elsewhere. I asked another attorney, whose knowledge of the ways of corporations was intimate and large, what he thought about the matter, and his reply was that if the truth could be got at, he suspected it would be found that every corporation liable to attack at Albany had "bought peace" for itself in New York city.

THE MAN FROM MONTANA.

The American steamship line has abandoned a carefully elaborated plan of feeding its passengers on course dinners instead of allowing them to order what they choose from the bill of fare and getting it once. On the last eastward trip of the steamer Paris the experiment was tried—but only twice. Passengers who wanted a slice of chicken and then a frantic scramble to the deck with a look at the sea, all in the space of ten seconds, had to wait until the rest had eaten their way through strata of hors d'oeuvre, soup, fish, entree, etc., before they could get their chicken.

The first meal served in this fashion was very well put on, and would have been voted a distinct success on land, but it took two hours to eat, and the vessel wouldn't keep still while it was being eaten. It was a splendid thing for those of the seasick, who wanted only soup, and they were delighted. But the others weren't.

Next day those of the passengers who had recovered talked it over and decided that the new plan was not brilliant. The question arose, however, of who should bell the cat and head the protest. After some search a Montana man, with a voice like a foghorn playing an accompaniment to an unoiled buzz saw, was stimulated up to the sticking point, and primed with a speech and a resolution to offer at the dinner table.

They had got as far as the entree on the second night when the Montana man suddenly rose. His stentorian "Ladies and gentlemen" was heard not only all over the ship, but in the next world and other places. Murmurs of approbation greeted him. In sad terms he enumerated the woes and the trials of the seasick, who tried to bore all the way through a course dinner, and he demanded an immediate return of eating the pudding first if you so elected.

"Out in Montana," said he, "we have everything put on the table at once, and each fellow starts where he has a mind to. Some folks like to begin with the coffee and end with the soup. Freedom is the basis of the American flag."

As he went on he became even more enthusiastic and magnetic than this. He worked every one up to a condition of wild enthusiasm, and when he perorated by reading his resolution it was carried almost unanimously, even the stewards, forgetting all sense of duty toward the line, voting in the affirmative.

Next night the dinner was served in the old way, "every fellow starting where he had a mind to."—London Correspondence of the New York Herald.

SHOULD MARRY AN AMERICAN HEIRESS

The peerage never fell so disastrously upon any one as on Bernard Coleridge, the eldest sons of the late Chief Justice. It means for him the sudden close of a most promising career and practical ruin. His father's estate is worth less than £2,000 annually, which is utterly inadequate to the dignities of his rank. The new peer succeeded in developing a most successful practice as a barrister. He must abandon this because he becomes, nolens volens, a member of the House of Lords. The theory is that every member of the upper House is a judge of the highest appeal court, and cannot, therefore, appear as an advocate in that or any inferior court.

Two uses for eggs are not generally known or appreciated. A fresh egg beaten and thickened with sugar, freely eaten, will relieve hoarseness, and the skin of a boiled egg, wet and applied to a boil, will draw out the soreness.

HAZARDOUS HAYING.

On Alpine Heights Where Goats Fear to Tread.

BRAWNY SWISS MAIDS DO THE WORK

Compelled to Mow Grass in Masculine Attire.—Weird, Rocky Region, and Plucky Folk.

The haymakers on our Westren prairies, and for that matter on the hilly and mountainous meadows of America, can form no conception of the hardships that the Alpine wildheuer of Switzerland have to brave in order to gather the winter's provender for their cattle.

Wildheuer is the name given to small peasants—men and women—who climb the rocky peaks of the Alps during the months of August and September, and gather the wild hay that grows on almost perpendicular, isolated grass plots, over yawning precipices and near threatening glaciers. The reader is reminded of Schiller's graphic description of this fraternity in William Tell. It occurs in the third scene of the fourth act. Gessler, the Governor of Switz and Uri, approaches down the sloping Kuessnatch Pass with rocks on either side. Before him is a projecting cliff overgrown with brushwood. Armgard, the poor wife of a wildheuer, falls with her children in front of the Governor's horse and begs for the release of her husband, who is perishing behind prison bars, and when Rudolph der Harras, the adjutant, asks her: "Who are you, woman, and who is your husband?" he receives the following words in reply:

A poor wild-hay man of the Rigiberg,
Kind sir, who on the brow of the abyss
Mows down the grass from steep and rocky shelves
To which the cattle dare not climb.

Harras, the horseman, is conscience-stricken, and thus intercedes for the petitioner:

By Heavens! A sad and miserable life!
I prithee, give the wretched man his freedom;
How great soever his offense may be
His horrid trade is punishment enough.

To the woman:

You shall have justice, to the castle bring
Your suit; this is no place to deal with it.

And, indeed, no more dangerous occupation can be imagined. The work is laborious and the harvest poor. The mowers and rakers ascend with ropes and Alpine shoes to dizzy steepnesses, where goats and sheep do not venture to graze, much less the larger cattle. The mountaineers here are, of course, never assailed by vertigo and kindred troubles, which must be accounted for by heredity and constant climbing of perilous heights. But for this work only such men and women can be hired who can find no other means wherewith to keep the wolf from the door. These are the folks who work during the balance of the year at ridiculously low wages by the day in villages and inns, or as woodchoppers and weavers during the winter. Hundreds of householders in this vicinity rely for their whole year's supply of milk, butter and cheese on a single cow, and must make hay on the mountains while the sun shines—during August and September. Every canton in Switzerland has its hay laws, which set apart two months during the year for hay gathering, and which appoint the very day on which the work may be commenced, beside imposing many other oppressive ordinances and regulations. As soon as the hay day has come, these complacent, easily-contented, semi-Roman Teutons gather in convivial companies and begin their climbing marches amid the yolding of popular ditties and the singing of religious hymns. All carry alpenstocks, scythes, rakes and ropes, and a small knapsack of food and drink, sufficient for several days.

Often places are encountered where the grass is especially rich and luxuriant, but which can only be reached by dangling a mower down over the rocks, and thus enabling him to gather a few sackfuls of hay at a time, when another man is let down to finish the plot. It is generally found most expedient to select some accessible spot near the mountain road, and then to throw the hay bundles from the various little meadows along the paths. And it is marvelous with what dexterity the rakers have learned to throw their bundles.

Sometimes, however, no such convenient place can be found; then the poor people are compelled to carry their heavy, compact bundles on their shoulders down the steep, dangerous mountain path, or to let them down with ropes from one to another, somewhat like the water-carriers of ancient Egypt.

In the Canton Switz many young women are employed for this work. They are usually robust, brawny young maids, full of courage, every movement betraying power and agility. Necessity compels them to wear the masculine attire during these labors. As in the case of the Tyrolean shepherdesses, skirts would prove a great impediment in their work.

IGNORANCE IN MEXICO.

Says an American business man who has been living in Mexico: "What Mexico most needs is education. The ignorance of the peons is astonishing. If the great churches in America which are yearly sending millions of dollars to China and Africa to educate the heathen there, would devote a fair proportion of that money to Mexico far more good would be accomplished. The money would be better spent and the results more apparent. The few missionaries in that country are doing good, but their number is not sufficient. Then, less theology and more liberal education should be taught and sectarianism should not interfere with the work. Strange as it may seem, the English tongue has displaced the French as a foreign tongue, and is rapidly being learned by the younger natives."

Section 23. The members of the Legislature shall receive, in full payment for their services, the sum of one thousand (1,000) dollars, and mileage not to exceed ten cents per mile, and for contingent expenses not to exceed twenty-five dollars, for each session, to be paid out of the public treasury. No increase in compensation or mileage shall take effect during the term for which the members of either house shall have been elected, and the pay of no attache shall be increased after he is elected or appointed.

NOW THEREFORE, Pursuant to the provisions of the Constitution, and an Act of the Legislature entitled "An Act to provide for the submission of proposed amendments to the Constitution of the State of California to the qualified electors for their approval," approved March 7, A. D., 1883, viz:

"Section 1. Whenever the Legislature shall propose any amendment or amendments to the Constitution of this State, which amendment or amendments shall have been passed in the manner and form required by section one of article eighteen of the Constitution, and no other mode is provided by law for the submission of such amendment or amendments to the people for their approval, it shall be the duty of the Governor to advertise such proposed amendment or amendments in at least four newspapers of general circulation in this State, for three months next preceding the next general election. One of said newspapers must be published at the city of Sacramento, and two at the city of San Francisco; and in issuing his proclamation for an election at which any amendment or amendments to the Constitution are to be voted upon, he shall include such amendment or amendments therein, and he shall designate them by numbers, in the order in which they have been proposed."

The said amendments are submitted to be separately voted upon by ballot by the qualified electors of the State, on Tuesday, November 6, A. D. 1894.

Each ballot used at such election must contain, printed thereon, the words:

PROCLAMATION.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
SACRAMENTO, Aug. 4, 1894.

WHEREAS, the Legislature of the State of California, at its thirtieth session, beginning on the second day of January, A. D. 1893, two-thirds of all the members elected to each of the houses of said Legislature voting in favor thereof, proposed the following described amendments to the constitution of the State of California, to wit:

AMENDMENT NUMBER ONE.

ASSEMBLY CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT No. 8.

A resolution to propose to the people of the State of California an amendment to the Constitution of the State, amending section one of article two thereof, relative to the right of suffrage.

Section 1. Every native male citizen of the United States, every male person who shall have acquired the rights of citizenship under or by virtue of the treaty of Queretaro, and every male naturalized citizen thereof who shall have become such ninety days prior to any election, of the age of twenty-one years, who shall have been resident of the state one year next preceding the election, and of the county in which he claims his vote ninety days, and in the election precinct thirty days, shall be entitled to vote at all elections which are now or may hereafter be authorized by law; provided, no native of China, no idiot, no insane person, no person convicted of any infamous crime, no person hereafter convicted of the embezzlement or misappropriation of public money, and no person who shall not be able to read the Constitution in the English language and write his name, shall ever exercise the privileges of an elector in this State; provided, that the provisions of this amendment relative to an educational qualification shall not apply to any person prevented by a physical disability from complying with its requisitions, nor to any person who now has the right to vote, nor to any person who shall be sixty years of age and upwards at the time this amendment shall take effect.

AMENDMENT NUMBER TWO.

SENATE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT No. 14.

A resolution proposing to the people of the State of California an amendment to section three of article eleven of the Constitution of the State of California, relating to the formation of new counties.

Section 3. The Legislature, by general and uniform laws, may provide for the formation of new counties; provided, however, that no new county shall be established which shall reduce any county to a population of less than eight thousand; nor shall a new county be formed containing a less population than five thousand; nor shall any line thereof pass within five miles of the county seat of any county proposed to be divided. Every county which shall be enlarged or created from territory taken from any other county or counties, shall be liable for a just proportion of the existing debts and liabilities of the county or counties from which such territory shall be taken.

AMENDMENT NUMBER THREE.

ASSEMBLY CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT No. 7.

A resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the State of California, by adding a new section to article thirteen of the said Constitution, to be numbered section twelve and three-fourth (12¾), relating to revenue and taxation.

Section 12¾. Fruit and nut-bearing trees under the age of four years from the time of planting in orchard form, and grapevines under the age of three years from the time of planting in vineyard form, shall be exempt from taxation, and nothing in this article shall be construed as subjecting such trees and grapevines to taxation.

AMENDMENT NUMBER FOUR.

ASSEMBLY CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT No. 12.

A resolution proposing to the people of the State of California an amendment to section seventeen, article one, of the Constitution of the State of California.

Section 17. Foreigners of the white race, or of African descent, eligible to become citizens of the United States under the naturalization laws thereof, while bona fide residents of this States, shall have the same rights in respect to the acquisition, possession, enjoyment, transmission, and inheritance of all property, other than real estate, as native born citizens; provided, that such aliens owning real estate at the time of the adoption of this amendment may remain such owners; and provided further, that the Legislature may, by statute, provide for the disposition of real estate which shall hereafter be acquired by such aliens by descent or devise.

AMENDMENT NUMBER FIVE.

SENATE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT No. 17.

A resolution proposing to the people of the State of California an amendment to section seven, article eleven, of the Constitution of the State of California.

Section 7. City and county governments may be merged and consolidated into one municipal government, with one set of officers, and may be incorporated under general laws providing for the incorporation and organization of corporations for municipal purposes. The provisions of this Constitution applicable to cities, and also those applicable to counties, so far as not inconsistent or prohibited to cities, shall be applicable to such consolidated government.

AMENDMENT NUMBER SIX.

SENATE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT No. 7.

A resolution to propose to the people of the State of California an amendment to the Constitution of the State, amending section nine of article thirteen thereof, relative to the election of a State Board of Equalization.

Section 9. A State Board of Equalization, consisting of one member from each congressional district in this State, shall be elected by the qualified electors of their respective districts, at the first general election to be held after the adoption of this amendment, and at each general election every four years, whose term of office shall be for four years, whose duty it shall be to equalize the valuation of the taxable property in the several counties of the State for the purposes of taxation. The Controller of State shall be ex officio a member of the Board. The Boards of Supervisors of the several counties of the State shall constitute Boards of Equalization for their respective counties whose duty it shall be to equalize the valuation of the taxable property in the county for the purpose of taxation; provided, such State and County Boards of Equalization are hereby authorized and empowered, under such rules of notice as the County Boards may prescribe as to the county assessments, and under such rules of notice as the State Board may prescribe as to the action of the State Board, to increase or lower the entire assessment roll, or any assessment contained therein, so as to equalize the assessment of the property contained in said assessment roll, and make the assessment conform to the true value in money of the property contained in said roll; provided, that no Board of Equalization shall raise any mortgage, deed of trust, contract or other obligation by which a debt is secured, money or solvent credits, above its face value. The State Board of Equalization elected in eighteen hundred and ninety-four shall continue in office until their successors, as herein provided for, shall be elected and shall qualify.

AMENDMENT NUMBER SEVEN.

SENATE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT No. 16.

A resolution to propose to the people of the State of California an amendment to article thirteen of the Constitution, section one, in relation to revenue and taxation.

Section 1. All property in the State, not exempt under the laws of the United States, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as provided by law. The word "property," as used in this article and section, is hereby declared to include moneys, credits, bonds, stocks, dues, franchises, and all other matters and things, real, personal, and mixed, capable of private ownership; provided, that property used for free public libraries and free museums, growing crops, property used exclusively for public schools, and such as may belong to the United States, this State, or to any county or municipal corporation within this State, shall be exempt from taxation. The Legislature may provide, except in case of credits secured by mortgage or trust deed, for a deduction from credits of debts due to bona fide residents of this State.

AMENDMENT NUMBER EIGHT.

ASSEMBLY CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT No. 31.

A resolution to propose to the people of the State of California an amendment to section seven (7) of article nine (IX) of the Constitution of the State of California, by increasing the number of members constituting the State Board of Education, by adding thereto the President and Professor of Pedagogics of the University of California.

Section 7. The Governor, the Superintendent of Public Instruction, the President of the University of California, and the Professor of Pedagogy therein, and the Principals of the State Normal Schools, shall constitute the State Board of Education, and shall compile, or cause to be compiled, and adopt, a uniform series of text-books for use in the common schools throughout the State. The State Board may cause such text-books, when adopted, to be printed and published by the Superintendent of State Printing, at the State Printing Office, and when so printed and published, to be distributed and sold at the cost price of printing, publishing and distributing the same. The text-books so adopted shall continue in use not less than four years; and said State Board shall perform such other duties as may be prescribed by law. The Legislature shall provide for a Board of Education in each county in the State. The County Superintendents and the County Boards of Education shall have control of the examination of teachers and the granting of teachers' certificates within their respective jurisdictions.

AMENDMENT NUMBER NINE.

SENATE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT No. 20.

An Act to submit to the people of the State of California an amendment to section twenty-three of article four of the Constitution of the State of California.

Section 23. The members of the Legislature shall receive, in full payment for their services, the sum of one thousand (1,000) dollars, and mileage not to exceed ten cents per mile, and for contingent expenses not to exceed twenty-five dollars, for each session, to be paid out of the public treasury. No increase in compensation or mileage shall take effect during the term for which the members of either house shall have been elected, and the pay of no attache shall be increased after he is elected or appointed.

NOW THEREFORE, Pursuant to the provisions of the Constitution, and an Act of the Legislature entitled "An Act to provide for the submission of proposed amendments to the Constitution of the State of California to the qualified electors for their approval," approved March 7, A. D., 1883, viz:

"Section 1. Whenever the Legislature shall propose any amendment or amendments to the Constitution of this State, which amendment or amendments shall have been passed in the manner and form required by section one of article eighteen of the Constitution, and no other mode is provided by law for the submission of such amendment or amendments to the people for their approval, it shall be the duty of the Governor to advertise such proposed amendment or amendments in at least four newspapers of general circulation in this State, for three months next preceding the next general election. One of said newspapers must be published at the city of Sacramento, and two at the city of San Francisco; and in issuing his proclamation for an election at which any amendment or amendments to the Constitution are to be voted upon, he shall include such amendment or amendments therein, and he shall designate them by numbers, in the order in which they have been proposed."

The said amendments are submitted to be separately voted upon by ballot by the qualified electors of the State, on Tuesday, November 6, A. D. 1894.

Each ballot used at such election must contain, printed thereon, the words:

Assembly Constitutional Amendment Number Eight.	Yes. / No.
Senate Constitutional Amendment Number Fourteen.	Yes. / No.
Assembly Constitutional Amendment Number Seven.	Yes. / No.
Assembly Constitutional Amendment Number Twelve.	Yes. / No.
Senate Constitutional Amendment Number Seventeen.	Yes. / No.
Senate Constitutional Amendment Number Seven.	Yes. / No.
Senate Constitutional Amendment Number Sixteen.	Yes. / No.
Assembly Constitutional Amendment Number Thirty-one.	Yes. / No.
Senate Constitutional Amendment Number Twenty.	Yes. / No.

Witness my hand and the Great Seal of the State, affixed at Sacramento, the day and year first above written.

[SEAL] H. H. MARKHAM, Governor.

Attest: E. G. WAITE, Secretary of State.

ALIAS SUMMONS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE County of Inyo, State of California.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the County of Inyo, State of California, and the complaint filed in said County of Inyo in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

Victor Trepier Plaintiff, vs. Jaques Jalberque and Manasese Louca, Defendants.

The people of the State of California send greeting to Jaques Jalberque and Manasese Louca, Defendants:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the County of Inyo State of California, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this Inyo County, or, if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain the judgment of this Hon. Court dissolving the partnership heretofore and now existing between yourselves and the Plaintiff, under and by virtue of an agreement made and entered into by you on the 30th day of October, 1893, and that the title to the mines or mining claims described in said agreement may be adjudged freed from all the conditions thereof and restored as follows: That the Plaintiff is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "American Flag Mine;" that Defendant Jaques Jalberque is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "French Flag Mine" and that Defendant Manasese Louca is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "Mexican Flag Mine," as said mines are described in said agreement and the complaint of file herein; Together with the costs of suit.

Said plaintiff alleging that you have utterly failed, neglected and refused to in any manner whatsoever comply with the terms and conditions of said partnership agreement, or to perform any of the duties imposed thereby, since on or about the 27th day of January, 1894; as will more fully appear by reference to the complaint on file herein.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, said plaintiff will apply to Court for the relief demanded in said complaint.

Witness my hand and the Seal of said Superior Court of the County of Inyo, State of California, this 27th day of June, A. D. 1894.

The Soda Works at Keeler have closed down for the present.

Tate and Naylor are painting the outside of the Jockey Saloon.

A. L. Conklin and wife of Blackrock visited Independence this week.

Ben T. Williams and B. H. Yandell came down from Bishop last Sunday.

S. G. Sneden Esq., of Bishop, visited Independence the early part of the week.

Mr. McGinnis, the Weather Bureau Observer, arrived on Wednesday's train.

Mr. and Mrs. E. M. Clark started for the southern end of the county Tuesday.

Messrs. Dixon and McKeen of Bishop visited Independence last Thursday on land business.

H. Levy, Sam Gruber and A. V. Davidson left for the Coso hot springs last Wednesday.

Miss Etta Naylor has been substituting for Mr. Beale at the station while the latter has gone on a few days hunting expedition.

After a six month's visit with her father and friends Miss Alice Stecker left for Los Angeles last Monday, going by way of Keeler and Mojave.

Chinese in the interior of China are killing ministers, misionaries, and everything else that has a foreign appearance, and the half has not yet been told.

Osito, the young McKinney stallion, belonging to Irv H. Mulholland, won the two-year-old Futurity Stake at Los Angeles on Tuesday last. Time 2:30¼.

David Nagle, who was in Inyo during the Panamint excitement, arrived by Wednesday's train and left Thursday morning for Darwin by private conveyance.

Phil Cartier, who has been in Montana for the past two years, arrived in Independence by Monday's train. Phil looks as natural as ever and is pleased to return to the land of his first love.

The overland express train was held up and robbed on the Yolo plains, six miles from Sacramento, last week. The robbers are said to have received fifty thousand dollars for their trouble.

All candidates are on the move just now. County Clerk Hession came down on last Friday's train leaving again Saturday morning. P. A. Chalfant and W. T. Bunney arrived from the south last Monday.

It seems that Grove L. Johnson, the regular Republican candidate for Congress from our District, will not favor the Republicans of Inyo with a sample of his noted dramatic powers. He has much more important business on hand.

N. E. Conklin came down from San Francisco last night. Since being in the city he has been in the office of P. Reddy and has been studying hard. He returns with a certificate of admission to practice in the Supreme Court. This enables him to practice in all the courts of the State—Californian.

A Colusa schoolma'am had a pupil who was very naughty and she sent him out to procure a switch as suitable means of punishment. He returned with a magnificent specimen all nicely pared. She laid it on with vigor making a good job. She is now in the seclusion of her home ill. The rod was taken from a poison oak bush. The boy is well and in excellent spirits.

The voters in the Second District will doubtless favor the popular Caminetti, and will not stop to give serious thought to the candidacy of Grove L. Johnson, who is so openly and conspicuously a Southern Pacific man that his fight for Congress raises a laugh whenever it is mentioned. Mr. Caminetti has always worked industriously for the people of his district, while Mr. Johnson has been industrious in the interest of the railroad. It should be Caminetti in "the second."—Examiner.

Democratic Speaking.

Last Monday night Congressman Caminetti spoke to a large audience at the Court House. Long before the stated time for the commencement of the address people began to assemble from all parts of the surrounding country and filled the Court Room to overflowing with people eager to listen to our able Representative. The meeting was called to order by Mr. W. L. Hunter, who acted as Chairman, and in a few well chosen remarks introduced Mr. Caminetti. The speaker was greeted with hearty applause and spoke for two hours and a half, during which time he held the undivided attention of his audience. He spoke of the tariff, silver and Southern Pacific railroad monopoly and other leading questions that are of so much interest to farmers laborers, mechanics and business men of the present time. Mr. Caminetti is solid on the silver question, he says: "On silver I not only go as far as the Democratic platform but beyond it. To do anything short of securing free coinage at the rate of 16 to 1 is to favor Wall street—to favor action that savors too much of its wishes. I am for free coinage of silver on equality with gold at the rate of 16 to 1." As his past record will show Mr. Caminetti has always been against monopolies and for the people. Lack of space alone prevents us from giving a more extended account of his most able address.

Salt Wells Valley.

The following is an extract from a letter written by Mr. Henry Rhine from the Borax Marsh:

"The Chinamen are all very industrious rising at half past four, breakfasting at five and going to work immediately thereafter. They retire at about seven p. m. but do not attempt to sleep till about eight, the time being occupied in one continuous jabber. Mr. Chas. Ling, President, showed me over the marsh or rather a part thereof this morning, pointing out to me the soda, cotton ball and crude borax. Of the last named there is a field of about ten acres, which Mr. Ling says is of a very fine quality. At present the Company is making borax from the cotton ball. Seven loads of soda and seven loads of cotton ball are cooked together for about eight hours. At five a. m. fire is started under the boiler. This fire is kept up till about nine a. m. or until the water is brought to the boiling point. The soda is then dumped into the boiler and stirred continually by five men with long handled shovels. After the soda is all dissolved, the mud at the bottom of the boiler is shoveled out. Let me state here that I speak of soda and cotton ball as the terms are used industrially. The soda is some compound of soda and the cotton ball some compound of borax. By the process employed the soda combines with the foreign matter in the cotton ball and liberates the borax, which is held in solution in the water. After the mud which is necessarily thrown in with the soda is removed the cotton ball is dumped into the boiler and the stirring process is renewed. After having been sufficiently stirred, the mud which comes in with the cotton ball is shoveled out, and at about three o'clock the boiler is covered over with boards, and the water holding the borax in solution is allowed to settle. The next morning at two o'clock one of the Chinamen gets up and draws the water off by means of a hose fastened to an opening in the boiler into large galvanizing iron tanks. The mud remaining is drawn off by means of another hole in the opposite side of the boiler. This last mud so drawn off is run off into a large vat or hole in the ground and is afterward boiled again, yielding a very fine quality of borax. The tanks or crystallizers are about five feet high with a diameter of about five feet at the bottom and four feet at the top. Suspended from iron pipes across the top of the tanks are the hangers. These consist of strips of galvanized iron about fifteen inches wide and about five feet long, twelve to each tank. On these hangers the borax crystallizes, the process requiring about eight days. Each boiling is sufficient to fill two of these tanks, and the yield of borax about eight to ten sacks. The process of crystallization is more rapid in cold weather than in warm, there being a difference of about two days in the time required in summer and that required in winter. The water remaining in the tanks after crystallization is complete is also run into vats and the sediment remaining after the water has evaporated is given another boiling. The mud shoveled out by the men during the boiling process is not made further use of but is wheeled off in barrows. The borax crystals are scraped off the hangers and spread on a wooden platform to dry and afterward to sack. The soda and cotton ball are hauled to the boiler a distance of about a mile, and it keeps two teams going all day to haul the seven loads each of material and the sagebrush necessary for fuel."

A Detroit Builder.

HE TELLS A REMARKABLE STORY OF HIS LIFE.

CAME TO DETROIT ABOUT FORTY YEARS AGO.

Levi Elsey's Experience Worthy Serious Attention.

(From the Detroit Evening News.)

Away out Gratiot Avenue, far from the din and turmoil of the business centre, there are many attractive homes. The intersecting streets are wide, clean and shaded by large leaf-covered trees, and the people you meet are typical of industry, economy and honest toil. There are many pretty residences, but none more inviting in its neatness and home-like comfort than that of Mr. Levi Elsey, the well-known builder and contractor, at 74 Moran street, just off Gratiot. Mr. Elsey is an old resident of Detroit, having moved here about forty years ago. He has erected hundreds of houses in different parts of the city, and points with pride to such buildings as the Newberry & McMullan and Campaw blocks in which he displayed his ability as a superintendent.

"I have seen Detroit grow from a village to a city," he observed yesterday in conversation with the writer, "and I don't think there are many towns in America to-day equal to it in point of beauty. I know almost everybody in the city, and an incident which recently happened in my life has interested all my friends.

"It is now about eight years ago since I was stricken down with my first case of illness. One cold, blustering day I was down town and through my natural carelessness at that time I permitted myself to get chilled right through. When I arrived home that evening I felt a serious pain in my left leg. I bathed it that night but by morning I found it had grown worse. In fact, it was so serious that I sent for my family physician, and he informed me that I was suffering from varicose veins. My leg swelled up to double its natural size and the pain increased in volume. The agony was simply awful. I was laid up and never left my bed for eight weeks. At times I felt as though I would grow frantic with pain. My leg was bandaged and was propped up in the bed at an angle of 30 degrees in order to keep the blood from flowing to my extremities.

"I had several doctors attending me, but I believe my own judgment helped me better than theirs. After a siege of two months I could move around, still I was on the sick list and had to doctor myself for years. I was never really cured and suffered any amount of anguish.

"About two years ago I noticed an article in the Evening News about my friend, Mr. Northrup, the Woodward Avenue merchant. In an interview with him he stated that he had used Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People and that they cured him. I knew him very well, having built his house out Woodward Ave., and I thought I would follow his suggestion. I must confess I did so with marvelous success. From the time I began to take the Pink Pills I felt myself growing to be a new man. They acted on me like a magical stimulant. The pain departed and I soon was as strong and healthy as ever. Before trying the Pink Pills I had used any amount of other medicine without any noticeable benefit. But the Pills cured me and I was myself again.

"When a person finds himself relieved and enjoying health he is apt to expose himself again to another attack of illness. Some three months ago I stopped taking the Pink Pills, and from the day I did so, I noticed a change in my condition. A short time since I renewed my habit of taking them with the same beneficial results which met me formerly. I am again nearly as strong as ever, although I am a man about 56 years of age. I tell you, sir, the Pink Pills are a most wonderful medicine, and if they do as well in other cases as they did in mine they are the best in the world. I freely recommend them to any sufferer."

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills contain, in a condensed form, all the elements necessary to give new life and richness to the blood and restore shattered nerves. They are an unfailing specific for such diseases as locomotor ataxia, partial paralysis, St. Vitus' dance, sciatica, neuralgia, rheumatism, nervous headache, the after effect of la grippe, palpitation of the heart, pale and sallow complexions, all forms of weakness either in male or female. Pink Pills are sold by all dealers, or will be sent post paid on receipt of price (50 cents a box, or six boxes for $2.50—they are never sold in bulk or by the 100), by addressing Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Schenectady, N. Y.

Beatrix Randolph.

By JULIAN HAWTHORNE.

"I don't mean to persecute you," he remarked, speaking in a monotonous tone, as they walked onward side by side. "I didn't return from Europe for that; I merely wanted you to know. I used to think that, whatever happened, I could always think and act like a man who believed in goodness and—purity. But I failed at the important moment, and you may be right—it was only natural in me. For a long time—many years—before I met you I had nothing to do with women, and thought as little as possible about them. You seemed to me, when I first saw you, everything that I most wanted, and, at the same time, everything that I most disliked. It was the contradiction between what I felt you were and what I thought you were. That began with our first evening and went on exaggerating itself until the end. That's my story, Miss Randolph. After all it's only a long way of saying, 'I made a mistake and beg your pardon.'"

Beatrix heard all this, and the more she heard the more tormented she felt and the faster she tried to walk; but the sidewalks were slippery, and at last in crossing the street her foot slipped, and she would have fallen if Geoffrey had not caught her arm. She stopped, pressing her hands, which were clasped inside her muff, against her heart, and glancing this way and that, like a bird that knows not which way to fly. She was in just such a half frantic, half hopeless mood as often prompts women to acts which appear—and perhaps really are—insane. She knew that on the passing moment depended probably the failure or success, the happiness or misery, of her whole future life. She knew that everything was going topsy-turvy, absurdly and gratuitously wrong. And she felt paralyzed—wholly unable to utter a word to set everything right. A word would have done it. What prevented her? In part, perhaps, the very urgency of her desire, which tripped up its performance.

But what appeared to be the real obstacles were utterly trivial material accidents, such as being in the open street, being buffeted by the wind, being obstructed by her veil, being unable to see the expression of Bellingham's face, because it was in shadow. The more despicably small the hindrances were, and the more out of proportion with the thing they were hindering, the less could Beatrix prevail against them. So it often seems to be in this world; it is not only that the mountain in labor brings forth a mouse, but that a mouse prevents the bringing forth of a mountain.

Bellingham also was wretchedly aware that he had ruined whatever little chance he may have had; that he had spoken boldly and perfunctorily, with a frozen tongue, although his heart was on fire. He could not help it; he could have died for her on the spot, but he could not put into his voice or face as much life as would have kept a gnat in motion. It was all over.

"Will you stop this stage for me, please?" Beatrix had said as another of those gorgeous vehicles came swinging and lumbering along.

"With pleasure!" Bellingham replied, not ironically, but mechanically. The stage pulled up; he handed all he loved in the world up the step; he saw her fall into a seat, and then, with a jerk and a hoof clatter, stage and all disappeared in the gloom and snow. Bellingham remained for a few moments in the middle of the road like a policeman till, recollecting himself, he saw before him the hospitable entrance of Delmonico's, and went in there.

CHAPTER XV.

THE GREAT MARANA.

The next night was the last of the opera season, and the prima donna who had attained such unexampled popularity with the New York public was to bid them farewell in the same character in which she had made their acquaintance—the Gretchen of "Faust." She had intended to spend the day as much as possible in solitude; she wished to think—to work into her mind and arrange the throng of ideas that were crowding one another there; to review what was past, to contemplate what might be to come. But it all turned out differently. She was allowed no repose from morning till night.

There was a multitude of petty matters to attend to, many people to see; at another time much of this might have seemed to her of no little importance; but now all passed before her like a troublesome dream, and when night came she could not have given a clear account of anything that had happened. There had been an unexpected and painful scene with Madame Bemax, who had fallen into a sort of frenzy, and grasped the skirts of Beatrix's dress, and poured forth a long and revolting story about the wrongs she had endured from Hamilton Jocelyn; had ended by calling herself a wretch, and declaring that unless Beatrix pardoned her she would kill herself.

Beatrix pardoned her immediately, with only a confused understanding of what she was pardoning her for; but she could see that the woman was in great distress of mind, and that was something she could sympathize with. She had seen Ed and her father and Wallie Dinsmore; there had been a great deal of discussion and some disputing, ending apparently in a sort of conditional reconciliation; but she had been unable to keep her attention fixed on the subject long enough at a time to comprehend the bearings of it. She had also seen Inigo, who was in an agitated frame of mind, jumping up from his chair and sitting down again twenty times, asking questions which he tried to answer himself, talking about his reputation, about his fidelity to his contracts, about his financial liberality and about Mlle. Marana, whom he alternately abused and praised, and between whom and Beatrix he seemed anxious to bring about an interview. Beatrix was willing, even desirous, that the interview should take place; but nothing of the sort happened, and the inference was that Mlle. Marana must have declined.

Simply caught Beatrix in his arms and kissed her.

Altogether the evening fell ominously. But as Beatrix drove to the theatre in a covered sleigh a kind of calmness, almost happiness, came over her. These regular meetings with her audiences had grown to be an indescribable resource and support to her. They enabled her to throw aside herself and her affairs; to appeal from the narrow and interested circle of her private friends and enemies to the vast, impersonal, careless, good humored world of the public, who loved and applauded her artistic self, and knew and cared nothing about her real thoughts and existence. How would it be when this resource no longer remained to her? She put that question aside, and the porter at the stage entrance, who attached great importance to the smile of greeting he received each evening from the diva, reported on this occasion that the dear lady had seemed to be in especially good spirits. Moreover she had slipped into his hand a snuff box (he was a Hanoverian and took snuff) containing, not snuff, but a $50 bank note.

A few hours before the theatre opened Wallie Dinsmore had met Geoffrey Bellingham in that general rendezvous of American celebrities the corridor of the Fifth Avenue hotel.

"I've been looking for you for the last twenty-four hours," he said, "but this is the last place I expected to see you in."

"Maybe that's why I'm here," responded Geoffrey laconically.

"I wanted you to dine with me yesterday."

"I went to Delmonico's."

"Europe has demoralized you."

"Perhaps. I saw Hamilton Jocelyn there, and Inigo. That fellow's a scoundrel."

"Inigo?"

"Jocelyn. Do you know what he has been doing? They had both of them been drinking and it leaked out. He has been defrauding Miss Randolph of a part of her salary—about twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars."

"Then the agreement was for four thousand?"

"Inigo paid that to Jocelyn for her. Jocelyn kept back part. It seems to have been a sort of arrangement between Jocelyn and Inigo—I imagine Inigo allowed it to keep Jocelyn quiet. It was a rascally transaction, as I told them; the fellow ought to be locked up. He's not to be found today, and I expect he's cleared out."

"Very likely. That Mme. Bemax seems to have had something against him, too. But if this new Marana can only be pacified I shall be content to let the rest go. Of course you will be at the opera to-night?"

"No."

"That's absurd! You must come."

"No; why should I? You have chosen to suppose that there was something between Miss Randolph and me. I never cared to undeceive you—it would have been giving the affair too much importance. But, whatever there might have been, there is certainly nothing now, nor ever will be."

"If I was deceived then I don't see why you refuse to come to-night."

"I simply don't care to," said Bellingham abruptly.

Wallie looked at him, and decided that the wisest course would be not to press him any further. They parted, and Bellingham went to his rooms, lit a lamp, and sat himself down to read. But when the hour for the performance approached he closed the book, dressed himself, and drove to the theatre. He could not resist this impulse. When he arrived the overture was just concluding. "I shall not be able to get a place," he said to himself; "it is just as well." But when he presented himself at the ticket office the clerk, who recognized him, remarked with a smile, "Just one seat vacant, Mr. Bellingham, and that is the one you used to occupy the first of the season; will you have it?" It seemed like manifest destiny. "All right," said Bellingham. He took the ticket, entered the house, and sat down. As he did so the curtain rose.

The interval between this night and the one on which he had last been here enabled him to draw a comparison between the Gretchen of the debut and this of the farewell. There was a sentimental feeling perceptible among the audience. The American people are fond of sentiment, when managed dramatically; and this, no doubt, had its effect on the singer, and warmed and sweetened the music of her voice. But, such accidents aside, it was evident that she had improved, though precisely in what respect Bellingham would have found it difficult to say. Her manner was less exuberant, more concise and true. She had learned her power and her resources, and used them with full confidence and art.

In her singing, moreover, could be discerned not the music merely, but the human character which the poet portrayed. When she was on the stage it was difficult to realize the separate existence of anything else; wherever she stood she was the center and reason of the scene. Every gesture and movement was an enlightenment and a gratification. She was always where she belonged. Each thing she did so nicely fitted the occasion that the spectator fancied he had known beforehand that it would so be done. "This is what she was born for," said Bellingham to himself with gloomy frankness. "I should only have been in the way. I'm glad I came here, if only to have made sure of that. Such a woman should no more be monopolized and caged in domesticity than a waterfall or a strain of music. The mischief of it is that I did not recognize the fact before."

As he sat absorbed in her, and happy in spite of his unhappiness, he noticed that she carried in her girdle a bunch of marguerites. The discovery gave him a gradual start, so to say; he became only slowly aware how much it surprised and affected him. He had always provided her with a bunch of them, whenever she sang in "Faust," from the first day onward; often not without difficulty, for daisies do not grow in northern meadows all the year round. Had she, during his absence, been procuring them for herself, or was this the first occasion of her wearing them since he went away? The former was much the more likely. Actresses become accustomed to little particulars of the toilet, and are not at ease without them. Nevertheless Bellingham could not banish the notion that the latter alternative might be the true one. Did he believe it because he wished it? Why should he wish it? It was useless to torment himself with such questions.

In matters appertaining to Miss Randolph he seemed to be swayed by an influence, a fate, an attraction, almost independent of his own will and reason. What could be more unreasonable than to suppose that this bunch of marguerites was a secret signal to him to come to her, to speak with her, to be once more all that he had been to her—and more? Had not that interview in last evening's snow storm put an end to all such anticipations? But, again, was this the same woman who had vanished from him in the 'bus on that occasion? With so much difference in her surroundings was there none in her? Well, she had betrayed no consciousness of his presence to-night. They had exchanged no glance, as sometimes in the former days. After it was said and done, however, Bellingham knew that he should find himself behind the scenes, face to face with her, before the night was over.

Inigo, by what he considered a bold stroke of statesmanship, had placed one of the stage boxes at the disposal of Mlle. Marana, known as Mrs. Peters. "If she means to make a row," he argued, "treating her gentlemanly won't make it worse, and it may just tone her down a little." But, whatever the lady may have thought of the compliment, she omitted to avail herself of the box. When the curtain rose she had not arrived, and the box remained empty all the evening. This was of evil omen to the peace and friendly feeling which Gen. Inigo was so solicitous to insure. He resorted frequently to the bar, though with no good effect on his anxiety.

"Now, what the blazes can she be up to, eh?" he frequently asked himself and the elder Randolph, as the hours passed away. He seemed to think she was quite capable of coming into the house with a Nihilist bomb, by way of expressing her dissatisfaction. As for Ed he knew as little about her as any one else, though he had learned, before coming down to the theatre, that she was not in her rooms at the hotel. She had gone out, but had not left word where she was going.

Rescue—Marriage.

"Help!"

The girl who was drowning shrieked wildly. Her voice was borne across the waves to the man on the beach.

"Help! Help!"

He shook his head.

"Impossible," he answered, using his hand for a speaking trumpet. "Consider the disparity in our ages, and, besides, what would your folks say?"

Presently all was still save the murmur of the water as it rippled against the strand.

PUBLIC SPEAKING.

This is one of the heaviest strains that comes upon any man or woman. A little cold, a little hoarseness, and the work is done. The best of ability is rendered absolutely useless.

Mark Guy Pearse, the eminent English preacher, writes as follows:

"BEDFORD PLACE, RUSSELL SQUARE, LONDON, December 10, 1888.

"I think it only right that I should tell you of how much use I find ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS in my family and among those to whom I have recommended them. I find them a very breastplate against colds and coughs." MARK GUY PEARSE.

CHANGED TO JOY.

Hanging on the wall of the sample-room of John Fellmann, at 483 Wells street, is an ordinary envelope, torn and crossed with marks and bearing names and addresses in profusion. It is an American Express company's envelope, but could it talk an interesting story might be gleaned from its yellow, blue and black surface.

Along in 1888 John Fellmann awakened one morning in his narrow little room in a Wyoming city and glanced out upon the sun-bright streets with a sorrow in his heart. His finances were low and his prospects in life seemed bleak and drear. With many a sigh he donned his clothing, packed his pitiably small wardrobe in a little grip and started for the depot. The night before he had besieged his friends and acquaintances, but it was not until his last loved memento was sacrificed that he had money enough to pay his railroad fare to Chicago. So hard had been this task of raising money that he even hypothecated a ticket on the old Louisiana State Lottery.

Affairs looked doubly grim upon his arrival in Chicago, and poor young Fellmann was even more despondent than he had been in Wyoming. One morning as he idly paced the busy streets he happened by the postoffice. Not with any great expectations, but more to break the monotony of the day, he stopped in and inquired for mail. To his surprise he found a letter awaiting him. Carelessly he opened it, but as soon as he glanced at the opening lines his face lit up with eagerness. The letter was from the friend he had left the lottery ticket with and the news was that Fellmann had captured a part of a small prize.

The formalities were soon over and with a few hundred dollars of his own Fellmann opened a little saloon. Having once been saved so opportunely from want, his faith became pinned to the Louisiana State Lottery company and he regularly bought tickets, sometimes getting prizes of $20, $50, or $100, but always keeping ahead. He was frugal and ambitious and eventually opened his place on Wells street. After the close of the Louisiana State Lottery, Fellman invested in tickets in its successor, The Honduras National Lottery. At the July drawing Fellman held a one-fifth ticket of the number that won the third prize, and the American express envelope framed upon his wall is the one that brought him his prize of $2,000.

Sol Browarsky, a whole-sale and retail liquor dealer at 323 and 325 West Randolph street, was another Chicagoan to capture a goodly share of the July drawing of the Honduras National Lottery Company, formerly Louisiana State Lottery. The number 33,866, of which Mr. Browarsky held one-fifth, won the first capital prize, and Mr. Browarsky was paid $15,000 within a week. He is a well-to-do liquor dealer, and is prominent on the west side. He has frequently won smaller prizes and always devotes part of the money so easily gained to some deserving charity or needy family.—Chicago (Ill.) Dispatch, Aug. 8.

KNOWLEDGE

Brings comfort and improvement and tends to personal enjoyment when rightly used. The many, who live better than others and enjoy life more, without expenditure, by more promptly adapting the world's best products to the needs of physical being, will attest the value to health of the pure liquid laxative principles embraced in the remedy, Syrup of Figs.

Its excellence is due to its presenting in the form most acceptable and pleasant to the taste, the refreshing and truly beneficial properties of a perfect laxative; effectually cleansing the system, dispelling colds, headaches and fevers and permanently curing constipation. It has given satisfaction to millions and met with the approval of the medical profession, because it acts on the Kidneys, Liver and Bowels without weakening them and it is perfectly free from every objectionable substance.

Syrup of Figs is for sale by all druggists in 50c and $1 bottles, but it is manufactured by the California Fig Syrup Co. only, whose name is printed on every package, also the name, Syrup of Figs, and being well informed, you will not accept any substitute if offered.

The Land of Promise is the mighty West, the land that "tickled with a hoe laughs a harvest;" the El Dorado of the miner; the goal of the agricultural emigrant. While it teems with all the elements of wealth and prosperity, some of the fairest and most fruitful portions of it bear a harvest of malaria reaped in its fullness by those unprotected by a medicinal safeguard. No one seeking or dwelling in a malarial locality is safe from the scourge without Hostetter's Stomach Bitters. Emigrants, bear this in mind. Commercial travelers sojourning in malarious regions should carry a bottle of the Bitters in the traditional gripsack. Against the effects of exposure, mental or bodily overwork, damp and unwholesome food or water, it is an infallible defense. Constipation, rheumatism, billiousness, dyspepsia, nervousness and loss of strength are all remedied by this genial restorative.

The leaders, it seems, are at loggerheads now,
And some are delighted, some are sore;
And whisky and sugar are making the row,

THE GOBI DESERT.

The American Bicyclers Bravely Overcome Obstacles.

BATTLING WITH THE MOSQUITOES.

The Difficulty in Carrying Enough Money to Pay Their Way.—Silver Hidden in Pneumatic Tires.

The most difficult portion of the remarkable bicycle journey across Asia made by Messrs. Allen and Sachtleben, was the crossing of the Desert of Gobi. They describe this part of their tour in the September number of "The Century." At Kuldja they were detained, awaiting the arrival of the necessary passports and supplies. They utilized the time in studying the Chinese languages, and in giving the final touches to their outfit.

"Our work of preparation was principally a process of elimination. We now had to prepare for a forced march in case of necessity. Handle-bars and seat posts were shortened to save weight, and even the leather baggage-carriers, fitting in the frames of the machines, which we ourselves had patented before leaving England, were replaced by a couple of sleeping bags made for us out of woolen shawls and Chinese oiled canvas. The cutting off of buttons and extra parts of our clothing, as well as the shaving of our heads and faces, was also included by our friends in the list of curtailments. For the same reason one of our cameras, which we always carried on our backs, and refilled at night under the bed-colthes, we sold to a Chinese photographer at Suidun, to make room for an extra provision-bag.

"And now the money problem was the most perplexing of all. 'This alone,' said the Russian consul, 'if nothing else, will defeat your plans.' Those western bankers, who advertise to furnish 'letters of credit to any part of the world,' are, to say the least, rather sweeping in their assertions. At any rate, our own London letter was of no use beyond the Bosporus, except with the Persian imperial banks run by an English syndicate. At the American Bible House at Constantinople, we were allowed, as a personal favor, to buy drafts on the various missionaries along the route through Asiatic Turkey. But in Central Asia we found that the Russian bankers and merchants would not handle English paper, and we were therefore compelled to send our letter of credit by mail to Moscow. Thither we had recently sent it on leaving Tashkend, with instructions to remit in currency to Irkutsk, Siberia. We now had to telegraph to that point to reforward over the Kiakhta post-route to Peking. With the cash on hand, and the proceeds of the camera, sold for more than half its weight in silver, four and one-third pounds, we thought we had sufficient money to carry us, or, rather, as much as we could carry, to that point; for the weight of the Chinese money necessary for a journey of over 3000 miles was, as the Russian consul thought, one of the greatest of our almost insurmountable obstacles.

"There being no banks or exchanges in the interior, we were obliged to purchase at Kuidja all the silver we would need for the entire journey of over 3000 miles. 'How much would it take,' was the question that our past experience in Asiatic travel now aided us to answer. That our calculations were close is proved by the fact that we reached Pekin with silver in our pockets to the value of half a dollar. Our money now constituted the principal part of our luggage, which with camera and film, weighed just twenty-five pounds apiece. Most of the silver was chopped up into small bits, and placed in the hollow tubing of the machines to conceal it from Chinese inquisitiveness, if not something worse. We are glad to say, however, that no attempt at robbery was ever discovered, although efforts at extortion were frequent, and sometimes, as will appear, of a serious nature."

When the young men finally entered the desert, their real trials began. "One stretch of fifteen miles, which it took us six hours to cover, was as formidable as any part of the Turkoman desert along the Transcaspian Railway. At an altitude of only 600 feet above the sea, according to our aneroid barometer, and beneath the rays of a July sun, against which even our felt caps were not much protection, we were half-dragging, half-pushing our wheels through a foot of sand, and slapping at the mosquitoes swarming upon our necks and faces. These pests, which throughout this low country are the largest and most numerous we have ever met, are bred in the intermediate swamps, which exist only through the negligence of the neighboring villagers. At night smoldering fires, which half-suffocate the human inmates, are built before the doors and windows to keep out the intruding insects. All travelers wear gloves, and a huge hood covering the head and face up to the eyes, and in their hands carry a horse-tail switch to lash back and forth over their shoulders. Being without such protection, we suffered both day and night.

"The mountain freshets all along the road to Urumtsi were more frequent and dangerous than any we have yet encountered. Toward evening the melting snows, and the condensing currents from the plain heated during the day, fill and overflow the channels that in the morning are almost dry. One stream, with its ten branches, swept the stones and boulders over a shifting channel one mile in width. It was when wading through such streams as this where every effort was required to balance ourselevs and our luggage, that the mosquitos would make up for lost time with impunity.

"With constant wading and tramping, our Russian shoes and stockings, one of which was almost torn off by the sly grab of a Chinese spaniel, were no longer fit for use. In their place we were obliged now to purchase the short, white cloth, Chinese socks and string sandals, which for mere cycling purposes and wading streams proved an excellent substitute, being light and soft on the feet and very quickly dried. The calves of our legs, however, being left bare, we were obliged, for state occasions at least, to retain and utilize the upper portion of our old stockings. It was owing to this scantiness of wardrobe that we were obliged when taking a bath by the roadside streams to make a quick wash of our linen, and put it on wet to dry, or allow it to flutter from the handle bars as we rode along. It was astonishing even to ourselves how little a man required when once beyond the pale of western conventionalities.

"From Manas to Urumtsi we began to strike more tillage and fertility. Maize, wheat, and rice were growing, but rather low and thin. The last is by no means the staple food of China, as is commonly supposed, except in the southern portion. In the northern, and especially the outlying, provinces it is considered more a luxury for the wealthy. Millet and coarse flour, from which the mien or dough-strings are made, is the foundation, at least, for more than half the subsistence of the common classes. Nor is there much truth, we think, in the assertion that Chinamen eat rats, although we sometimes regreted that they did not. After a month or more without meat a dish of rats would have been relished, had we been able to get it. On the other hand, we have learned that there is a society of Chinamen who are vegetarians from choice, and still another that will eat the meat of no animal, such as the ass, horse, dog, etc., which can serve man in a better way."

EDUCATION IN CHINA.

In no country is education more highly esteemed than in China. The child of the working man as a rule cannot hope to get more than a mere smattering. But scattered through the country are numberless families, the members of which for generation after generation are always students, and from whom as a rule the officials come. They have no knowledge of any business or any trade. They correspond very closely to what are, or used to be, called gentlemen in England, and preserve their position with great tenacity, even when hard pressed by poverty.

Rich parvenues, as a matter of course, engage tutors for their children; and in the humblest ranks of life occasionally parents will stint themselves to give an opportunity to some son who has shown marked intelligence at the village school. But neither of these classes compete on an equality with those to whom learning is a hereditary profession. The cultivation and intellectual discipline prevailing in such families give their members a marked advantage over those who get no help of the kind at home, and who must, therefore, depend entirely on what they learn from their paid teachers.

The orthodox scheme of education is entirely concerned with the ancient literature of China. The original works which occupy the student's attention were for the most part written before the literature of either Greece or Rome had reached its prime. But there are commentators belonging to later periods who must also be perused with diligence. China has not seen an influx of new races, such as have overrun Europe since the days of our classical authors; but still, from mere lapse of time, the language of the country has greatly changed, and the child beginning his studies cannot without explanation understand a single sentence, even if he has learned to read the words of the lesson which he has before him. The student makes himself acquainted as thoroughly as possible with these classical works. The more he can quote of them the better, but he must master the matter contained in them as well.

He must get to know the different readings and different interpretations of disputed passages, and, finally, he practices himself in prose and verse composition. In prose he carefully preserves the ancient phraseology, never admitting modern words, though there are certain technicalities of style which will prevent his productions from being an exact imitation of the ancient literature. His verses must be in close imitation of the old-time poets. They must follow elaborate rules as to rhythm, and the words must rhyme according to the classical sounds, which are very different from those of to-day. —Nineteenth Century.

An interesting method for the manufacture of levulose with beet molasses has met with some success (?) The saccharose is first transformed into dextrose and levulose. If lime be added, there will be formed a precipitate of levulosate of lime, almost pure, while the coloring and other substances remain in the solution. By a careful filtration and carbonatation it is possible to obtain pure elvulose. About 100 pounds molasses are dissolved in six pounds water, and the amount of acid used depends upon the alkalinity of the residuum being treated.

The total sugar production was less during last than in previous campaign; the causes are numerous. The area devoted to beets was about 500,000 acres. When it is considered that $4,000,000 are paid in wages at factories and several millions for farm labor, the beet sugar industry of the country has obtained a position upon which much of the general prosperity of the state depends.

ON A COMET'S TAIL.

Man Originally Came From Mars by Comet Express.

AT LEAST PROF. WIGGINS SAYS SO.

The Serpent That Beguiled Eve a Fiery Comet—An Interesting Argument by the Canadian Oracle.

Professor Wiggins has a theory that man originally came from Mars on the tail of a comet, says a correspondent of the St. Louis "Republic."

There is, in addition, the professor says, overwhelming evidence that Eve found her way here in the same manner.

"I have no time now to enter into a detailed discussion on this point," said Professor Wiggins, "but I believe the serpent that beguiled Eve and caused all our woes was a comet."

The professor was found in his little observatory at Britannia, his summer home, by Lake des Chenes.

"You know," he said, "the greatest power in nature is electricity, and it is a law that like electricities repel and unlike attract. In other words, if two bodies are highly charged they repel each other, but if one is charged and the other is not, or is slightly so, they attract each other. If you were to charge two common balls to a high degree of tension and place them apart in pure space, they could never fall together, but if one were positive and the other negative, they would rush together and become one.

"The earth as a planet and all the other heavenly bodies are positively and enormously electrified, which prevents their coming into collision with one another. Melpomente, Nissa and several other asteroids cross and recross the orbit of Mars, but never fall upon that planet. Professor Von Nissel investigated the path of the great meteor seen at the same moment in Austria and Italy July 7, 1892, and found it was directed upward and away from the earth, having been shot off into space by the electric force of our globe.

"The sun's atmosphere is the most powerful electric force in the solar system. When a comet is near him and has become charged, it is driven away into space at the rate of millions of miles an hour, and is sometimes absent a century; but when it has parted with its electric force sufficiently to become negative to the sun, it is attracted back again by the law of unlike electricities. A highly electrified comet will gather up negative meteric stones near its path and force them after it through space.

"Here is a black thundercloud coming down from the mountains. Its electric power is very great, and it is almost perfectly isolated by the dry, nonconducting air between it and the earth. If it meets with no conductor stretched across its path, it will travel hundreds of miles and water the fields beneath it. Push a wire from the earth upward into the cloud, and the latter will fall to the earth like a lump of lead, or stretch wires across its path, and it will dissipate and disappear in a few minutes.

"This is why telegraph and telephone wires produce drought. But suppose the cloud to retain its electric power and to pass over shallow marshes and low grounds. What will happen? Its electric force will attract negative small bodies like fishes, frogs, small shells and worms, and force them up into the cloud, where they will remain till the cloud loses its electric power, when they will be distributed over the fields below. This is why these little animals are found on pavements and in water tanks after a shower, and which accounts for the presence of trout and all sorts of fishes in lakes and brooks hundreds of miles from the sea.

"A few months ago there was a shower near this city of minute shells, which are only found in Florida, and on March 10, 1890, during a thunderstorm near Dijon, the grass was covered with black and yellow worms, from one to three inches long, that had been brought, savants supposed, from some tropical clime. At all events they were foreign to Europe. Now, if a thunderstorm could travel from Mars to the earth, might it not carry similar animals from that planet to ours?"

"Yes, but thunder clouds do not travel from Mars to the Earth."

"Quite true; but there are other bodies that do travel between Mars and the earth that are a million times more highly charged electrically than a thunder cloud—comets."

"How do you know they are highly charged?"

"I know it because Biela's comet was seen to burst into two parts in 1847, and since that period the two hemispheres have gradually receded from each other, and they are now entered in the catalogue as two distinct comets. Ephorus, a Greek writer before the Christian era, mentions a similar phenomenon. This recession of the parts could only have been due to their being both highly charged with like electricities. Then, when comets cross the earth's orbit near the earth, shoals of meteors fall through our atmosphere, showing they have followed the comet through space by electric attraction. A body at one time far away from the sun, and again near him, must undergo enormous expansion and contraction, which would generate powerful electric action.

"In 1872 and 1886, when a comet was crossing our orbit, millions of meteors fell to the earth. Some of them were examined by Dr. Hahn, the eminent German geologist, who found they contained a series of organic remains, as crinoids, sponges and corals—in all fifty species. These must have come from another world possessing an atmosphere and producing animal life, for we have nothing like them on the earth.

"Our frog is certainly a land animal brought from another planet, when it fell into the water, and was reproduced by an aquatic animal, for before it had lungs it is in the form of a fish with gills. If an enormous comet were to pass close to Mars, there is nothing more certain than it would carry away the land animals on the hemisphere next to that, and would probably drop them to the earth, as it would meteoric stones, if one chanced to be near its orbit at the moment of its passage, and in this same way we might be carried off to Mars.

"This could not happen between the earth and any other planet, for Mars is the only one which revolves in the same plane or level as the earth, so that a comet passing Jupiter or any other planet toward the sun would not pass near us. There is overwhelming evidence, but I have no time to state it, though very interesting, that the serpent that beguiled Eve and caused all our woe, was a comet."

"A great many people are killed every year by lightning. Could not this be prevented?"

"Whenever a thunder storm is approaching, everybody in my house is requested to put on rubbers, and to touch no object till the electric cloud is passed. If people everywhere would do this, there would never be any deaths from lightning.

"You seem to be a firm believer in the Bible?"

"I am generally regarded as a freethinker, which I prefer to be rather than a slave thinker. I believe the Bible to be the most truth-telling book that was ever written.

"For forms and creeds let graceless zealots fight,
His can't be wrong whose life is in the right."

quoted Professor Wiggins, to end the interview.

HERE IS A WONDERFUL EGG.

A large specimen of the egg of the fabled roc of the "Arabian Nights," or Aepyornis, as the extinct gigantic bird of Madagascar is called, has been secured by Mr. J. Proctor of Tamatave and Prince's Square, W., who has brought the curiosity to London.

It was discovered by some natives about twenty miles to the southward of St. Augustine's Bay, on the southwestern coast of Madagascar. It was floating on the calm sea, within twenty yards of the beach, and is supposed to have been washed away with the foreshore, which consists of sandhills, after a hurricane in the early part of the year.

The childlike longshoreman of the antipodes, opining that the egg had a value, showed the unusual piece of flotsam about with a view to sale, and it thus came into the hands of Mr. Proctor. The egg, which is white-brown in color and unbroken, is a fine specimen, 33½ inches by 28 inches, and an even higher value is placed upon it than upon the egg of the great auk, which lived within the memory of man.

The Brobdignagian proportions of the egg are better demontrated by comparison with the eggs of the ostrich and crocodile. An ostrich's egg is about 17 inches by 15 inches, and the contents of six such are only equal to one egg of the Aepyornis. The measurements of the egg of the crocodile are normally 9 inches by 6½ inches. It would require the contents of sixteen and one-half emu's eggs to equal the contents of this great egg, or 148 eggs of the homely fowl, or 30,000 of the humming bird. The last egg of the kind disposed of in London sold for £100, though cracked.

WOMAN'S AFFAIRS.

Girls in Scotland can make valid wills at twelve years of age.

Mrs. Julia Ward Howe has celebrated her 75th anniversary. She is at this ripe age in the full possession of her faculties, and is rejoicing in a beautiful and vigorous old age.

In the University of Wisconsin, Mrs. Helen Campbell, who has been doing post-graduate work with Dr. Richard T. Ely, Dean of the School of Economics, was appointed associate professor, to lecture on "Social Economics and Women," and "Household Science."

The old joke about the inability of a woman to drive a nail has passed into silent and sympathetic dust. The other day a farmer's wife, three miles west of town, successfully shingled the entire one side of her dwelling-house while her husband was in town looking up a carpenter.

Miss Maria Gonzales Hermosillo has been appointed by President Diaz, of Mexico, postmaster at Teocaltiche, in the state of Jalisco. Miss Hermosillo is the first woman appointed to office in Mexico, and the departure has created a sensation among the women of that Republic.

Miss Alice King, the blind novelist, who died recently in England, must have been a woman of extraordinary perseverance. She was born with defective vision, and became totally blind at the age of seven. Nevertheless her education went on under her mother's guidance, and she acquired by ear seven languages. She learned to use a typewriter, with which she wrote her manuscripts, which were afterward read to her by her sister. Most of the proceeds of her literary work were devoted to benevolences.

UNDER THE SEA.

Grouping Around on the Floor of the Ocean.

ADVENTURES OF CAPTAIN PHIL.

A Desperate Dash for Life—Fight With an Electrical Eel—The Curiosity of the Shark Family.

"Captain Phil" Dacey and "Old Tom" Allen are as congenial and comfortable a pair of housemates as you could find in a week's walk. They are both divers by profession, or rather they were, for they have now retired from active service and settled down to the quiet enjoyment of their hard-earned savings.

When I called at their home a few days ago Old Tom was out, but I received a most cordial welcome from Captain Phil, whom I found seated in a cozy armchair, smoking his pipe.

"Adventures!" said Captain Phil, "Well, yes, I have had my share of 'em, I reckon. It would be a strange thing if I hadn't met with some odd and startling experiences in thirty-five years of groping around on the ragged old floor of the ocean.

"I remember a nasty half-hour I once had of it while I was working on a wreck in the West Indies. She was a large steamer that had struck on a reef and then slipped off into deep water, taking down the mails and a valuable cargo with her, though luckily all the passengers and crew were saved. Well, there were some papers as were particularly wanted, and I was in the chart-room under the bridge looking for them, when suddenly as I turned I saw the wicked snout of a big shark close to me. Nice fix for any one with delicate sort of nerves to be in, wasn't it, pinned in a corner of a little square room, and a big brute between you and the door. I went creepy all over, but I kept still and so did he. I got my knife, which we carry screwed in our belt, loose. I'd make a fight for it if the gentleman began any little game. So there we were, each staring at the other, and each waiting for the other to make a move.

"At last I stared him out of countenance, I suppose. Leastaways he slews himself round and I see him drift toward the far side, so I begin to sidle for the door. As soon as I begin to move he gets uneasy, maybe my tube touched him or the air bubbles frightened him, anyhow he makes a rush for the door and I respectfully makes way for the flourishes of his tail; but when he was off I was off up, too, pretty lively.

"They say, sir, all animals have a fear of man, but sharks don't seem to recognize a man in a diver's costume. They often come poking around and smelling at us like so many great dogs. The greatest danger about the critters is that they might get too curious about the air tube and sample it with their teeth, and that, you see, sir, would be a settler for the man, sure enough. I caught one opening his jaws for this purpose one time, and gave him a clip on the nose with my crowbar. He went off like a shot and never bothered me again.

"Another time an immense brute came alongside where I was working and I stops and steps back quietly to let him pass. But he didn't. He came nearer. I wasn't particularly anxious for his company, so I kept getting out of his way. But the shark kept on, and soon I found I couldn't go a step farther, for he had me jammed up against a rock. I was relieved to see that the critter didn't open his jaws, however, but contented himself with rubbing up against me. I had a prong-shaped iron in my hand, and I put this between my body and his, for the sensation was just about as pleasant as that of having a cow rubbing herself against you. But these sharp iron points seemed to be just what he wanted. He took it like a great pig, bending his body and turning over on his side, so as to present a fresh place to the scratcher. Would you believe it, sir, I was kept there a full half-hour scratching that mangy shark, and I suppose the operation must have done him good, for at last he moved away and I didn't see him till the next day, when he returned for another application. That was the only time I held the job of scratcher to a shark.

"I think, sir, the greatest shock I ever got from a shark was one time when I was blowing up a reef of rocks so as to enlarge a little harbor on the coast. It was my work to make a hole to put in a charge of dynamite. When I went down every morning I would go over to a certain ledge which was always a good resting place for lobsters. Morning after morning I used to find two or three of these 'crusty-shins,' as a well-eddicated friend of mine calls them, and send 'em up aloft in a basket. Well, one day I walked straight up to this ledge as usual, and ran my hand carefully along its lower side. I was surprised to find my hand scraping along what I took to be a rock, but I was surprised still more when I discovered that my precious paw was groping within six inches of the mouth of a big shark, which had retired to rest in this cavity. The brute must have been as much alarmed as I was, for it made one spring from its resting place and disappeared in the dark wall of ocean. You can just bet I let lobsters alone after that and attended strictly to business.

"But sharks and such critters are not the only danger. You see, sir, when we move about a wreck the air tube and the line follow us, and we have to be mighty careful always to come back the same way we go; because we see if we pass anything on the way or go around a mast or under a companion ladder, and come back t'other side of it, the tube and line kink around it and bring you up all standing, and you have to go back and follow your tube the way you come. Sometimes, if you have been down a goodish while, and moving about a lot, you get mixed and forget your bearings and are in a pretty fix. Why, once I remember I was over an hour following my tube like a puzzle before I could find my way up ont of the engine-room in which I was working.

"If it happen that a man can't noways free himself, and it's all touch-and-go with him, if he's only got a clear way above him, he has one last chance, and a desperate one it is. He goes to work and knocks off his back and chest weights, shuts the escape vlave which lets out the used-up air in his helmet, gets himself as full of air as ever he can, then cuts the tube above him, when, if he has luck, he tears clear and shoots up through the water. Of course it's a risky chance, and to prevent too quick a rush up, you have to fasten your waist line to somewhere below, and hold on to it going up.

"I remember my poor comrade, Jim Rollins. Jim got fouled somehow, and decided upon cutting his tube, so he signals for more air, and away the pumps go, till suddenly there is a rush of bubbles through the water, and next moment we feel a blow on the bottom of our boat. 'Heavens, that's Jim!' I cried; and so it was. We got hold of him as quick as lightning and had him aboard and his helmet off in no time; but the poor chap was dead, sir—dead as a herring. An hour or two afterward a great blue line showed all around his chest and shoulders, just where the helmet sits. The doctor said he must have hit our keel full kilt with his head, and the blow drove the helmet with such force as to crush all the lungs and things in his chest. He forgot to fix his waist line, poor chap, and you see he couldn't stop his shooting up.

"Ay, sir, we see a good many startling sights in our business. Down Cape Cod way a few years back a vessel ran on a rock and went down in eight fathoms of water. Everybody was saved except the captain and his wife. They were in the cabin at the time, and as the vessel gave a lurch and sunk, one of the sailors said he saw their pale faces staring out from the battened-down skylight. The captain's father wanted the bodies badly and he hired me to go down. When I stood on top of the cabin, there sure enough were the two white faces glued to the glass just as the sailor had said. It didn't take me long to knock off the skylight, when up shoots the two corpses like bladders through the water, where the hands aloft got hold of them and lifted them into the boat. I tell you, sir, it was a grewsome sight.

"Well, sir, I could tell you yarns of this sort by the hour, but here comes Old Tom, I guess he can give you a few odd experiences. Between you and me, though, you mustn't believe more than half he says. He's a great romancer, Tom is."—Chicago Inter-Ocean.

AIDS TO LONGEVITY.

The philosopher may balance the advantages and disadvantages of long life, and may decide in favor of a short time of human existence. But it is clearly a prime part of the business of the physician to make life as long as possible, and as comfortable. There are two sorts of pressure which tend to shorten life—blood pressure within and atmospheric pressure without. This latter is a specially important factor in a humid climate like our own. In advancing age the circulation of the blood and lymph tends to become slow, and the enfeebled heart finds its embarrassments increased by this condition. Especially do the more vascular organs, such as the lnugs, the liver and the kidneys, put skids on the wheels of the blood circulation. Plainly, then, an important condition of cardiac easement, and therefore of life prolongation, is the maintenance of an uncongested state of lung, liver and kidney. Thus are internal pressures relieved, and thus is cardiac energy conserved. Of almost equal importance, at any rate in Great Britain, is the question of atmospheric pressure and moisture to aged persons. Situations which are at once low-lying and damp give, of course, a maximum of atmospheric pressure. Such pressure weighs down at a single stroke body, mind and life. The difference to aged persons between living at the sea level and living 500 feet above it, between living in a moist atmosphere and living in a dry one, is sometimes quite incalculable. Not seldom life may be lengthened by five or even ten years by living in an atmosphere which is both light and dry. These physiological considerations are commended to the aged and to the physician of the aged. While physiological explorers are busy in the laboratory, clinicians must not imagine that new discoveries can be applied in practice without constant and intelligent effort on their part. Knowledge, like freedom, "filters slowly down," but there is no objection to a little artificial acceleration of the pace.—Hospital.

When Sidney Smith was rector of a parish in Yorkshire, he found his vestry were discussing the propriety or otherwise of paving a certain approach to the church with wooden blocks. Having decided to undertake it, the question arose as to how. "Gentlemen," said the witty rector, "I think if you will all put your heads together, as the saying is, the thing can be accomplished without much difficulty."

A sailor named Muller sat upon the top of the Sims-Edison torpedo and guided it through the water which it was being driven at the rate of eighteen miles an hour. He returned safely to the wharf at New York and is quite popular for the feat was dangerous, the torpedo having a tendency to dive at unexpected times.

BRET HARTE.

Heroes of the Writer on Western Life.

JACK HAMLIN A DISTINCT TYPE.

Honesty a Necessity With the Gambler in Those Early Days.—Their Coolness Phenomenal.

Yes, I have had a delightful chat with Bret Harte, a chat full of descriptive and interesting matter, the gist of which I will try to convey to you in his own illustrative words.

I wanted to know something concerning the individuality of some of Bret Harte's favorite heroes, so on the occasion of our meeting I inquired into the arriere vie of such a man, for instance, as Jack Hamlin or John Oakhurst.

Bret Harte replied thus: "The gambler twenty years ago in California was really the most honest of all operators. When he acted otherwise he was looked down upon by the fraternity of his profession and known as the "short-card sharp." His perfect equanimity, coolness and capacity for winning and losing without emotional murmurs, and his uniform correctness of demeanor, gave him the distinct appearance of a well-bred gentleman, as a matter of fact, by a very singular coincidence, the only men who wore tall hats in those days were clergymen and gamblers."

"Jack Hamlin's was a distinctive type?" I inquired.

"Certainly; of course there were variations, but you might have found Jack walking about under a dozen aliases. He, however, was more sentimental than the rest of his fraternity, through his weakness for music. At one time, after one of the great fires at Marysville, he officiated at the organ that had been rebuilt by contributions gratuitously subscribed by gamblers. Churches drew substantial people, and substantial people gambled; consequently the presence of a church in a superior town was a surety in favor of custom among the gambling element. Do you know how the first Sanitary Commission was organized? Well, it was started in a drinking saloon by two or three gamblers. Just after the news of one of the Northern reverses, the sympathy of the crowd was greatly moved by the intelligence that several of its acquaintances were suffering among the wounded. "I am mighty sorry for this," said one of the profession. 'How much are you sorry?' promptly asked his friend. 'Well, I'm sorry $200.' 'And I'm sorry $300,' said another. 'And I'm sorry $400,' said a fourth. And so the rise was continued, until, in about ten minutes, $15,000 was subscribed by the gamblers and their friends. Nobody thought of withdrawing from a self-elected rivalry, and the entire amount was transmitted by wire to the organization afterward known as the Sanitary Commission."

"Tell me more about California," I urged. "Were the women scarce during the first period of emigration?"

"Yes, indeed, and what struck me forcibly was that the men were all so remarkably young. A casual old man once appeared with flowing white locks and caused quite a sensation; he was, in fact, regarded as a curiosity. The absence of women closened friendship between men, and the devotion which existed between miners and their partners was quite touching. The advent of women in the colony was, of course, hailed with enthusiasm, and once a girl's crinoline, being transported by express post, went astray by accident, whereupon it was seized and the diggers made a circle and danced around it in high glee."

"Don't the foreigners find it hard to render your slang?"

"I should fancy they did, but I am rather surprised to find that even in English they sometimes mistake my meaning. An ingenious footnote was once appended to one of my character sketches, in which a gambler was stated to have "handed in his checks." The lucid explanation to this was that he had handed in his check shirts and had returned to the white shirt of civilization."

"When may we expect your next work?" I asked presently.

"Soon, I trust, for I am writing a one-volume novel at present, but I have orders for stories, etc., for two years ahead."

"What do you find the easiest writing?"

"A three-volume novel is not nearly such hard work as a short story—in fact, I have always found the shortest work decidedly the hardest.—London Sketch.

A GAUSE OF WOE.

Parson Whangdoodle Baxter, of the Austin Blue Light Tabernacle, met Jim Webster, who was complaining of hard times, etc.

"Whisky am de cause ob all yore troubles an' sorrers," replied Jim's spiritual adviser. "Dat's so Parson. I feel mighty troubled when I hasn't got any ob hit."

Sweden, with a population of 4,350,000, has but 289 drug stores, or one to each 15,000 inhabitants. In the city of Boston alone there are about 400, or at least a hundred more than in all of Sweden. No patent medicines are allowed to be imported into Sweden nor manufactured there.

The New York Constitutional Convention apparently intends to stick to the amendment providing for holding municipal elections separate from those for State and national officers, and depreeing an equal representation of both carties on election boards.

Governor.

Lieutenant-Governor.

Secretary of State.

Controller.

Tresurer.

Attorney-General.

Surveyor-General.

Clerk of the Supreme court.

Superintendent of Public Instruction.

Superintendent of State Printing.

Also, seven Representatives to the Congress of the United States; being one Representative from each Congressional District.

Also, three Railroad Commissioners: be one Railroad Commissioner from each Railroad District.

Also, four Members of the State Board of Equalization: being one member from each State Board of Equalization District.

Also, two Associate Justices of the Supreme Court, full term.

Also, one Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, for the unexpired term ending January, 1896.

Also, four Judges of the Superior Court in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

Also, two Judges of the Superior Court in and for the following counties: Alameda, Los Angeles and Fresno.

Also, one Judge of the Superior Court in and for each of the following counties: Riverside, Kings, Madera and San Bernardino.

Also, one Judge of the Superior Court in and for the county of Amador, for the unexpired term ending January, 1897; vice John F. Davis, appointed.

Also, one Judge of the Superior Court in and for the county of Santa Cruz, for the unexpired term ending January, 1897; vice James H. Logan, appointed.

Also, one State Senator from each of the following Senatorial Districts: Second, Fourth, Sixth, Eighth, Tenth, Twelfth, Fourteenth, Sixteenth, Eighteenth, Twentieth, Twenty-second, Twenty-fourth, Twenty-sixth, Twenty-eighth, Thirtieth, Thirty-second, Thirty-fourth, Thirty-sixth, Thirty-eighth and Fortieth.

Also, one Member of the Assembly from each Assembly District.

Also at said election, Amendments to the Constitution of the State, submitted by the Legislature at its last regular session, numbered as hereinafter specified, will be voted upon by the electors of said State, namely:

AMENDMENT NUMBER ONE—Assembly Constitutional Amendment No. 8—

A resolution to propose to the people of the State of California an amendment to the Constitution of the State, amending section one of article two thereof, relative to the right of suffrage.

AMENDMENT NUMBER Two (Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 14)—

A resolution proposing to the people of the State of California an amendment to section three of article eleven of the Constitution of the State of California, relating to the formation of new counties.

AMENDMENT NUMBER THREE—Assembly Constitutional Amendment No. 7—

A resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the State of California, by adding a new section to article thirteen of said Constitution, to be numbered section twelve and three-fourths, (12¾), relating to revenue and taxation.

AMENDMENT NUMBER FOUR—Assembly Constitutional Amendment No. 12—

A resolution proposing to the people of the State of California an amendment to section seventeen, article one, of the Constitution of the State of California, relating to who may acquire property in this State.

AMENDMENT NUMBER FIVE—Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 17—

A resolution proposing to the people of the State of California an amendment to section seven, article eleven, of the Constitution of the State of California, relating to consolidation of city and county governments.

PROCLAMATION.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
SACRAMENTO, Aug. 4, 1894.

WHEREAS, the Legislature of the State of California, at its thirtieth session, beginning on the second day of January, A. D. 1893, two-thirds of all the members elected to each of the houses of said Legislature voting in favor thereof, proposed the following described amendments to the constitution of the State of California, to wit:

AMENDMENT NUMBER ONE.

ASSEMBLY CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT No. 8.

A resolution to propose to the people of the State of California an amendment to the Constitution of the State, amending section one of article two thereof, relative to the right of suffrage.

Section 1. Every native male citizen of the United States, every male person who shall have acquired the rights of citizenship under or by virtue of the treaty of Queretaro, and every male naturalized citizen thereof who shall have become such ninety days prior to any election, of the age of twenty-one years, who shall have been resident of the state one year next preceding the election, and of the county in which he claims his vote ninety days, and in the election precinct thirty days, shall be entitled to vote at all elections which are now or may hereafter be authorized by law; provided, no native of China, no idiot, no insane person, no person convicted of any infamous crime, no person hereafter convicted of the embezzlement or misappropriation of public money, and no person who shall not be able to read the Constitution in the English language and write his name, shall ever exercise the privileges of an elector in this State; provided, that the provisions of this amendment relative to an educational qualification shall not apply to any person prevented by a physical disability from complying with its requisitions, nor to any person who now has the right to vote, nor to any person who shall be sixty years of age and upwards at the time this amendment shall take effect.

AMENDMENT NUMBER TWO.

SENATE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT No. 14.

A resolution proposing to the people of the State of California an amendment to section three of article eleven of the Constitution of the State of California, relating to the formation of new counties.

Section 3. The Legislature, by general and uniform laws, may provide for the formation of new counties; provided, however, that no new county shall be established which shall reduce any county to a population of less than eight thousand; nor shall a new county be formed containing a less population than five thousand; nor shall any line thereof pass within five miles of the county seat of any county proposed to be divided. Every county which shall be enlarged or created from territory taken from any other county or counties, shall be liable for a just proportion of the existing debts and liabilities of the county or counties from which such territory shall be taken.

AMENDMENT NUMBER THREE.

ASSEMBLY CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT No. 7.

A resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the State of California, by adding a new section to article thirteen of the said Constitution, to be numbered section twelve and three-fourth (12¾), relating to revenue and taxation.

Section 12¾. Fruit and nut bearing trees under the age of four years from the time of planting in orchard form, and grapevines under the age of three years from the time of planting in vineyard form, shall be exempt from taxation, and nothing in this article shall be construed as subjecting such trees and grapevines to taxation.

AMENDMENT NUMBER FOUR.

ASSEMBLY CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT No. 12.

A resolution proposing to the people of the State of California an amendment to section seventeen, article one, of the Constitution of the State of California.

Section 17. Foreigners of the white race, or of African descent, eligible to become citizens of the United States under the naturalization laws thereof, while bona fide residents of this States, shall have the same rights in respect to the acquisition, possession, enjoyment, transmission, and inheritance of all property, other than real estate, as native born citizens; provided, that such aliens owning real estate at the time of the adoption of this amendment may remain such owners; and provided further, that the Legislature may, by statute, provide for the disposition of real estate which shall hereafter be acquired by such aliens by descent or devise.

AMENDMENT NUMBER FIVE.

SENATE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT No. 17.

A resolution proposing to the people of the State of California an amendment to section seven, article eleven, of the Constitution of the State of California.

Section 7. City and county governments may be merged and consolidated into one municipal government, with one set of officers, and may be incorporated under general laws providing for the incorporation and organization of corporations for municipal purposes. The provisions of this Constitution applicable to cities, and also those applicable to counties, so far as not inconsistent or prohibited to cities, shall be applicable to such consolidated government.

AMENDMENT NUMBER SIX.

SENATE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT No. 7.

A resolution to propose to the people of the State of California an amendment to the Constitution of the State, amending section nine of article thirteen thereof, relative to the election of a State Board of Equalization.

Section 9. A State Board of Equalization, consisting of one member from each congressional district in this State, shall be elected by the qualified electors of their respective districts, at the first general election to be held after the adoption of this amendment, and at each general election every four years, whose term of office shall be for four years, whose duty it shall be to equalize the valuation of the taxable property in the several counties of the State for the purposes of taxation. The Controller of State shall be ex officio a member of the Board. The Boards of Supervisors of the several counties of the State shall constitute Boards of Equalization for their respective counties whose duty it shall be to equalize the valuation of the taxable property in the county for the purpose of taxation; provided, such State and County Boards of Equalization are hereby authorized and empowered, under such rules of notice as the County Boards may prescribe as to the county assessments, and under such rules of notice as the State Board may prescribe as to the action of the State Board, to increase or lower the entire assessment roll, or any assessment contained therein, so as to equalize the assessment of the property contained in said assessment roll, and make the assessment conform to the true value in money of the property contained in said roll; provided, that no Board of Equalization shall raise any mortgage, deed of trust, contract or other obligation by which a debt is secured, money or solvent credits, above its face value. The State Board of Equalization elected in eighteen hundred and ninety-four shall continue in office until their successors, as herein provided for, shall be elected and shall qualify.

AMENDMENT NUMBER SEVEN.

SENATE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT No. 16.

A resolution to propose to the people of the State of California an amendment to article thirteen of the Constitution, section one, in relation to revenue and taxation.

Section 1. All property in the State, not exempt under the laws of the United States, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as provided by law. The word "property," as used in this article and section, is hereby declared to include moneys, credits, bonds, stocks, dues, franchises, and all other matters and things, real, personal, and mixed, capable of private ownership; provided, that property used for free public libraries and free museums, growing crops, property used exclusively for public schools, and such as may belong to the United States, this State, or to any county or municipal corporation within this State, shall be exempt from taxation. The Legislature may provide, except in case of credits secured by mortgage or trust deed, for a deduction from credits of debts due to bona fide residents of this State.

AMENDMENT NUMBER EIGHT.

ASSEMBLY CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT No. 31.

A resolution to propose to the people of the State of California an amendment to section seven (7) of article nine (IX) of the Constitution of the State of California, by increasing the number of members constituting the State Board of Education, by adding thereto the President and Professor of Pedagogics of the University of California.

Section 7. The Governor, the Superintendent of Public Instruction, the President of the University of California and the Professor of Pedagogy therein, and the Principals of the State Normal Schools, shall constitute the State Board of Education, and shall compile, or cause to be compiled, and adopt, a uniform series of text-books for use in the common schools throughout the State. The State Board may cause such text-books, when adopted, to be printed and published by the Superintendent of State Printing, at the State Printing Office, and when so printed and published, to be distributed and sold at the cost price of printing, publishing and distributing the same. The text-books so adopted shall continue in use not less than four years; and said State Board shall perform such other duties as may be prescribed by law. The Legislature shall provide for a Board of Education in each county in the State. The County Superintendents and the County Boards of Education shall have control of the examination of teachers and the granting of teachers' certificates within their respective jurisdictions.

AMENDMENT NUMBER NINE.

SENATE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT No. 20.

An Act to submit to the people of the State of California an amendment to section twenty-three of article four of the Constitution of the State of California.

Section 23. The members of the Legislature shall receive, in full payment for their services, the sum of one thousand ($1,000) dollars, and mileage not to exceed ten cents per mile, and for contingent expenses not to exceed twenty-five dollars, for each session, to be paid out of the public treasury. No increase in compensation or mileage shall take effect during the term for which the members of either house shall have been elected, and the pay of no attache shall be increased after he is elected or appointed.

NOW THEREFORE, Pursuant to the provisions of the Constitution, and an Act of the Legislature entitled "An Act to provide for the submission of proposed amendments to the Constitution of the State of California to the qualified electors for their approval," approved March 7, A. D., 1883, viz:

"Section 1. Whenever the Legislature shall propose any amendment or amendments to the Constitution of this State, which amendment or amendments shall have been passed in the manner and form required by section one of article eighteen of the Constitution, and no other mode is provided by law for the submission of such amendment or amendments to the people for their approval, it shall be the duty of the Governor to advertise such proposed amendment or amendments in at least four newspapers of general circulation in this State, for three months next preceding the next general election. One of said newspapers must be published at the city of Sacramento, and two at the city of San Francisco; and in issuing his proclamation for an election at which any amendment or amendments to the Constitution are to be voted upon, he shall include such amendment or amendments therein, and he shall designate them by numbers, in the order in which they have been proposed."

The said amendments are submitted to be separately voted upon by ballot by the qualified electors of the State, on Tuesday, November 6, A. D. 1894.

Each ballot used at such election must contain, printed thereon, the words:

Assembly Constitutional Amendment Number Eight.	Yes. / No.
Senate Constitutional Amendment Number Fourteen.	Yes. / No.
Assembly Constitutional Amendment Number Seven.	Yes. / No.
Assembly Constitutional Amendment Number Twelve.	Yes. / No.
Senate Constitutional Amendment Number Seventeen.	Yes. / No.
Senate Constitutional Amendment Number Seven.	Yes. / No.
Senate Constitutional Amendment Number Sixteen.	Yes. / No.
Assembly Constitutional Amendment Number Thirty-one.	Yes. / No.
Senate Constitutional Amendment Number Twenty.	Yes. / No.

Witness my hand and the Great Seal of the State, affixed at Sacramento, the day and year first above written.

[SEAL] H. H. MARKHAM,
Governor.

Attest: E. G. WAITE,
Secretary of State.

ALIAS SUMMONS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE County of Inyo, State of California.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the County of Inyo, State of California, and the complaint filed in said County of Inyo in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

Victor Trepier Plaintiff, vs. Jaques Jalberque and Manasese Louca, Defendants:

The people of the State of California send greeting to Jaques Jalberque and Manasese Louca, Defendants:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the County of Inyo State of California, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this Inyo County, or, if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain the judgment of this Hon. Court dissolving the partnership heretofore and now existing between yourselves and the Plaintiff, under and by virtue of an agreement made and entered into by you on the 30th day of October, 1893, and that the title to the mines or mining claims described in said agreement may be adjudged freed from all the conditions thereof and restored as follows: That the Plaintiff is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "American Flag Mine;" that Defendant Jaques Jalberque is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "French Flag Mine" and that Defendant Manasese Louca is the owner and entitled to the possession of the "Mexican Flag Mine," as said mines are described in said agreement, and the complaint of file herein; Together with the costs of suit.

Said plaintiff alleging that you have utterly failed, neglected and refused to in any manner whatsoever comply with the terms and conditions of said partnership agreement, or to perform any of the duties imposed thereby, since on or about the 27th day of January, 1894; as will more fully appear by reference to the complaint on file herein.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, said plaintiff will apply to Court for the relief demanded in said complaint.

Witness my hand and the Seal of said Superior Court of the County of Inyo, State of California, this 27th day of June, A. D. 1894.

MARRIED.

REYNOLDS—BASTIAN—At the residence of the bride's parents near Citrus, October 21, 1894, by Rev. S. W. Albone, Mr. Aaron Reynolds and Miss Annie Bastian.

DIED.

CROCKER—At Big Pine October 22, 1894, Anson S. Crocker, a native of New York, aged 61 years.

Fred Conn of Big Pine spent a couple of days in town this week.

Charley Collins will return from Los Angeles early next week.

Sheriff Gorman went to Bishop yesterday and will return tomorrow.

A. C. Steveds arrived home last Tuesday from a visit to Los Angeles.

Ben H. Yandell went to Bishop to-day He expects to return on Sunday.

F. E. Densmore Esq. and J. W. Murphy are at the borax marsh in Salt Wel s Valley.

There has been considerable rain in the coast counties and feed will be good there this fall.

P. H. Mack Esq. and O. I. Mairs are expected to arrive home from Los Angeles next Monday.

Ed Ober came down from Big Pine on Wednesday and is in fine form for the foot-race tomorrow.

J. R. Eldred and Angus McDonald are down from Big Pine canvassing the Supervisor situation.

A social hop will be given at Mairs Hall tomorrow evening. Everybody invited and a good time assured.

Henry Rhine spent last week at Los Angeles attending the sixth District Fair. He went to San Francisco on Saturday.

Local candidates are very busy all over the county. Like Mark Twain's ship captains, you can't throw a stone without hitting one.

W. K. Miller will soon have a fine new Concord coach built by Henderson & Son of Stockton, running on the Keeler and Mojave stage line.

James M. Graham, sentenced to one hundred days for stealing a saddle, was brought down from Bishop on Wednesday and is confined in the county jail.

Meads and Schober are hauling borax from Salt Wells Valley. They expect to leave Mojave on November sixth with a load of freight for points in Owens Valley.

Mrs. Lewis has completed a new ward for the use of hospital patients at Camp Independence. The new structure will accommodate ten inmates and is neat and well arranged.

Irv. H. Mulholland arrived home from Los Angeles on Wednesday. He brought back with him the two-year-old stallion Osito, who made a record of 2:30 at Los Angeles on Saturday last.

Yesterday Mrs. A. W. Eibeshutz gathered a basket of delicious strawberries from her patch in town. While in San Francisco we saw nothing that could compare with these either for size or flavor. Even at this late season these berries were grown in the open air with no protection.

The Salt Lake Road

Speaking of the new road from Salt Lake the Herald says:

"The surveys of the new road have all been completed and at the Salt Lake end grading has been begun but not carried to any considerable distance. While imparting certain of the facts yesterday one of the incorporators stated that a representative of the new company would be leaving this city for Salt Lake City within the week and perfect the necessary arrangments at that end of the line and for the early resumption of actual work on the line.

It is peculiarly interesting considering the feeling of unrest and dissatisfaction in California regarding both local and eastern freight rates, that San Francisco is chosen as one of the terminal points of the new road; while from Los Angeles it will wend its way through the counties of San Bernardino and Inyo into that territory and so on to Salt Lake City, it will also run through Kern, Tulare, Fresno, Merced, Stanislaus, San Joaquin, Santa Clara and Alameda to the metropolis of the north. The length of the line within this State's boundaries is estimated to be about 600 miles.

While such briefly stated, is to be the course of the new road, stated in general terms, its present objective point is Los Angeles, and when the arrangements now being made for interesting capital are completed, work will be commenced at this end to keep pace with the track laying from the Salt Lake end. Pending the close of negotiations in this direction, many details are not allowed to leak out. Suffice it to say that the sum subscribed already is not merely good paper but is paid up.

A railroad is not built in a day, nor is $12,000,000 gathered up in a week, but there is now every reason to suppose that within a reasonably short time, the iron horse with its train of cars will come from the uplands of Inyo, laden with its rich mineral treasures, into the valleys of Los Angeles county and inaugurate an interchange of commodities that can but result in the benefit of both."

Independence School Report

Month ending Oct. 19, 1894: Number of days taught, 20; whole number days attendance 795½; whole number absence 9½; whole number tardiness 25. Number of boys enrolled 18; number of girls enrolled 26. Average number belonging 40; average daily attendance 40. Percentage of attendance on average, no belonging .89. Pupils never absent nor tardy during month Edward Eibeshutz; Val and Edith Gorman; Elsie and Viva Gill; John and Mamie Hession; Joseph, Milt and Minnie Levy; Howard and Arthur Mairs; Edna and Lizzie Matlack; John, Hattie and Daisy Moore; Bessie Parker, Estella and Luella Robinson; Effie Roeper; Irma Webb; Jeanette and Blanche Wood. BEN. F. HUDSPETH, Teacher.

Getting Ready for Election.

The County Clerk has mailed to the Inspector of each election precinct an official copy of the election laws, complete. Distribution of sample ballots and proposed Constitutional amendments will begin tomorrow. All of the several precincts were supplied with ballot boxes and voting booths at the last election. The official ballots, Great Registers and other supplies will be forwarded in due time and the inspectors should be ready to receive them, sign and return receipts therefor.

Messrs. Shellhamer and Coe have set up their artesian well boring plant about a mile south of Olancha and have commenced sinking a deep well. They succeeded in getting a good body of surface water at twenty seven feet which will be sufficient to supply the machine. That their efforts will be crowned with success is the earnest hope of all.

Steady progress is being made on the extension of the Lone Pine Canal. The work around the point of the Alabama hills is necessarily slow, but water for irrigating the valuable country around Lone Pine will be flowing through the ditch before spring.

The Independent force is very busy getting out the Great Register and in consequence the local reporter's most difficult task is in apologizing for lack of news. There will be about 1100 names on the Register this year.

There are but few men left in the camp at Red Rock, the majority of them having gone to the excitement in the Black Hills about fifteen miles north of Red Rock. The new camp is said to be very promising.

ESTRAY NOTICE.

There came to my place at Camp Independence (the Lacey ranch) about the 1st of March, 1894, one bay mare, no brands visible, white star in forehead, about five years old, weight about 950 pounds. The owner is notified to prove his property and remove the animal, or she will be sold according to law.

dependence, Cal. A. N. BELL,

Nothing can be substituted for the Royal Baking Powder and give as good results.

No other leavening agent will make such light, sweet, delicious, wholesome food.

If some grocers urge another baking powder upon you, it is because of the greater profit upon it. This of itself is evidence of the superiority of the "Royal." To give greater profit the other must be a lower cost powder, and to cost less it must be made with cheaper and inferior materials, and thus, though selling for the same, give less value to the consumer.

To insure the finest cake, the most wholesome food, be sure that no substitute for Royal Baking Powder is accepted by you.

SUGAR ITEMS.

During 1892 about 30,000 tons beet sugar were employed in strengthening wines and cider by fermentation. It is interesting to note that the quantity of sugar used for this special purpose was less than during the previous year—due to the fact that the grapes were of a better quality than during 1891.

On several well-organized beet farms recently visited in France, cows receive 110 pounds of residuum beet pulp per diem, to which is added 44 pounds of a fermented product, consisting of chopped straw, etc. The cows under this ration yield on an average twelve quarts of milk daily. As the season advances the pulp ration is reduced.

We are informed that recent improvements in the Barbet distilling appliances permit the production of alcohol that is so pure that a permanganate solution produces no discoloration, even after one hour. A few years since, in alcohol made in stills, the chemical in question would show itself after a few minutes. The Barbet methods for alcohol analysis have become standard, and have been officially adopted by several governments of Continental Europe.

The average sugar made in a French beet sugar factory is purer than sugar obtained elsewhere. It has been found, for example, that for sweetening purposes twice as much Austrian sugar is needed to produce certain results as would be required of the French product. The low price at which the rival sugars are sold is misleading the general Eastern public. In Damascus, for example, a certain paste is made, in which large quantities of beet sugar are used; for same price the manufacturer gets volume, but not quality.

A new process for the purification of beet juices with an iron chloride is said to offer satisfactory results. It is claimed that the purification is more complete than possible to obtain with lime and the regular method of carbonatation. The chloride used precipitates the albumen, and other organic substances are also precipitated at same time. Raw juices from the battery are mixed with lime until their alkalinity is about 0.08 per cent., and to 30 gallons of juice is added one quart of iron chloride. Lime is then mixed in and the liquor heated to 176 degrees Fah. Second carbonatation follows, and to 25 gallons of juice one-half pint chloride is added. The saturation that follows should bring the alkalinity down to 0.05, and when this purification is properly done, there remains no trace of iron.—The Sugar Beet.

By JULIAN HAWTHORNE.

The audience seemed determined on this night to surpass all previous demonstrations of enthusiasm. A cynic might have said that they had set their hearts on reading in the next morning's papers that the applause and floral tributes which greeted the great singer on the eve of her departure from our shores were such as to outdo anything hitherto experienced. The popular favorite was summoned innumerable times before the curtain, and at the conclusion of the performance— But before the conclusion of the performance some events happened which did not appear in the papers, but which it will be necessary to relate.

As the curtain descended upon the last act but one Gen. Inigo, who was in the side scenes, received a card, which seemed to have upon him an effect as of a strong charge of electricity. He ran precipitately to the private door communicating between the house and the stage, where a lady was standing muffled up. She wore a black dress and cloak, and her head and shoulders were enveloped in a white lace shawl. She let this fall open as Inigo approached, and disclosed the features of Vera Marana. She laughed good naturedly, and gave him her hand, which he covered with kisses, while his eyes devoured her with astonishment and interrogation.

"Well, M. Moses," said she, "what are you so affectionate for? Have you pardoned me?"

"Pardoned! Ah! diva! By Jupiter! Did you just come?"

"I was here from the first, but not in the box—no; one cannot hear there. I was away among the common ones. It was necessary I should know what she could do—this young lady—this other self! Well, mon ami, you may compose yourself. I have heard her, now I wish to see her—speak to her. Conduct me where she is and then leave us. Is any one with her?"

"Only her brother. Shall I"——

"Bien, bien! Lead on, mon vieux, I am in a hurry."

When he had brought her to the door of Beatrix's room she made him depart, and then knocked at the door. It was opened by Ed. She made him a gesture at once of greeting and of silence, and advanced into the room, which was filled with flowers. Beatrix was reclining on her sofa with a sad and abstracted expression; but as she raised her eyes and met those of her visitor she sat erect, and the next moment rose to her feet. "You are—Marana!" she said in an inward tone. The two women gazed intently at each other, and there was silence for several seconds. At last the visitor said: "I had thought I was Marana until now. But now, mademoiselle, the name is yours by the right that you have made it more honorable."

"Oh, no—no!" the other murmured.

"Yes, yes, yes!" said Marana, with a smile, which, however, was quickly lost in the gravity of her reigning expression. "You have surprised me," she continued, after a pause; "I did not mean to forgive you! I was angry. But your voice has called my heart out of my bosom. There is no one who can sing like yon—no one—not even I!"

The tone in which these words were uttered—dignified, but profoundly pathetic, as of a great queen discrowning herself—touched Beatrix to the soul and her eyes filled with tears. She shook her head, but she could not speak. After all there was a ravishing sweetness in this praise, coming from the one source in the world which there could be no gainsaying.

"You two ought to pull in a team," put in Ed. "No theatre standing would hold the audiences that would come to hear you sing together!"

Marana made a gesture of negation with her head. "There shall never be but one Marana," she said proudly, "and she shall be the greatest singer in the world! Behold her!" she added, with a movement of her eyes toward Beatrix. "As for me, I sing no more! I have been your audience, mademoiselle; I will never again have an audience of my own!"

"Do not say it—you break my heart!" cried Beatrix; and she glided forward, and took the Russian impetuously in her arms. "Tell her, Ed," she said, half turning to appeal to him, but not letting Marana go. "It is I who shall sing no more; I did it only to help my father and him. This is the last night. If you care for him do not punish his sister. Be yourself again, and be my sister, too!"

Marana drew her head back, and gazed for a moment into the other's eyes. Then she kissed her gravely on both cheeks, and disengaged herself. "You believe, then, that I really love your brother?" she said.

"Yes, indeed! How could you help it?" exclaimed Beatrix warmly.

"And you, monsieur, what have you to say?" continued the other, letting her eyes rest upon him with a certain veiled intensity, the lids half drooped. "Are you also of opinion that you are not indifferent to me?"

"It would take a cleverer man than I am to see through you, Vera," returned the young gentleman naively; "but I don't believe that I could be loving you so much as I do if you didn't love me back."

"But would you marry me, even?"

"Ed's face flushed and his eyes sparkled. "Haven't I shown that I would?" he demanded between his teeth. "Don't make game of me, Vera, unless you mean to be kind afterward!"

She stood looking at him, her head a little bent to the left, her arms hanging down on both sides of her graceful figure. "I mean to be kind to you, my dear," she said finally in a low tone; "more kind than you would think if you knew what I have sometimes been in my life."

"Ed, I am so glad," whispered Beatrix to him in the little pause that followed, but the whisper was tremulous, for a sense of her own forlorness must needs insinuate itself. "You won't forget me, will you?—because I love you too," she added.

But Ed, who was familiar with the expressions on Marana's face, wore an anxious contraction on his forehead; he drew in his lips and held his breath.

"I had given up expecting love when I met you," she continued, her bosom visibly rising and falling. "I am not going to spoil it, now that it has come. For that, also, you may partly thank your sister. She has made me feel that it is good to be generous. You have never known me. I showed you only the best; it was true, but it was not all. If I were your wife you would have to know all. I should not mind for myself, but I should not like you to learn that love is less lovely than it seems now—at least not from me. Yesterday you might have married me, but today—no! My memory will be pleasanter to you than I should be after a while. We will say good-by." She put out her left hand toward him and smiled. "Good-by!"

He covered his eyes with the back of his hand. "I can't bear it!" he said in a broken voice.

Marana's inscrutable face quivered for a moment; she seemed to waver; she swayed slightly toward him as she stood, her lips parted and her eyes shone. But then, with a deep breath, she regained her self command. She looked at Beatrix, as much as to say, "You must comfort him." Then she turned, with a sweep of her black dress, moved to the door and opened it. Bellingham and Wallie Dinsmore were just approaching.

"You are late, messieurs," exclaimed Marana in a gay tone. "I have been offering my homage!"

Wallie looked from one to the other of the three, quietly observant. Ed, with his face averted, was putting on his overcoat and hat; he then pulled the brim of the latter over his eyes and went hastily out, looking neither to the right nor left. Beatrix, with one hand resting on the marble dressing table, and her eyes wide open, stood in a sort of trance. She had not yet seen Bellingham. Wallie offered Marana his arm.

"Since you are going, diva," he said, "permit me to escort you. You misunderstood me yesterday morning. Whatever homage I have to offer shall be paid to you."

Bellingham, thus abandoned to his own guidance, strode up to Beatrix, who uttered a cry; it seemed to her as if he had suddenly started up out of the floor. It had been his purpose to make a final appeal to her, and no doubt his words would have been eloquent and moving, and possibly they might have gained him his object, though he would have had to contend against the incomprehensible doubts, hesitations, perversity and pride of a woman who loves, and knows that she is loved, and yet draws back for the sake of something—heaven knows what. But, as it happened, not a syllable of Bellingham's appeal was ever uttered, for before he could open his lips to begin the bell rang which conveyed the order for the curtain to rise on the last act. So he, perceiving that there was no time to lose, simply caught Beatrix in his arms, met her eyes for an instant, and kissed her. After that it was too late for her to draw back, even had she wished to. She went to take her part on the stage, but she left a marguerite in Bellingham's hand.

Such is the private history of that memorable last night, the other details of which have been sufficiently described in the journals of the period. Mrs. Peters is understood to have sailed for Europe a day or two later. Jocelyn disappeared, leaving unsavory traces behind him. Mr. Randolph, senior, returned to his place up the Hudson, where he is occasionally visited by his married daughter. Ed entered the office of the latter's husband in the capacity of clerk, and is doing well. As for Mlle. Marana, the famous prima donna, she has vanished as utterly as if she had never had any existence.

There are two or three persons in New York who are believed to know something about her; there are perhaps a dozen who know enough to look wise when the matter is broached in their presence; there are a hundred or two who have heard a report to the effect that there were some facts connected with her engagement in this city which have never been fully explained, but the great mass of the public have never been at the pains to entertain any misgivings on the subject. They content themselves with looking forward to the time when that most faithful and enterprising of impresarios Gen. Inigo shall once more bring out at his new opera house the great Marana.

THE END.

A Unique Defense.

In a case some years ago where surviving relatives claimed $5,000 for the loss of a man's life occasioned by the runaway horse of the defendant the following defenses were put in: First—The horse was a kind horse, and would not have run away had he not been frightened, so the party who frightened the horse was to blame. Second—Even after the horse started some person diverted the horse from his course, without which the defendant would not have been knocked down, so the party who thus diverted the horse was to blame. Third—The defendant had plenty of time to get out of the way and was himself to blame. Fourth—The defendant was a pauper, not earning any money, so his death was not a pecuniary loss, but rather a benefit to his family. In this case the jury gave the widow a verdict of $300. This result was obtained by putting down the amount each juror was willing to give and dividing it by twelve.—Interview in New York Sun.

Their End.

Old Woman—I am sorry to hear little boys use such bad langnage. Have you thought what becomes of little boys who use bad language?

Street Urchin—Yes. Dey becomes hoss car drivers.—Brooklyn Life.

TANNING SKINS.

We have had a number of inquiries at different times for directions for tanning skins for the purpose of making rugs. We find in an exchange some directions which the writer says have been used in her family for several years and can be relied upon. Dissolve one-half pound alum, one pound salt-petrie, five pounds common salt and two ounces corrosive sublimate in two gallons of water. Put it in a large stone jar or small tub, and cover so that no animal can drink it for the corrosive sublimate is poison. If there is much flesh on the hides lay them on a board, flesh side up, and rub them with a brick or a dull knife until it is removed. After all the ingredients are dissolved put the skins into the liquid and allow them to remain two or three weeks. Of course large skins require more liquid as they must be covered with it all the time. When they are taken out, rub and work them until they are dry, and they will be soft and pliable.

A calf hide, with long black hair, makes a very handsome laprobe. The hides of cats, rats, squirrels and rabbits are nice for trimming or for making caps, muffs or capes. Sheepskins make beautiful rugs tanned in this way. As white rugs are so easily soiled most housekeepers prefer to dye them. Dissolve one or more packages of diamond dye, for wool, by tying loosely in a piece of cheese-cloth and soaking in water all night. Then put in a large dishpan and add boiling water. When it has boiled two or three minutes let two persons standing on opposite sides of the stove, pass the pelt back and forth in the dye with the wool side down. It will be more convenient to hold, if a strong twine string is fastened in each corner of the pelt. Do not allow the dye to cover the skin. When the wool is the desired shade rince and dry. The center may be cut out of one pelt, and the border of another, and where it is necessary to piece it sew the seams from the back over and over loosely so it will lie flat. The center may be olive green with a border of garnet, or pink may be used for the center with a golden brown border. In fact they may be made of any colors that will harmonize with the room in which they are used. They should then be lined with some heavy material.

Rugs may also be made of other kinds of skins, such as wolf, fox, dog-skins etc., left their natural color. Very pretty trimmings are made by tanning young lambskins that are curly and dyeing them black or seal-brown. Diamond dyes are the only kind that can be used satisfactorily in this work.

At Dungannon, in the west of Ireland, a seam of bituminous coal nearly six feet thick was struck last week at a depth of 188 yards from the surface. This promises to be the biggest coal mine in Ireland.

THE HIGHEST OF HONORS

To Dr. Price's at the Great Fairs.

(Chicago Tribune.)

For leavening power, keeping qualities, purity and general excellence the World's Fair jury decided that Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder had no equal. On each of its claims it was awarded a first prize or a diploma. All the baking powders entered for prizes were subjected to a most exhaustive examination, and the jury was the best equipped to make the decision of any ever got together. Their verdict was supported by the testimony of Dr. H. W. Wiley, chief chemist of the United States Department of Agriculture at Washington. Dr. Wiley is an expert on food products and the highest authority on such matters in America. This verdict settles a long debated question as to which among the many baking powders is the best.

NOTE—Since the foregoing was published the World's Fair triumph has been confirmed by Highest Award and Gold Medal at the California Midwinter Fair.

The philanthropy of some people is merely a judicious advertisement.

THE LAND OF PROMISE

Is the mighty West, the land that "tickled with a hoe laughs a harvest;" the El Dorado of the miner; the goal of the agricultural emigrant. While it teems with all the elements of wealth and prosperity, some of the fairest and most fruitful portions of it bear a harvest of malaria reaped in its fullness by those unprotected by a medicinal safeguard. No one seeking or dwelling in a malarial locality is safe from the scourge without Hostetter's Stomach Bitters. Emigrants, bear this in mind. Commercial travelers sojourning in malarious regions should carry a bottle of the Bitters in the traditional gripsack. Against the effects of exposure, mental or bodily overwork, damp and unwholesome food or water, it is an infallible defense. Constipation, rheumatism, billiousness, dyspepsia, nervousness and loss of strength are all remedied by this genial restorative.

Some people are so constituted that they can never see the bright side of anything but a dollar.

Golden Honors from the Golden Coast ...for... Dr. Price's Baking Powder

California, empire of the Pacific, salutes the world. Her Midwinter Fair closed in a midsummer blaze of glory Second only to the Columbian Exposition in extent, variety and splendor, the coast display was a veritable triumph. Out of her abundance the state poured her treasures—and the nations of the earth came to aid her in her noble exhibition.

Memorable were the exhibits—of gold and silver, of wheat and oil, of fruit and wine, of silk and wool—of all that man and nature could combine to produce. And no exhibit attracted more attention or excited warmer approval than that of

Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder

Official tests showed it to be highest in leavening power, purest in quality, and most efficient in results of all baking powders made. Accordingly, the Highest Award and Gold Medal were conferred on Dr. Price's at the Midwinter Fair.

The triumph at San Francisco confirms the victory at Chicago. The Midwinter Fair verdict sustains and vindicates the bestowal of highest honors on Dr. Price's by the jury of awards at the World's Columbian Exposition.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS are unapproachable in curative properties, rapidity and safety of action, and are the only reliable plasters ever produced. They have successfully stood the test of over thirty years' use by the public; their virtues have never been equalled by imitators who have sought to trade upon the reputation of ALLCOCK'S by making plasters with holes in them, and claiming them to be "just as good as ALLCOCK'S," and they stand to-day endorsed by not only the highest medical authorities, but by millions of grateful patients who have proved their efficacy as a household remedy.

Beware of imitations. Ask for ALLCOCK'S, and do not be persuaded to accept a substitute.

Eight-year-old Oscar Nelson was struck, killed and run over by a North Tacoma avenue street car loaded with passengers for the Interstate Fair. The child had nearly crossed the track before the car, when a companion shouted to him to "Come back." He started to go back and the car struck him, crushing his skull and killing him instantly. The mother is half-crazy with grief. The father, a carpenter, is now in Portland. Coroner Hoskel on investigation, decided that the car employees were blameless.

"This is your little sister, Tommy," said his father, showing him the baby. "You will love her dearly, will you not?" "Yes, of coursse," replied Tommy, inspecting the latest arrival, "but it'll cost a good deal to keep her, won't it?" "I presume so." "Yes," said Tommy, with a long-drawn breath, "and when I asked you the other day to buy me a white rabbit you said you couldn't afford it."

Professor Hayem, of Paris, has recently shown that there is a marked association between dyspepsia and tuberculosis in a great number of cases. The disorder most commonly present is simple gastritis. As the digestive disorder usually occurs first, and paves the way for the pulmonary disease, it is important that disorders of digestion should receive prompt attention.—Exchange.

Professor Jackwallick, the Swedish shellfish cultivator, who is now residing in South Brooklyn, while he studies the American lobster and crab, with an eye to their introduction in Swedish waters, has invented a harmless preparation to transform hard-shell crabs into the soft-shell variety. A Fulton Market firm of wholesale dealers have offered him $50,000 for the American rights to the process.

During her travels in Africa, Mrs. Sheldon, the exploring lady, was exceeding embarrassed by receiving a present of 600 husbands from a local sultan. It was with much difficulty that she succeeded in refusing his splendid gift without giving serious offense.

Dehodo Ogg, the curious person who likes to be known as the "Hermit Poet of Harlem," has written what he calls "The Ballad of the Bridge of the Blue." It is in more than one hundred eight-line verses, and tells the stories of some dozen or more of the suicides who have leaped from High Bridge into the Harlem or to the ground along its banks.

One of the most wretched men in the world is Nordom, the King of Cambodia. He has a fine palace, splendidly furnished, but adheres to the customs of his ancestors and sleeps on a very dirty carpet in an even dirtier shed. He is a hopeless victim of hypochondria, and does nothing between meals but heavs heavy sighs. He is short, fat, and has but one eye.

HARD TO BEAT.

A farmer came into a store and exhibited an enormous egg, which he vowed had been laid by one of his own hens He had it packed in cotton and wouldn't allow anyone to handle it for fear of breaking it. The grocer examined it and said, "pshaw, I have got something that will beat that."

"I'll bet you a pound you haven't," said the countryman.

"Right," replied the grocer, and going behind the counter, he brought out an egg-beater. "There's something that will beat it, I guess," said he, reaching over for the stakes.

"Hold on, there," said the farmer, "let's see you beat it," and he handed it to the grocer. The latter held out his hand for it, but dropped it in surprise on the counter, where it broke two soup plates. It was solid iron, painted white.

"Some folks think they're darnation cute," muttered the farmer, as he pocketed the stakes and cleared, "but 'taint no use buckin' against the solid facts."

The thrashing of wheat in Yamhill county, Or., shows that it suffered to some extent from the ravages of the aphis. The average yield is quite low, not exceeding twenty bushels to the acre. One field yielded something like twenty-seven bushels, and in another there were thrashed 128 bushels from four acres, though the general average in the rest of the latter crop was considerably less. The wheat is mostly plump and comparatively clean, but with many small grains. Oats are only a fair yield, but of good quality, and seem to be coming in quite freely to the warehouses.

THE MOON'S FACE.

Not Composed of Green Cheese as Some Suppose.

IT IS IMPERFECTLY UNDERSTOOD.

The Impossibility of Any Other Body Coming Between Her and the Earth—Moonlight is Sunlight Reflected.

The most glorious object on which the eye of man ever rested is the sun, after which comes the moon, when shining with a full, round face. It is difficult, indeed, to conceive that an object of such brilliancy is, in reality, a dark one, in itself as devoid of light as is the earth at midnight in the absence of the moon. Moonlight is simply sunlight received second hand, the light of the sun being reflected from the moon's dark surface. This is true of all the planets also, though not of stars, as they are all suns self shining as our own, a fact previously given.

If to behold the full moon is a spectacle so inspiring, her crescent with its horns pointing either to the right or left, or again, upward as she nears the setting sun, is hardly less so, and in this place demands special attention, as, from long experience, I find the cause of her assumption of the crescent, the half and the gibbous phases to be very imperfectly understood, it being often imagined, even, that some dark body passes between the earth and the moon, and cuts off her light wholly or in part, and suggests the question often asked of me, "What is the object which thus intervenes?" Of all the countless host of stars, comets and planets, the moon is nearest to the earth, and, consequently, it is not possible for any other body to come between her and the earth.

The moon's easterly motion is about thirteen degrees daily, and her complete revolution around the earth occupies about 273 days, but as during this time the sun has moved also easterly one degree per day, the moon, to overtake the sun and produce a new moon, has to make more than a complete revolution. This requires a little more than two days, so that from new moon to new again is not 27½, but 29½ days, the length of a lunar month. The instant of the new moon is when the moon passes the sun, her illumined side being, of course, wholly turned toward that luminary, and her dark and, consequently, invisible side toward the earth. As she emerges from the sun a constantly increasing portion of her sunny side turns towards us, and we see her first as a slender crescent which nightly grows in size until after the lapse of a little more than seven days after passing the sun she appears as a half moon, one-half of her sunny side being turned toward us, or, as the almanacs say, at first quarter. Nightly, more and more of her bright disk presents itself until, rising when the sun sets, her entire luminous portion is turned to us as well as to the sun, and we see her as the full-orbed moon. Then, in reverse order, the above changes are gone through until a fortnight has elapsed, when she again passes the sun and becomes invisible.

Although the full moon in a cloudless sky floods the earth with radiance and splendor and invests even the most unlovely objects with a softened beauty, yet it would require more than 600,000 moons shining at once to equal the light of the sun.

It is a curious and an unexplained fact, and probably not an exceptional case in the solar system, that the moon revolves round the earth in exactly the same time required to rotate on her axis, thus forever preventing her posterior hemisphere from being seen, and, therefore, we are and must remain ignorant regarding the typography and scenery of the opposite side.

The inhabitability of the moon has in every age been a fruitful theme for reflection and discussion, but the invention of the telescope has settled the question in the negative. As it is a world entirely destitute of an atmosphere, as it has no water, not a drop, and as its days and nights are each equal to two of our earth-weeks, and as, furthermore, no change has been observed since it became an object of telescopic study, we are forced to the conclusion that it cannot be the home of sentiment beings, and that it cannot sustain life of any sort. Are we then justified in the belief that this heavenly body has been created in vain? No; we owe much to the moon. She raises the ocean tides, and their ebb and flow serve to keep the waters of the gulfs, bays and estuaries of the earth from growing stagnant. And to sailors at sea she is of great service in determining positions.

The moon as a telescope object surpasses in magnificence all others in the heavens. On favorable occasions she can approach to less than 220,000 miles from the earth, or, from surface to surface, to within 215,000 miles. If at such a time a magnifying power of, say, two thousand be applied, she will be seen as though at a distance of over 100 miles. Under these conditions, an object as large as the Capital at Washington could be seen as a visible point.

It is not possible for any telescope ever to do better than that. The idea impromulgated by sensational writers regarding the giant telescopes that must, when completed, bring the moon to within a few miles or even to a distance of a few yards is wholly erroneous. To see the moon well there is no need of a mammoth telescope, as she has sufficient light to bear a high power, yet our atmosphere is so laden with vapors and lashed with tremors which are magnified as much as is the moon itself, that the close investigation ardently desired by astronomers is prevented thereby, and only low magnifying powers can be used. But the lunar scenery even under these not most favorable conditions is grand beyond the power of words to express. The great telescope of the Lowe Observatory, with its incomparable eyepiece, specially adapted for the work, will reveal her mountain heights and craterous depths, her yawning canyons and dry ocean beds, where when the moon was young, tides ebbed and flowed.—Mount Lowe Echo.

PHYSICAL BANKRUPTCY.

A prudent business man always has some resources in reserve to meet unexpected contingencies. He knows that he must be prepared for changes in commercial values and disappointments in business engagements. To continue a sound, healthy business, he must have something to fall back upon if occasion demands. His daily balance fluctuates more or less, but its bulk is never seriously impaired without causing much concern and inciting measures for its reinforcement. The reserve, if diminished to any considerable extent, is carefully nourished by economy of expenditure, and soon relieves itself, and then business goes on as before.

Analagous conditions prevail in the human system. A healthy man uses up, as ordinary occasion demands, a certain amount of his vital strength in the pursuance of his daily duties; his rest at night, his food, his recreation, serve to make good the loss incurred, and his balance of health remains about the same. But now some accident or disease overtakes him; his body's income is cut off, his appetite gone, his rest disturbed, while fever, pain and anxiety sap his strength and rapidly encroach upon his reserve vitality. Whether he recovers depends upon the amount of reserve force and the degree of the demand upon it. If he has not impaired his constitution by indulgences, or weakened it by too close application to business and neglect of such sanitary principles as tend to preserve his vital forces intact, he will be able to meet the drafts drawn upon him by his illness. During convalescense expenditure of force is as limited as possible. His vital income is greater than his outgo. His reserve is increased day by day, and when he has fully recovered it has reached its normal condition of stability. If, however, his recovery is incomplete, or from the nature of his disability impossible, his reserve force is permanently impaired, and he remains an invalid, his body capital is infringed beyond repair.

It is essential then, if stable health is to be expected, that provisions should be made for emergencies that are sure to arise in the corporal as in the commercial system, and that simply to meet the requirements of the day is not sufficient. As in business affairs disasters surely follow large responsibilities and greater risks, which are constantly making inroads upon the capital involved, so vital bankruptcy is imminent when larger drafts are made upon the nervous force than is consistent with its daily gain. In such cases nature invariably foretells the coming danger, and as clearly points out the course to avoid it.—P. S. Starr, M. D., in Worthington's Magazine.

CONNECTION OF LABOR AND FOOD.

The human body is an example of perpetual power, says a health journal. Its work ceases only with life. Even in the most profound slumber, which closely simulates death, some of its functions are going on, as, for example, breathing, circulation of the blood and digestion, if the stomach contain food. It follows that the nervous system is also on active duty both day and night. In the mere act of living some of the substance of the body is being constantly consumed. A person deprived of food will live for some time upon the fat supply of the body, if water be supplied. We lose in weight by exercise. A laborer, if weighed after several hours of severe labor, will be found a few pounds lighter than before. So if we do not wish to become bankrupt in stock, we must replace by food what we have lost by exercise. Hunger and thirst are the instincts that prompt us to do this. In a healthy adult as much is taken as is required to maintain the body against loss. On the one is so much food spent in work, on the other, so much received into the stomach for digestion. Nature keeps the balance. In an unhealthy person the instinct of hunger becomes disordered, the appetite fails in its demands and the person goes on in the daily routine with an insufficiency of nourishment until he is physically pauperized, or a morbid appetite calls too frequently—he eats too much, and the vital machinery becomes clogged. A scientific calculation of the work transacted in the body reveals the fact that for a person engaged in hard manual labor, eight and one-half pounds of food and drink are consumed daily—some more, some less; but this is the average. Most of the energy stored up in these eight and a half pounds is expended in keeping the body warm and its functions active. Only about one-tenth can be spent in bodily exercise or labor. Persons wishing to increase in weight will readily perceive how to economize their forces.

10,000 YEARS OLD.

A Mastodon Recently Discovered at Sheridan, New York.

INTEREST TAKEN IN THE REMAINS.

The Dahlman Boys While Digging a Ditch at Sheridan, N. Y., Unearth a Prehistoric Animal Wonder.

The mastodon whose remains were discovered at Sheridan, near Dunkirk, N. Y., a week ago, appears to have been one of the largest animals that ever lived. He was a mammoth mastodon and a veritable king of the animal world. The only way in which an adequate idea of the size of this animal can be reached is by comparing him with Jumbo. Jumbo was the largest known elephant, but the Sheridan mastodon was almost twice as big. He was ten feet taller than Jumbo, whom he could probably have annihilated with one blow of his mighty trunk, and he weighed several tons when hungry. After dinner this animal may have weighed a ton or two more, for the teeth, which have been dug up on the land of Farmer Dahlman, where the skeleton was found, show that he was capable of chewing the trunks of trees, and that he could bite off telegraph poles.

It is now 10,000 years since this gentleman came to an untimely end. That is the estimate of the age of the skeleton which has been made by Professor F. B. Palmer, of the State Normal School at Fredonia, who has taken great interest in the bones thus far brought to light. These bones are numerous, but not nearly so numerous as the bones yet remaining in the ground, which will probably be dug up within a week.

The remains of the mastodon were found in marshy ground. Two sons of Farmer Dahlman went out to dig a ditch through this land. They had not proceeded very far with their work when one of them struck something hard with his spade. This hard substance, which turned out to be the skull of the mastodon, was buried eighteen inches below the surface. The Dahlman boys supposed it to be rotten wood, and spaded right through it. Then an enormous tooth was unearthed. It was hard and polished and curiously corrugated, and it was supposed to be a stone of odd shape.

The tooth, which looked like a small boulder, was thrown aside and no further attention was paid to it until another of like peculiar shape was uncovered. As soon as the soil was brushed away, it was seen to be the enormous tooth of some extinct animal, and then the young men knew that they had made a unique find. A further search brought to light tusks, sections of the skull and vertebrae, the collar bone and several other bones, some of which look like parts of the huge forelegs. The tusks of the mastodon were decayed at the butt, but two feet of the end of each remained in a perfect state of preservation, hard and polished and heavy.

An idea of the immense size of this animal—supposed to be one of the largest mastodons ever unearthed—can be gained from the fact that a distance of twelve feet intervened between the ends of the tusks. As the head and many of the bones were in a natural position when found on the land of Farmer Dahlman, it is supposed that the tusks were preserved in their original positions through all the centuries, and that the animal died standing up.

This was the case with the famous mastodon whose skeleton was found in 1866 near Cohoes, in this State, and which is now in the State Museum of Natural History at Albany. He was found in marshy ground, and it is supposed that mastodons, like elephants, were fond of wading in the mud, and often got caught in a quicksand. From what has thus far been learned, it is estimated that the Sheridan mastodon was a much bigger animal than the Cohoes specimen. Paleontologists assert that from a single bone they can reconstruct the remains of any animal, and depict him in the shape in which he lived. What remained of the tusks found at Sheridan was five feet long. These tusks were slightly curved.

Some mastodons have had enormous tusks in the upper jaw, with two smaller tusks in the lower jaw. Others have had tusks curved backward. It is asserted by some naturalists that there were no trees on the earth at the time these huge beasts roamed about, and that they used the tusks for digging up the ground. At the same time remains of trees have been found nearly as old as the skeletons of mastodons. The teeth of the latter, moreover seem to have been made for the purpose of cutting and masticating wood and other fibrous substances.

One of the teeth found at Sheridan last week weighed four pounds and the others weighed nearly as much each. There were found altogether six of these teeth. The largest of them measured seven by four inches, giving a cutting surface which would quickly reduce a good-sized tree to pulp. The enamel on all the teeth was hard and white while the tusks were nearly black.

The enormous size of the skull has astonished such scientists as have studied the matter. The skull measured five feet six inches across, so that the head of the animal when clothed in flesh was as broad as the average man is tall. One of the tusks was six inches in diameter. The vertebrae dug up show the animal to have been of great size and it is estimated that he was between fifteen and twenty feet in height, and probably as long.

Professor Palmer has expressed the opinion that the animal did not die where found, but was carried to the spot and deposited there by ice during the glacial period. This was perhaps suggested by the remains of mammoths found in Siberia. One Siberian mammoth, still clothed in flesh, with hair on the back of his neck, and his eyes still perfect, was found embedded in a glacier, and he can now be seen in the Government museum in St. Petersburg. This specimen, however, was only about nine feet high.

The American animal glories in the name "Mastodon giganteus," and was larger than any mammoth. One of the largest specimens discovered was dug up in marshy ground in 1840, in the State of Missouri, and his skeleton is now in the British Museum at London, but is less than ten feet high.

The mastodon is believed to have flourished before, during and after the glacial epoch, but there are reasons for thinking that he was contemporary with prehistoric man. One of these reasons is the discovery of a drawing of the animal scratched on a piece of its own ivory, and found in a cave in France. The cave-dwellers were perhaps driven into their peculiar habitations by fear of mastodons, which could trample on houses and brush aside the strongest habitations. Only in caves could the prehistoric man be safe, and the mouths of these caves were so small that the mastodons could not enter.

In several of the caves inhabited by that interesting individual, prehistoric man, there have been found the bones of mastodons which had been split open with a stone hatchet to get at the marrow. Mastodon marrow was a delicacy for which the animal was hunted, and his teeth and bones were useful in a variety of ways. Just how our ancestors killed the mastodon is not known. Even in modern times a sportsman, equipped with the best of weapons, might well tremble at the sight of one of these monsters in the primeval forest, for their skin was thick and bullet-proof in parts, and the most powerful cartridge would hardly send a bullet through the thicknesses of flesh which intervened between the skin and heart.

The land where the skeleton of the mastodon was discovered at Sheridan is a quicksand, which strengthens the belief that the animal was caught there during some foraging expedition 10,000 years ago, and was drawn under the surface. Up to a few years ago it had been the bed of a small lake, which was finally drained off. The ground has, however, remained marshy, and it was with the intention of building additional drains that the Dahlman boys were working when they came upon the skull. In anticipation of the work of excavating the entire skeleton, the land will now be thoroughly drained.

The members of the Dahlman family have been congratulated upon their find, but just at present Mr. Dahlman is somewhat uncertain as to what may be its monetary value. He says the bones are of no use to him. All Sheridan and Dunkirk have been discussing for a week the value of a mastodon skeleton and several farmers in the vicinity have begun a search of their own land in the hope of turning up another of the species. In fact, the mastodon fever has struck Sheridan, and "prospecting" is now going on upon an extensive scale.

Owing to the absence of outcroppings or other indications whereby the skeletons may be located, it will be necessary to dig in a haphazard way, in those parts of the farms which have not been under cultivation. The best-informed, however, assert that the mastodons never traveled in herds, and that it is unlikely another will be found in the neighborhood.

Possibly the companion of the mastodon found at Sheridan was that dug up at Cohoes in 1866, and although the distance between these points is great, the animal, it is believed, could have covered it in a night's march, judging by his enormous strength and the length of his stride. The work of draining the marsh and searching for the remainder of the bones will be begun this week.

THE ETIQUETTE OF ENGLISH BARRISTERS.

The barrister, Mr. Willis, who took dinner at the Judge's lodgings on Tuesday, gave me some interesting information concerning the relations the attorneys and barristers have toward one another. A barrister may not "tout" for retainers nor "hug" for business. If on the circuit he must not eat at the same table with the attorneys. If he chances to stop at the same inn, his meals must be served in his own apartments; he must not ride in the same coach with a solicitor or attorney, nor smoke in the same room, nor bestow nor receive any hospitality from him. It would be a gross breach of professional decorum for a barrister to waltz or dance with any member of a solicitor's family, for this would be a gross example of "hugging" for business. The phrase "briefless barrister" came to me with a meaning and emphasis that were new to me. After several years of circuit riding without a retainer, the young barrister is apt to conclude that he has missed his vocation, and he betakes himself to the colonies or does newspaper or magazine or other literary work in London or the provinces. It has been stated recently, on what seemed to be good authority, that only about 10 per cent. of the young men who are called to the bar succeed in making their way.—Indianapolis Journal.

Professor Beebe Poopooh, who made a world-wide reputation as the discoverer of a microscopic fungi on the teeth of the pudamuck, has a glass eye. He was astounded recently when he found that through the use of a violet-colored light his optic nerve was so affected that he could read finer print with the artificial eye than with the natural. When Professor Poopooh coughs the sound is so frequently mistaken for the slamming of a door that his family have requested him to retire to the woods when he feels a tickling in the larynx.

CREMATION THE FAD.

The Cost and Advantages of the Innovation.

GROWTH OF CREMATION SOCIETIES.

Details of the Ceremony, Which is Generally Private—Women Wedded to the Old Style of Burial.

A great many people care little or nothing as to what becomes of their bodies after they are dead, although very solicitous as to their bodies when alive. Yet the relatives of these people are usually careful as to the disposition to be made of the remains. This is particularly true of women, who are wedded to the old-fashioned methods of burial, and most of them set their faces resolutely against any innovation in the mortuary ceremonies.

That is one reason why cremation has had an uphill task in establishing itself as a recognized method for disposing of the remains of the dead.

There is something queer about the idea of shoving a man's body into a retort and delivering to his relatives two or three pounds of ashes in a sealed jar a few hours afterwards. Yet there are few if any valid reasons which can be urged against cremation. All the arguments are in its favor.

That the living should not suffer because of the dead is a well-known recognized maxim, yet thousands of bodies are every year buried in the ground about New York, there to slowly decompose and poison the earth, the drinking water and the air. Cremation is only a short cut on the processes of nature which finally reduce the body of a man to a few pounds of ashes, but in the meantime the body undergoes transformations which would horrify the surviving relatives if it could be exposed to view.

Under these circumstances it is gratifying to know that cremation is becoming popular, if anything can be popular, which snuffs out life's candle in a quick and rapid manner and obliterates as far as possible the visible evidences of one's having ever lived. People are forming societies, each member of which pledges himself to have his body cremated and to help cremate the bodies of other members, and crematories are steadily increasing in number in all parts of the country. Every once in a while some prominent man dies and his body is cremated, and this, being noted in the newspapers, only serves to advertise the new method. Such was the disposition of the remains of the late Duke of Bedford, in England, and if some king would only now die in a European country and be cremated his former loyal subjects would probably in a large measure follow his example. The influence of the aristocracy is thus potential in establishing a new fashion even after death.

The man who has his body cremated can laugh at grave-robbers, and the fear of being buried alive has no terrors for him. He can look forward with complacency to "filling a crack in true Shakesperian manner, for the dust which the crematorium turns over to the sorrowing relatives is little more than sufficient to fill a two-pound can. While a man's body is burned, his memory lives on unimpaired in the minds of all who knew him, and it is the memory which he shall leave after him and which fire cannot touch that dying men care more about than they do as to the disposition of their remains.

Some clergymen are opposed to cremation on sentimental grounds, but many others are outspoken in its favor. As it reduces the cost of burial, it opposes vested interests which yield a large annual revenue to churches and cemetery associations. But many men who have been cremated occupy full-length graves with the regulation tombstones, and there is nothing incongruous in the idea.

The Urn, which is the appropriate title of the official organ of the cremationists, has been unable to find any valid reason which can be urged against the practice, and even the Casket and the Shroud, which speak for the undertakers, admit that there is much to be said in its favor. Formerly undertakers were opposed to cremation, but now signs reading "Inquire here for cremation" can be seen in the window of nearly every undertaker's shop of this city, and between the Urn, the Casket and the Shroud the most harmonious relations exist.

It is estimated that nearly twenty thousand people living in this vicinity now belong to the cremation societies, the membership of which is steadily growing. They will probably all be burned at the Fresh Pond Crematory, on Long Island, which is now kept pretty busy from one end of the year to the other, and is the only crematory in this vicinity. There were cremated there last year forty-nine times more bodies than during the first year of its existence, although it is less than ten years old. Of old the poet wrote:

The boasts of heraldry, the pomp of power,
All that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave,
Await alike the inevitable hour:
The paths of glory lead but to the grave.

This has now been amended so as to read as follows:

The boasts of heraldry, the pomp of power,
All that beauty, all that wealth e'er knew,
Await alike the inevitable hour;
The paths of glory lead but up the flue.

The crematory at Fresh Pond, L. I., has recently had its capacity enlarged, so as to keep pace with the demands now made upon it. At the present time twenty-four bodies can be incinerated there in a single day. During 1885, which was the first year of the operation, of the crematory, only five bodies were incinerated, but the number in 1893 rose to 245, which will probably be exceeded by the figures of the present year.

Altogether there have been 1,262 cremations at Fresh Pond since 1885, and of these the countries represented are follows: Germany, 650; United States, 420; England, 43; Switzerland, 29; Austria, 25; France, 22; Ireland, 12; Hungary, 11; Italy, 8; Denmark, 7; Scotland, 6; Holland, 4; India, 4, Cuba, 5; Russia, 3; Belgium, 3; Australia, 2; Canada, 2; Norway, 2; West Indies, 1; Asia Minor, 1; On Mediterranean, 1; Unknown, 1.

Of these 816 were men, 362 women; 66 boys and 48 girls.

Crematories are now established at Washington, Pa., New York, St. Louis, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Buffalo, Los Angeles, Detroit, Lancaster, Pittsburg, Baltimore, Troy, Davenport, San Francisco, Swinburne Island, N. Y.; Chicago, Waterville, N. Y., and Boston. In all these places there has been a steady growth in the use of these crematories, and in the aggregate nearly 3,000 bodies have been incinerated. The percentage of increase has advanced more rapidly within recent years, and, with the organization of the cremation societies, the increased use of the crematories will be still more marked. The incinerations in some of the cities have been as follows: St. Louis, 267; Philadelphia, 250; Cincinnati, 227; Buffalo, 188; Los Angeles, 145; Detroit, 128; Lancaster, 102; Pittsburg, 89; Baltimore, 56; Troy, 43; Davenport, 25; San Francisco, 24, and Swinburne Island, 24.

President Louis Lange, of the United States Cremation Company, of this city, and publisher of the "Urn," speaks enthusiastically of the progress that is being made in advancement of the method of disposing of the dead by burning. On his desk yesterday were placed several tin cans sealed and labeled, which had just arrived from Fresh Pond.

"These vessels, said Mr. Lange to a reporter of the Sunday "World," "contain the remains of five persons—the last cremated at Fresh Pond. Great care is taken to prevent the possibility of a mistake. As soon as the ashes are removed from the retort they are placed in the vessel, which is immediately labeled and sealed. This seal is not permitted to be broken until it reaches my hands, and then only at the request of the person accredited to receive it. These seals, as you may observe, are all intact and, for the reason given you, I cannot expose the ashes to your view. There is a plainly perceptible difference in the tint or shade of the ashes of each person. This is explained by the effect of drugs or liquors, or maybe the food consumed by the person whose ashes are in the vessel."

"What are the objections to cremation, and by whom are they advanced?"

"There are really no objections. The prejudice is largely limited to women, who, for sentimental reasons, growing out of associations in connection with burial, oppose the cremation of their relatives, even after a wish to be incinerated had been made by the husband, father or brother. But this is gradually passing away. Slowly but surely it is diminishing. Women who reflect will find that such objections are not valid. If they could see the condition of the bodies some time after they had been placed in the grave, they would be horrified, and would quickly be made converts to the new, purifying process, which preserves all that it is possible of the dead, in a form that is in no sense objectionable.

"Do objections come from clergymen?"

"Some ministers have objected, but many of them are growing more and more liberal towards the new system. I have many letters from preachers, some of them leading clergymen, approving of cremation. The Rev. Dr. Rainsford, of St. George's Church, in this city, is among the number. Only about a year ago he held a regular funeral service over the ashes of a well-known actress who had died abroad. Andrew Carnegie is also in favor of cremation, and has signified his approval of the method in a letter to me. Many others hold equally liberal views. Hyigenic and sanitary considerations alone should, and will, eventually lead to the abolishment of burial of bodies in the earth, which is poisoned, as well as the atmosphere, by their contaminating influence."

"What is the comparative cost between burial and cremation."

"The expense is, of course, largely in favor of cremation. Still the obsequies may be made as costly and elaborate as may be desired—that is, before reaching the crematory. Then there is a regular charge—in the case of adults $35, and of children $25. This does not include transportation nor undertaker's charges. The body may be conveyed to the crematory by the friends of the deceased in such manner as they may select, or it can be transported by the company. Thus the cost may be made as light or as heavy as the persons interested may choose. There is no special preparation of the body necessary; it is always incinerated in the clothing in which it is received, and the ceremony may be as private as the friends may desire. On the day following the ashes may be called for at the office of the company, and they are delivered in a vessel provided free of cost."

"Bodies coming from a distance will be received at one day's notice, and if desired, all the arrangements will be attended to by the company's agents. These regulations apply, in effect, to all the crematories throughout the country. Any religious or Masonic service may be held at the crematory, where the use of an oragn is provided free of cost. The coffin will not be opened, but in every case it is burned with the body. The regulations are made as simple as possible, but due care is taken to prevent the spread of any infectious or contagious disease, by having all the coffins, clothing, etc., consumed with the body."—N. ELECTION PROCLAMATION.

NOVEMBER 6, 1894.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

Notice is hereby given that a general election will be held throughout the State of California on Tuesday, the sixth day of November, A. D. 1894, when the following officers will be elected, namely:

Governor.

Lieutenant-Governor.

Secretary of State.

Controller.

Treasurer.

Attorney-General.

Surveyor-General.

Clerk of the Supreme court.

Superintendent of Public Instruction.

Superintendent of State Printing.

Also, seven Representatives to the Congress of the United States; being one Representative from each Congressional District.

Also, three Railroad Commissioners: be one Railroad Commissioner from each Railroad District.

Also, four Members of the State Board of Equalization: being one member from each State Board of Equalization District.

Also, two Associate Justices of the Supreme Court, full term.

Also, one Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, for the unexpired term ending January, 1899.

Also, four Judges of the Superior Court in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

Also, two Judges of the Superior Court in and for the following counties: Alameda, Los Angeles and Fresno.

Also, one Judge of the Superior Court in and for each of the following counties: Riverside, Kings, Madera and San Bernardino.

Also, one Judge of the Superior Court in and for the county of Amador, for the unexpired term ending January, 1897; vice John F. Davis, appointed.

Also, one Judge of the Superior Court in and for the county of Santa Cruz, for the unexpired term ending January, 1897; vice James H. Logan, appointed.

Also, one State Senator from each of the following Senatorial Districts: Second, Fourth, Sixth, Eighth, Tenth, Twelfth, Fourteenth, Sixteenth, Eighteenth, Twentieth, Twenty-second, Twenty-fourth, Twenty-sixth, Twenty-eighth, Thirtieth, Thirty-second, Thirty-fourth, Thirty-sixth, Thirty-eighth and Fortieth.

Also, one Member of the Assembly from each Assembly District.

Also at said election, Amendments to the Constitution of the State, submitted by the Legislature at its last regular session, numbered as hereinafter specified, will be voted upon by the electors of said State, namely:

AMENDMENT NUMBER ONE—Assembly Constitutional Amendment No. 8—

A resolution to propose to the people of the State of California an amendment to the Constitution of the State, amending section one of article two thereof, relative to the right of suffrage.

AMENDMENT NUMBER Two (Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 14)—

A resolution proposing to the people of the State of California an amendment to section three of article eleven of the Constitution of the State of California, relating to the formation of new counties.

AMENDMENT NUMBER THREE—Assembly Constitutional Amendment No. 7—

A resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the State of California, by adding a new section to article thirteen of said Constitution, to be numbered section twelve and three-fourths (12¾), relating to revenue and taxation.

AMENDMENT NUMBER FOUR—Assembly Constitutional Amendment No. 12—

A resolution proposing to the people of the State of California an amendment to section seventeen, article one, of the Constitution of the State of California, relating to who may acquire property in this State.

AMENDMENT NUMBER FIVE—Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 17—

A resolution proposing to the people of the State of California an amendment to section seven, article eleven, of the Constitution of the State of California, relating to consolidation of city and county governments.

AMENDMENT NUMBER SIX—Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 7—

A resolution to propose to the people of the State of California an amendment to the Constitution of the State, amending section nine, of article thirteen thereof, relative to the election of a State Board of Equalization.

AMENDMENT NUMBER SEVEN—Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 16—

A resolution to propose to the people of the State of California, an amendment to article thirteen of the Constitution, section one, in relation to revenue and taxation.

AMENDMENT NUMBER EIGHT—Assembly Constitutional Amendment No. 31—

PROCLAMATION.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
SACRAMENTO, Aug. 4, 1894.

WHEREAS, the Legislature of the State of California, at its thirtieth session, beginning on the second day of January, A. D. 1893, two-thirds of all the members elected to each of the houses of said Legislature voting in favor thereof, proposed the following described amendments to the constitution of the State of California, to wit:

AMENDMENT NUMBER ONE.

ASSEMBLY CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT No. 8.

A resolution to propose to the people of the State of California an amendment to the Constitution of the State, amending section one of article two thereof, relative to the right of suffrage.

Section 1. Every native male citizen of the United States, every male person who shall have acquired the rights of citizenship under or by virtue of the treaty of Queretaro, and every male naturalized citizen thereof who shall have become such ninety days prior to any election, of the age of twenty-one years, who shall have been resident of the state one year next preceding the election, and of the county in which he claims his vote ninety days, and in the election precinct thirty days, shall be entitled to vote at all elections which are now or may hereafter be authorized by law; provided, no native of China, no idiot, no insane person, no person convicted of any infamous crime, no person hereafter convicted of the embezzlement or misappropriation of public money, and no person who shall not be able to read the Constitution in the English language and write his name, shall ever exercise the privileges of an elector in this State; provided, that the provisions of this amendment relative to an educational qualification shall not apply to any person prevented by a physical disability from complying with its requisitions, nor to any person who now has the right to vote, nor to any person who shall be sixty years of age and upwards at the time this amendment shall take effect.

AMENDMENT NUMBER TWO.

SENATE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT No. 14.

A resolution proposing to the people of the State of California an amendment to section three of article eleven of the Constitution of the State of California, relating to the formation of new counties.

Section 3. The Legislature, by general and uniform laws, may provide for the formation of new counties; provided, however, that no new county shall be established which shall reduce any county to a population of less than eight thousand; nor shall a new county be formed containing a less population than five thousand; nor shall any line thereof pass within five miles of the county seat of any county proposed to be divided. Every county which shall be enlarged or created from territory taken from any other county or counties, shall be liable for a just proportion of the existing debts and liabilities of the county or counties from which such territory shall be taken.

AMENDMENT NUMBER THREE.

ASSEMBLY CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT No. 7.

A resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the State of California, by adding a new section to article thirteen of the said Constitution, to be numbered section twelve and three-fourth (12¾), relating to revenue and taxation.

Section 12¾. Fruit and nut bearing trees under the age of four years from the time of planting in orchard form, and grapevines under the age of three years from the time of planting in vineyard form, shall be exempt from taxation, and nothing in this article shall be construed as subjecting such trees and grapevines to taxation.

AMENDMENT NUMBER FOUR.

ASSEMBLY CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT No. 12.

A resolution proposing to the people of the State of California an amendment to section seventeen, article one, of the Constitution of the State of California.

Section 17. Foreigners of the white race, or of African descent, eligible to become citizens of the United States under the naturalization laws thereof, while bona fide residents of this States, shall have the same rights in respect to the acquisition, possession, enjoyment, transmission, and inheritance of all property, other than real estate, as native born citizens; provided, that such aliens owning real estate at the time of the adoption of this amendment may remain such owners; and provided further, that the Legislature may, by statute, provide for the disposition of real estate which shall hereafter be acquired by such aliens by descent or devise.

AMENDMENT NUMBER FIVE.

SENATE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT No. 17.

A resolution proposing to the people of the State of California an amendment to section seven, article eleven, of the Constitution of the State of California.

Section 7. City and county governments may be merged and consolidated into one municipal government, with one set of officers, and may be incorporated under general laws providing for the incorporation and organization of corporations for municipal purposes. The provisions of this Constitution applicable to cities, and also those applicable to counties, so far as not inconsistent or prohibited to cities, shall be applicable to such consolidated government.

AMENDMENT NUMBER SIX.

SENATE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT No. 7.

A resolution to propose to the people of the State of California an amendment to the Constitution of the State, amending section nine of article thirteen thereof, relative to the election of a State Board of Equalization.

Section 9. A State Board of Equalization, consisting of one member from each congressional district in this State, shall be elected by the qualified electors of their respective districts, at the first general election to be held after the adoption of this amendment, and at each general election every four years, whose term of office shall be for four years, whose duty it shall be to equalize the valuation of the taxable property in the several counties of the State for the purposes of taxation. The Controller of State shall be ex officio a member of the Board. The Boards of Supervisors of the several counties of the State shall constitute Boards of Equalization for their respective counties whose duty it shall be to equalize the valuation of the taxable property in the county for the purpose of taxation; provided, such State and County Boards of Equalization are hereby authorized and empowered, under such rules of notice as the County Boards may prescribe as to the county assessments, and under such rules of notice as the State Board may prescribe as to the action of the State Board, to increase or lower the entire assessment roll, or any assessment contained therein, so as to equalize the assessment of the property contained in said assessment roll, and make the assessment conform to the true value in money of the property contained in said roll; provided, that no Board of Equalization shall raise any mortgage, deed of trust, contract or other obligation by which a debt is secured, money or solvent credits, above its face value. The State Board of Equalization elected in eighteen hundred and ninety-four shall continue in office until their successors, as herein provided for, shall be elected and shall qualify.

AMENDMENT NUMBER SEVEN.

SENATE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT No. 16.

A resolution to propose to the people of the State of California an amendment to article thirteen of the Constitution, section one, in relation to revenue and taxation.

Section 1. All property in the State, not exempt under the laws of the United States, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as provided by law. The word "property," as used in this article and section, is hereby declared to include moneys, credits, bonds, stocks, dues, franchises, and all other matters and things, real, personal, and mixed, capable of private ownership; provided, that property used for free public libraries and free museums, growing crops, property used exclusively for public schools, and such as may belong to the United States, this State, or to any county or municipal corporation within this State, shall be exempt from taxation. The Legislature may provide, except in case of credits secured by mortgage or trust deed, for a deduction from credits of debts due to bona fide residents of this State.

AMENDMENT NUMBER EIGHT.

ASSEMBLY CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT No. 31.

A resolution to propose to the people of the State of California an amendment to section seven (7) of article nine (IX) of the Constitution of the State of California, by increasing the number of members constituting the State Board of Education, by adding thereto the President and Professor of Pedagogics of the University of California.

Section 7. The Governor, the Superintendent of Public Instruction, the President of the University of California and the Professor of Pedagogy therein, and the Principals of the State Normal Schools, shall constitute the State Board of Education, and shall compile, or cause to be compiled, and adopt, a uniform series of text-books for use in the common schools throughout the State. The State Board may cause such text-books, when adopted, to be printed and published by the Superintendent of State Printing, at the State Printing Office, and when so printed and published, to be distributed and sold at the cost price of printing, publishing and distributing the same. The text-books so adopted shall continue in use not less than four years; and said State Board shall perform such other duties as may be prescribed by law. The Legislature shall provide for a Board of Education in each county in the State. The County Superintendents and the County Boards of Education shall have control of the examination of teachers and the granting of teachers' certificates within their respective jurisdictions.

AMENDMENT NUMBER NINE.

SENATE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT No. 20.

An Act to submit to the people of the State of California an amendment to section twenty-three of article four of the Constitution of the State of California.

Section 23. The members of the Legislature shall receive, in full payment for their services, the sum of one thousand ($1,000) dollars, and mileage not to exceed ten cents per mile, and for contingent expenses not to exceed twenty-five dollars, for each session, to be paid out of the public treasury. No increase in compensation or mileage shall take effect during the term for which the members of either house shall have been elected, and the pay of no attache shall be increased after he is elected or appointed.

NOW THEREFORE, Pursuant to the provisions of the Constitution, and an Act of the Legislature entitled "An Act to provide for the submission of proposed amendments to the Constitution of the State of California to the qualified electors for their approval," approved March 7, A. D., 1883, viz.:

"Section 1. Whenever the Legislature shall propose any amendment or amendments to the Constitution of this State, which amendment or amendments shall have been passed in the manner and form required by section one of article eighteen of the Constitution, and no other mode is provided by law for the submission of such amendment or amendments to the people for their approval, it shall be the duty of the Governor to advertise such proposed amendment or amendments in at least four newspapers of general circulation in this State, for three months next preceding the next general election. One of said newspapers must be published at the city of Sacramento, and two at the city of San Francisco; and in issuing his proclamation for an election at which any amendment or amendments to the Constitution are to be voted upon, he shall include such amendment or amendments therein, and he shall designate them by numbers, in the order in which they have been proposed."

The said amendments are submitted to be separately voted upon by ballot by the qualified electors of the State, on Tuesday, November 6, A. D. 1894.

Each ballot used at such election must contain, printed thereon, the words:

Assembly Constitutional Amendment Number Eight.	Yes. / No.
Senate Constitutional Amendment Number Fourteen.	Yes. / No.
Assembly Constitutional Amendment Number Seven.	Yes. / No.
Assembly Constitutional Amendment Number Twelve.	Yes. / No.
Senate Constitutional Amendment Number Seventeen.	Yes. / No.
Senate Constitutional Amendment Number Seven.	Yes. / No.
Senate Constitutional Amendment Number Sixteen.	Yes. / No.
Assembly Constitutional Amendment Number Thirty-one.	Yes. / No.
Senate Constitutional Amendment Number Twenty.	Yes. / No.

Witness my hand and the Great Seal of the State, affixed at Sacramento, the day and year first above written.

[SEAL] H. H. MARKHAM,
Governor.

Religious Services.

Rev. S. W. Albone will conduct services until further notice as follows: Lone Pine 11 a. m.; Georges Creek, 2:30 p. m.; Independence, 7 p. m.

Sunday Schools, Fort and Lone Pine 10 a. m.; Independence, 2 p. m.

Mrs. T. Richards of Lone Pine visited Independence today.

P. H. Mack Esq. and O. I. Mairs got back from Los Angeles on Monday.

F. E. Densmore Esq. and J. W. Murphy arrived home from the borax marsh in Salt Wells Valley on Tuesday.

Mrs. C. W. McGinness and little daughter arrived at Independence Wednesday evening. Mr. McGinness is the local Weather Bureau Observer.

Pat Clinton came in from Cerro Gordo yesterday to purchase supplies for use in his mining contract with the Newton Company. He returned today.

Chas. Brown of Brown & Wills, abstractors, left on Tuesday morning for a visit to San Francisco. From there he will go to his old home in Missouri for a short stay.

This office completed the job of printing and binding the Inyo County Great Register yesterday. It contains 1090 names which is more than any register printed since 1879.

The Harmony Orchestra will give a social dance on the evening of the day when the match race between Gold Piece and Sagebrush comes off. Full particulars next week.

Mr. and Mrs. J. R. Moffett of Lone Pine were in town yesterday. They were accompanied by Miss Moffett, a niece of Mr. Moffett and Miss Yager of Los Angeles, who are visiting with them.

Judge Davidson, Henry Levy and Sam Gruber are back from the sulphur baths. Levy says about half the cusidness is out of him, which speaks wonders for the springs.

Rev. C. L. Logan will lecture at the Church here this evening and at Big Pine Saturday evening. The subject of his talk will be "Rome's Attack on the Public School and Sectarian Appropriation.

Mrs J. C. Irwin accompanied by her daughter, Miss Nettie, started for San Francisco yesterday morning. She will visit with relatives in San Louis Obispo County, from there going to ElPaso Texas, where she has a sister living.

The voting supplies for Keeler, Cerro Gordo, Darwin, Panamint and Olancha, will be forwarded to Keeler by a special messenger this evening, in time to catch the stages for the outlying precincts. Negligence of the printers in San Francisco is the cause of the trouble.

Judge Davidson met with a painful and severe accident while at the Sulphur Springs last week. He was going out for a walk when the crust over a boiling spring broke through and one of his feet was badly scalded. He has been confined to his bed ever since his return.

There was quite an exciting foot-race at Independence last Saturday between Ed. Ober and Bert. Campbell. The former won in fast time. Ober stands ready to match any man in the world seventy-five yards. If any stranger can come here with his own money to back him, and beat Ed. Ober, he can win at least ten thousand dollars.

EVA L. MCGEE.
Teacher,

In The List.

In its report of the races of the 6th Agricultural District at Los Angeles the Breeder and Sportsman contains the following:

"At one o'clock Chas. Durfee, behind the handsome McKinney colt, Osito, appeared, accompanied by a running mate. He was to attempt to lower his record of 2:34, and on the first attempt did so, trotting the mile in 2:30 without making a skip. Osito is owned by I. H. Mulholland of Independence, Inyo County. The dam of Osito was by Othello (he by Sultan, out of Atlanta, by the Moor); second dam by George M. Patchen Jr. He is only a two-year-old, but every one who has seen him move has no hesitancy in saying that 2:20 will be his mark as a three-year-old".

The Index calls upon its personal friends to vote for Grove L. Johnson for Congress. It says in so many words, if you desire to advance Mr. Craig's political preferment, vote for Grove L. Johnson. On Mr. Craig's return from the Republican State Convention he intimated that in the event of Mr. Estee's election he would be rewarded with a "fat" place. This explains the "redhot" political issue of the Index this week. Mr. Craig does this to show his friend Boss Burns that he is worthy of his hire. Mr. Craig has told his friends that when Burns was in jail under the charge of embezzling public funds he sent for him. He assisted the Republican Boss and now expects to be remembered. We make this statement to show the self interest the Index had in its issue of this week. Hon. A. Caminetti, is a candidate for re-election to Congress, a position which he has twice held. He has a clear record on public events, with which every voter in Inyo county is just as familiar as we are. No eulogy of him is therefore necessary. We have no political aspirations, hence do not seek it as a personal favor to have Mr. Caminetti re-elected. Mr. Johnson did not consider the interests of the Eastern Slope worthy of his attention, consequently he has never visited this section. He is content to consider our needs through Boss Barns, who will be addressed by his friend Mr. Craig. You have all met Mr. Caminetti, and heard him express his views. He has been here twice, and knows our county and its needs. In the past he has effected legislation that has been greatly beneficial to us. There are many people in Owens Valley who have desert land entries. Many of these would have been lost but for the timely Act of Congress which Mr. Caminetti succeeded in passing extending the time of all entries one year, and these people who have been benefited, Republicans and Democrats, will remember this act on election day. Mr. Caminetti has been the best friend in Congress the miners ever had. His vote and influence always was, and always will be, on the side of the friends of silver. In voting for Mr. Caminetti next Tuesday the elector is not swayed by promises which a man whom he has never met makes through a man whom he does know to represent a political machine, but votes for an honorable gentleman, with whose record he is familiar, whose hand he clasped, who has esteemed our needs sufficiently to visit a distant country, sparsely populated, that he may know that a part of the District which he will represent in Congress does not lie in Africa or some other part of the world. The vote of Inyo county will cut no figure in the election of a Congressman, but we can show our appreciation of one who has served us materially, and who will still farther assist us by securing appropriations to irrigate our desert lands, by voting for Hon. A. Caminetti.

A Few Notes From Southern Inyo.

Owens Lake is now lower than it has been for eight or nine years. The shore line has receded two hundred feet this season.

The Soda Company will furnace several hundred tons of soda as soon as a supply of wood can be obtained.

Mr. W. M. Elliott and Mr. John Johnson, of Carson and Reno respectively, have finished the masonry and brick work on the soda furnace and will leave for their homes about the 5th of November.

Mrs. A. J. Church and child are visiting friends in Keeler and will return to Hawthorne in a few days with her husband, engineer Church.

It is rumored that the force of miners at the Reddy mine at Darwin will be cut down on the first of November to a few men, probably three or four. The mining outlook continues favorable there.

Mr. R. J. Laws visited Keeler on a tour of inspection last Monday, and found everything satisfactory as usual.

Pat. Clinton has secured a contract to sink the Newtown shaft, at Cerro Gordo, one hundred feet deeper, and is having a carload of timbers hauled up the hill by Horace Elder's team of Lone Pine. Mr. Gus Stecker, of Independence, will do the carpenter work for Mr. Clinton.

Mrs. Wrinkle and three children had a very narrow escape from being injured in a runaway accident last Sunday while returning from Lone Pine. One of the lines became unbuckled or broken and the team started to run away and ran quite a distance, when one of her sons managed to turn the horses off the road by the aid of the remaining line and stopped them in the sage brush.

Henry Glade, of Independence, is at present driving delivery wagon for Boland's store.

Mrs. W. M. Richards received a telegram last Friday saving her sister, Mrs. B. Epperson, of Red Bluff, had been stricken with paralysis of the right side. She staried for that place on Saturday's train.

A Halloween party was given at Mrs. A. C. Harvey's, of Lone Pine, Tuesday night. A large crowd was present and all expressed themselves as having had an enjoyable time.

Mrs. A. L. Boland, of Keeler, is visiting friends in Lone Pine this week.

It is rumored that a millinery and dressmaking store will soon be opened in Keeler by Mrs. A. L. Boland and Mrs. W. M. Richards, under the firm name of Boland & Richards.

J. J. Moore was interviewing the voters of this section yesterday and returned to Independence Thursday.

Mr. P. Martin, father-in-law of J. J. Welch proprietor of the boarding house at Inyo, left for San Francisco Tuesday.

A large match box of fancy marble and design was raffled in John Barnes' hotel one day this week, Mr. J. Fiehman holding the lucky number, forty-two. The box was made by Mr. C. E. Little of Inyo who is an artist in the business. More anon.

DICK.

A Good Man.

Every thinking voter in the 60th Assembly District should vote for Rev J. G. Smith, the Populist nominee. He is an honorable Christian gentleman, a man whom the railroad corporations, through their agent, Boss Burns, cannot control. With the election of Mr. Smith the people of the 60th District may rest assured that M. H. DeYoung will receive one vote less for U. S. Senator. Mr. Smith is a populist, as he himself says "first, last and all the time". The Democratic party has endoased him, because it is not hidebound, and can recognize merit under whatever name it may be found. Every man who does not believe in political trickery and railroad monopoly should vote for J. G. Smith.

The following is from the pen of the ablest journalist in California; a man whom corporate greed or political influence never could control: a Republican in principle, and a fearless, honorable and just man—Arthur McEwen.

"Mr. Estee is a perfect type of the sort of candidate the Southern Pacific loves. He is a frayed and shabby political hack, who has been on his knees to the corporation for twelve years, begging forgiveness for the crime of running for governor in 1882 on an anti-monopoly platform. Stanford never did forgive him, though Mr. Estee took the stump for him four years ago, and at the Wigwam here, while the modest president of the Southern Pacific sat on the stage, troweled him with flattery. Mr. Estee has kept company with the railroad people, gone to national conventions with Creed Haymond and Fred Crocker, and been careful since 1882 to avoid offense. For his repentance of his course in 1882 Mr. Estee merits contempt. During most of the dozen intervening years I have written mine freely. His desire for an office is not an ambition, but an appetite—a disease. He has been "mentioned" for office so often and so long as to have made himself a jest. It is this appetite that has degraded him. Originally Estee was a good deal of a man, mentally and in character, but the hunger for office has induced him to be everything to everybody, so that he has become shifty and flabby. Were he elected, his first thought would be turned to his re-election, or his elevation to the senate. Any influence that could assure him either prize would possess him—and the Southern Pacific is a tremendous influence. To make Mr. Estee governor would be to give the governorship of California to Mr. Huntington.

Why should any Republican who is an anti-Southern Pacific man give his vote for such a result when there are two other candidates for the same office in whom Mr. Huntington has no title? I do not know Mr. Webster, the nominee of the Populists, but those who do know him, and in whose judgment I have trust, declare him to be a clear-headed, honest man, who is very much in earnest as an anti-monopolist. As to Mr. Budd, the Democratic candidate, I am able to speak from personal knowledge. Twenty years ago we were students together at the State university—roommates there—and our intimacy has never been broken. As a man I have found him to be what he was as a boy—a stalwart fellow. He is sound to the core—warm-hearted, clear-headed, strong-willed, courageous, shrewd and, being a gentleman, incapable of the betrayal of a trust, or of any dishonesty. All of Budd's instincts are manly, hearty and large. He is at once a keen man of the world and a man of heart. The enthusiasm that he rouses in his canvass is not understood by those who do not know him. The people like him because he goes about the state and lets them see him as he is. I have seen him under varied circumstances, but never other than himself. He has none of the actor's capacity to change his apparent characteristics. It is because I know Mr. Budd as a friend of half a life-time that I feel justified as a citizen in vouching for him. As governor he would be his own master. And, unless office has the power to change a man's nature, he would be a good governor, exerting all his authority to execute the laws righteously and bring Mr. Huntington to his proper level as a subject, and not a monarch, in this commonwealth. Office did not change Budd when he served in congress. There he was, as everywhere, himself, and did far better work for California than Californians as a rule—to judge from the meagre references in the Democratic press during this campaign—are grateful enough to remember. He was bold and cared little for the solemnities. Quick in debate, he made his mark in the house as a new member, and like a good politician, cared constantly for the interests of his district. But for the failure of his health he would have accepted the renomination that was offered him. Why should any citizen of California refrain from voting to make Mr. Budd governor? He is in the vigor of manhood, of unusual capacity, and of unblemished character."

CHRYSANTHEMUMS.

With summer and sun behind you,
With winter and shade before,
You crowd in your regal splendor
Through the autumn's closing door.
White as the snow that is coming,
Red as the rose that is gone,
Gold as the heart of the lilies,
Pink as the flush of the dawn.
Confident, winsome, stately,
You throng in the wane of the year,
Trooping an army with banners
When the leafless woods are sere.

Sweet in your breath as of spices
From a far sea island blown,
Chaste your robes as of vestals
Trimming their lamps alone;
Strong are your hearts and sturdy—
The life that in root and stem
Smolders and glows till it sparkles
In each flowery diadem.
Nothing of bloom and odor
Have your peerless legions lost,
Marching in fervid beauty
To challenge the death white frost.

So to the eye of sorrow
Ye bring a flicker of light;
The cheek that was wan with illness
Smiles at your faces bright.
The children laugh in greeting,
And the dear old people say,
"Here are the self same darlings
We loved in our own young day,"
As, summer and sun behind you,
Winter and shade before,
You crowd in your regal splendor
Through the autumn's closing door.
—Harper's Bazar.

A BROKEN PAROLE.

"Yes," said my friend the general, "you may boast of the forms and solemnities of your civil tribunals, of your oaths and affidavits and rigid cross examinations. What are they but retrenchments which prove that perjury is an active foe? Now in the army it is pride, not fear, that is the safeguard. The word of an officer on his honor as a soldier and a gentleman is never doubted."

"Yet an officer is human?"

"There are men and men, sir. It is a matter of education, which becomes an instinct. A soldier's word is a sacrament, and is so recognized by the army regulations."

"Oh, well, the Roman soldiers did sometimes desert their standard, turn their backs on the enemy and abandon their general. Catiline and Antony lived as well as Brutus and Scipio. Come now, did you never know an officer to break his word?

"Hum!" The general looked serious and even sad. "I do remember one case; but it was excusable, sir, most excusable. Poor young fellow, so handsome, so gallant! After all these years I can see him as he sat erect and manful on his horse, his face livid, his lips bitten, the drops of agony streaming from his brow. He was tempted beyond mortal strength and he yielded—a grievous fault, for which he woefully atoned."

"Tell me about it, pray; not as it impressed you, but from the beginning."

"From the egg to the apple, eh? You see, we old soldiers are not forgetful of our Latinity. Well, I will, though the task is a melancholy one. During one of the latter years of the rebellion I was stationed in a southern Atlantic state and had command of the outpost. On either side of us was a river; beyond these, dense morasses. In front, about seventeen miles distant, was a city, held by the enemy and filled with military stores. And twenty-five miles beyond was another hostile town. A railway ran between the rivers, and furnished communication between these two places."

"Does an outpost require any definite force?"

"No. That depends on the extent of the country to be guarded. In this instance my front covered five miles, and I had a brigade—two regiments of infantry, a regiment of cavalry and four pieces of artillery—a fine command. I also had a few men from the engineer corps, and one of these—at the peril of his life, too, for he would have been shot if captured—had drafted a topographical map of the surrounding country. From this I planned an expedition on the enemy's outpost.

"I detailed an officer of tried intrepidity, Captain Brown, to make a detour with his company to the right flank and rear. All night they marched through the swamp and impenetrable thicket, a distance of over twenty-five miles, and yet kept a reserve of strength and pluck for the morrow's fighting. It was most gallantly achieved. Meanwhile I set out two hours before daybreak with 1,500 men, marching in three columns along the three practicable roads. Everything transpired in accordance with my fondest anticipations. As soon as we engaged the enemy Captain Brown seized the bridge in their rear and advanced boldly, making a tremendous noise."

"A la Chinese?"

"The Chinese are no fools with their kettledrums, sir. Warfare is a royal game, in which finesse often wins. Captain Brown left a portion of his scanty command in the rear, which assumed the appearance of a reserve to the bewildered foe. They believed that they were surrounded and by an overwhelming force, and so they yielded. When the captain joined me we found that we had bagged a southern brigadier general, with his staff, several pieces of artillery, fifty horses, among which was a famous black stallion renowned from the James to the gulf, at least a hundred men, besides an immense quantity of military stores. We dismantled the bridge as well as we could, and then we made off, and quickly too."

"Why so?"

"Because re-enforcements had been telegraphed for to that farther city on our approach and were hurrying thither as fast as steam could urge them. We had done too well to risk a Pyrrhic victory. Well, before we started Captain Brown brought the brigadier general before me, a fine appearing fellow, splendid with new regalia.

"'I'm sorry for you, general,' I said. 'Tis the fortunes of war.'

"'Rather malignant ones for me,' he replied, with a grim smile. I had just won my star. Still'——

"'We will make your comfort our pleasure,' I protested. 'If you and your staff will give me your parole you shall know no restraint.' He laid his hand on his sword. 'No, no!' I continued. 'Keep your side arms and your horses.'

"'I pledge you my word on my honor as an officer and a gentleman that I will not attempt to escape,' said the captive chieftain, and so likewise repeated each one of his staff.

"'Tis sufficient, gentlemen,' I replied. 'We must now ride briskly to camp.'

"At this juncture Captain Brown advanced with another prisoner, who had been held by his reserve guard.

"'Good God, Macrane,' exclaimed the brigadier, 'did they take you? My poor fellow, how unfortunate, how terrible!'

"'Yes, general. The clergyman had just finished his prayer. I had just kissed my wife for the first time,' said the young officer as he sat erect and soldierly, as I have recalled him, but the personification of despair.

"His commander looked at me wistfully, as if tempted to make intercession. Then his face grew stern. 'Tis the fortunes of war,' he repeated bitterly. 'Give your parole, Macrane.'

"The young officer placed his hand on his sword, but threateningly. He glanced about him. There was no lane of escape through the masses of blue.

"'I pledge my word, on my honor as an officer and a gentleman, that I will not attempt to escape,' he said, and as he spoke his face grew even more ashen.

"'En avant, messieurs,' and away we rode.

"After a little I beckoned Captain Brown to me and talked with him apart.

"'Where did you get this Macrane, captain?' I asked. 'He wasn't with the others.'

"'No indeed, general. It's quite a story, and I wish for one that it hadn't happened. Last evening, just after sunset, as we were winding our way through the swamp, some times sinking waist deep, as you may judge from the appearance of my men, we came unexpectedly upon solid ground and a clearing. Before us stretched evident signs of civilization. We cautiously advanced through what had once been a well ordered plantation and neared an old fashioned, wide spread mansion, comfortable with the out houses about it, like a hen with her brood.

"'The house was aglow with light and the air wafted from it fragrant with flowers. At the rear a lot of negroes were peering so intently through the blinds as not to notice us. I led a file of my men stealthily along the broad veranda and stationed them by the open windows on the front and side. I gazed into the parlor. There was an affecting sight. The company was gathered together, mostly of women, and aged ones too. Every head was bowed.

"Opposite to me stood a gray haired clergyman, his trembling hands spread in benediction over the heads of a young couple kneeling before him—a Confederate officer in full rig and as fair a girl as I have ever seen. The prayer ended. The happy pair arose and embraced. Friends flocked around them in congratulation. I stepped forward with revolver in hand, and as I did so a soldier advanced through each window and stood as motionless as a statue of fate.

"'"You must surrender!" I cried as I covered Macrane.

"'There was an agonizing scream. The sweet faced bride sank senseless in her husband's arms, restraining him through her clinging from any rash resistance. Ah, it was pitiable, but what could I do, and what could he do? Despite the wailing, the entreaty, the awful malediction, I led him away. He never spoke. I heard his voice for the first time just now, when he gave his parole. And, general, I have been sorry ever since. Though I'm proud of our success, I wish that this raid had never occurred.'

"'Tut, tut, man,' I remonstrated, 'you are nipped and fagged out, and no wonder. Get a good night's rest and you'll be far less morbid. Warfare at best is an unspeakable horror, but we must keep our eyes fixed on the glorious goal of peace and not heed the specters that throng the path way.'

"The captain saluted and withdrew to his post, but I could see that he was dejected and distressed. A brave heart is ever a tender one. On we rode. Our way led us past a crossroad which sprang from a wood. There was a slight elevation to its left and this presented a startling spectacle to us. A young woman, clad in white, with a long veil floating in disorder about her, and with orange blossoms still clinging to her dark tresses, all disheveled, was watching our approach intently, with hand shading her eyes.

"By her side, supporting her and seemingly dissuading her stay, was an aged man, whose venerable locks strayed from his shoulders like another veil. As our captive brigadier general and staff pranced by they exchanged anxious glances and gallantly doffed their caps. By no look or gesture did the young woman heed their courtesy. But when Macrane appeared by the side of Captain Brown, with bowed head and melancholy bearing, then a clear, thrilling note penetrated the air:

"'Ralph, Ralph! Oh, my husband!'

"Quick struck the spurs, and away to her side dashed the young officer. I saw him bend tenderly over her. I saw her face light with hope, with rapture. Their lips met and lingered, and then Macrane joined us transfigured, for his cheeks were glowing and his eyes were a sparkle. His bride, yielding to the urgency of her companion and upheld by him, disappeared within the windings of the wood."

My friend, the general, paused and puffed thoughtfully on his cigar.

"I suppose you anticipate the sequel and wonder why I didn't suspect," he observed.

"Naturally."

"Well, I am looking back, and the light now is very clear. The lamp of the future has its forward slide closed, you know, and even what we see we do not comprehend. Besides, Macrane had given his parole, and its sancity was a shield from shameful conjecture. I thought he had whispered some cheer of a speedy exchange, which would have been realized, too, had I but had a chance for intercession. But to continue. When we reached our camp the paroles were reduced to writing by the adjutant and signed by the respective prisoners, and after this formality was concluded we considered them our guests.

"The different members of the staff were allotted to different ones of my officers for entertainment, Macrane continuing with Captain Brown, while I made the brigadier my especial charge. And well they all fared, you may be sure. I knew their leader did, for after an elaborate dinner, of which my colored boy never thereafter ceased to boast, as he toasted 'better days' in a glass of champagne he gravely remarked that it was the first time he had dined since the outbreak of the war.

"He meant it, too, poor fellow; even the most distinguished southern officers were forced to content themselves with a Spartan fare, and scanty at that—a fact which should mitigate our indignation over the privations which our captured soldiers endured.

"It was early the next morning that Captain Brown came to my quarters pale and anxious.

"'General,' he said, 'Lieutenant Macrane is missing. He has escaped.'

"'Escaped! Impossible! Why, he gave his parole.'

"'He has broken it, sir; there can be no doubt about it. The black stallion is also gone.'

"The famous black stallion which I had ordered picketed apart, and on which I had hoped to witch the world with my noble horsemanship! How vexatious! For a moment my vanity made me oblivious of what had really happened; but for a moment only.

"'When did you miss Macrane?' I asked sharply.

"'Last evening, sir.'

"'Then why didn't you report his absence at once to me?'

"'I didn't have the heart, sir. I'——

"'Stop, Captain Brown. Not another word or I shall be compelled to demand your sword, sir. I understand—that is, I would understand were I not bound to ignore my suspicions on account of your gallant conduct yesterday. Take a file of men, surround that old mansion and do your utmost to recapture the fugitive. Be as vigilant as you have been remiss.'

"'General, you may depend on me.'

"He hastened away. I soon heard the tramp of the men announcing his departure. But his mission proved fruitless, as I believed it would. At noon Captain Brown returned and reported that he had approached the house stealthily and thrown a cordon about it; that no living sight or sound greeted him. The outhouses were empty, the chimneys smokeless, the windows boarded, the mansion abandoned.

"When I reported this escapade to the brigadier he looked both chagrined and relieved.

"'I am mortified of course,' he said, 'but not as indignant as I ordinarily would be at such a breach of faith. I can't help it. My sensibilities applaud even while my judgment condemns. They were so very fond of each other. They had been lovers since they were little children, and had wandered hand and hand through this woodland like Paul and Virginia. Agnes—that is the girl's name, God bless her, I love her as my daughter—is an orphan and practically homeless.

"'Their marriage had been the plan and dream of months, and had at length seemed feasible. For while, of course, we had heard of you, general, and warningly, we did not anticipate so daring a foray. Poor Macrane! He was crazed with despair. Had the foul fiend offered him freedom in exchange for his soul he would have jumped at the bargain.'

"'Ah, I thought to myself, 'the foul fiend did tempt and the unfortunate young man did yield. Too late will he learn that the stains of dishonor are indelible.'

"Time passed by rapidly, as it always does in warfare. Perhaps it is the presence of death that makes it so fleet. The brigadier was exchanged. Whether he satisfactorily explained his capture so soon after promotion I never heard. The following spring brought me on official business to the fortress, which was the department headquarters. As I concluded the matters required of me the general commanding said: 'By the way, we have had a curious courtmartial case here lately, concerning which you must know something.'

"'What is that, pray?'

"'A young southern officer has just been tried and condemned as a spy. His name is Ralph Macrane.'

"'Macrane! A spy!'

"'Yes, he was captured leading his men in a desperate—a forlorn charge. 'Tis a marvel he was taken alive. He seemed to court death. No wonder, though, he must have appreciated the consequences of arrest. He had broken his parole and returned to open warfare, and you know that this rendered him liable to be treated as a spy under the articles of war of every civilized nation, and I suppose the confederacy is as much civilized as it is a nation.'

"'Yes, but'——

"'Oh I know. You will claim that they were extraordinary and mitigating circumstances; that private matters and not fanaticism were the cause of his dishonorable conduct. So I thought at first; but nothing of the sort. We were about sending for you when he saved us from further trouble, and uncertainty, too, by openly avowing that he gave you his parole with the deliberate design of breaking it; that he had used his eyes to an advantage while at your camp, and had furnished valuable information to our enemy. You had a sharp engagement three days after his escape, did you not?'

"'Yes, indeed. Almost a surprise.'

"'It would have been a complete surprise for any officer except you,' said the department commander graciously. 'Well, he admitted that the tidings he brought were the cause of it.'

"'Impossible! The villain!'

"'Ah, you see. After this what could we do but condemn him. Our findings have been approved, and he dies tomorrow at daybreak.'

"Here my friend the general paused again and puffed as if his cigar was a true consoler.

"'I don't like your articles of war,' I protested. 'They are a Procrustean bed in which one is either hewed or stretched. I can easily imagine how a heedless young man who broke his parole but gave no comfort nor assistance to the enemy might be condemned unjustly.'

"Had such been the case Macrane undoubtedly would have been reprieved, but he pleaded guilty. And I believe even in your civil tribunal the judge dons the black cap when this occurs. No, no; the articles of war are blameless. They could not provide against the agony of a bruised heart. Despite my horror at his conduct, from a sudden impulse I asked the commander if I could see the condemned. He acquiesced at once and sent me to him under direction of his orderly.

"I shall never forget the expression of the young officer's face as I entered. He was standing by a small grated window gazing up into the western skies all radiant with the glories of sunset. That look so ethereal, so exalted, was so pitiable in the intensity of its yearning that the tears coursed down my cheeks as I spoke.

"'Macrane, Macrane!' I cried. 'What have you done? Why have you destroyed yourself?' He turned. He grasped my hand. He smiled. And my tears gushed forth anew.

"'Agnes is dead,' he said.

"'You never played the spy. You never betrayed my post,' I protested.

"'She is dead,' he repeated. 'My fair one, and we were so happy together. I sought death at the head of my command and it fled from me. Yet even through its escape shall I find it again.'

"'It shall not be.'

"'Goodby, general. I reiterate my treachery to you. And remember, too, that tomorrow I shall go to my death as blithely as I rode to my bride on the fiery black stallion through the mazes of the woodland, for there also she awaits me.'

"He turned once more to the window, and in the ruddy glow of the sunset, which always seems a pledge of returning day, I saw him for the last time. What could I do? I had no proof. My suspicions would be laughed to scorn. After a sleepless night an hour before dawn I mounted my horse and rode rapidly from the fortress. Yet, just as the east was repeating the glow of the west and announcing the beneficent promises fulfilled, I heard the sharp crack of musketry, and I knew that Macrane once more had been faithful to his tryst.

"'Twas the fortune of war,' quoth my friend the general, 'for love is the conflict in which the vanquished never breaks his parole.'"—New York Times.

READING TEETH.

"Character and temperament may be as clearly and as easily read in the teeth of a man or woman," said an expert the other day," as the attributes are shown in the expression of the eye or the form of the head. In persons of bilious temperament, for example," the expert said, "the teeth have a strongly marked bronze yellow hue, and they are large in form and inclined to be angular, and their length exceeds their breadth. The surface of the teeth shows transverse ridges, is slightly translucent, and abounds in strong lines. The teeth in such persons are always firmly set, close together, and well-locked, and the gum margins are heavy and firm and angular in outline. The hard palate ridges are heavy and drugged and squarely set. The man or woman of confident nature," the expert continued, "has translucent cream-yellow teeth, well proportioned, and abounding in curved and rounded lines, with rounded cutting edges. The surface of such teeth is fairly brilliant in lustre, is smooth, with translucent cutting edges and rounded depressions and elevations. The articulation of such teeth is moderately firm, and it is noted that the jaw has a tendency to rotate in masticating. The gum margins are round and full, both in respect to length and breadth, and the palate ridges are numerous, graceful in outline, and well rounded. You can invariably tell the active, nervous, temperament by the pearl grey or greyish translucence of the teeth. The length of the teeth in a nervous person predominates over the breadth, and the cutting edges are both fine and long.

The surface of the teeth is both brilliant and transparent, and the impressions and elevations abound in long curves. The articulation of such teeth is long and very penetrating, and the gum margins are delicate and shapely, and marked by oval curves, while the palate ridges are close, not numerous, and small and long in form. In other words, the mouth of the nervous tempered person is adorned with the ideal of perfect teeth. Last comes the slow-going person whose temperament the doctors class as lymphatic. You can spot the teeth of such persons by their opaque or muddy color, and by their large and unsightly form, and their breadth exceeds their length always. In such persons the surface of the incisors is unmarked by the usual depressions and elevations, and they are opaque in finish, even at the cutting edges. Such teeth are flat and loose in articulation, the gum margins are thick and irregular in shape, and the palate ridges are sparse and flat. They are the poorest kind of teeth."

A CROP REPORT.

We clip the following good yarn from an exchange: A western man, proud of his immensely productive acres, was showing a visitor from Vermont over his farm, and, while boasting somewhat loudly of his own crops, turned upon the Vermonter with the question: "You can't raise much back there on those stony Vermont hills, can you?" "Oh, yes; we generally get fine crops." But you don't raise much grain, do you? "Oh, yes; we raise a sight of barley." "You do?" "Why certainly; I don't know what our farmers would do if it wasn't for their barley. "Do you get much for it? "Oh, we don't sell it; no, sir; we don't sell a grain of it." "You don't feed it to your stock?" "Oh, no; you don't catch us wasting barley like that!" "Well, what do you do with it, then? "Why, man, we have every grain of it for seed—that's what we do with it!" This is the western man's story.

Rev. R. C. Cave delivered an address before the ex-Confederate Historical and Benevolent Association at St. Louis last week, in the course of which he said: "We are willing to let the war die as a political issue, but in as a truth of history we can afford to bury it. To the Northern man who seeks to frighten us into silence there can be but one answer. Whatever rights the South surrendered at Appomattox they never surrendered the right to speak the truth and preserve the honor and memory of the Southern dead."

THE LAND OF PROMISE

Is the mighty West, the land that "tickled with a hoe laughs a harvest;" the El Dorado of the miner; the goal of the agricultural emigrant. While it teems with all the elements of wealth and prosperity, some of the fairest and most fruitful portions of it bear a harvest of malaria reaped in its fullness by those unprotected by a medicinal safeguard. No one seeking or dwelling in a malarial locality is safe from the scourge without Hostetter's Stomach Bitters. Emigrants, bear this in mind. Commercial travelers sojourning in malarious regions should carry a bottle of the Bitters in the traditional gripsack. Against the effects of exposure, mental or bodily overwork, damp and unwholesome food or water, it is an infallible defense. Constipation, rheumatism, billiousness, dyspepsia, nervousness and loss of strength are all remedied by this genial restorative.

People are usually willing to do their duty, but they do not like to do too much of it.

A PRACTICAL MAN.

Of all the practical men of whom America is justly proud no one holds a higher place than the late Cyrus W. Field. His son shows that he has inherited the shrewd common sense of the man who laid the Atlantic cable. He writes:

Several times this winter I have suffered from severe colds on my lungs. Each time I have applied ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS, and in every instance I have been quickly relieved by applying one across my chest and one on my back. My friends, through my advice, have tried the experiment and also found it most successful. I feel that I can recommend them most highly to any one who may see fit to try them.

TAKE STEPS

in time, if you are a sufferer from that scourge of humanity known as consumption, and you can be cured. There is the evidence of hundreds of living witnesses to the fact that, in all its early stages, consumption is a curable disease. Not every case, but a large percentage of cases, and we believe, fully 98 per cent. are cured by Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, even after the disease has progressed so far as to induce repeated bleedings from the lungs, severe lingering cough with copious expectoration (including tubercular matter), great loss of flesh and extreme emaciation and weakness.

Do you doubt that hundreds of such cases reported to us as cured by "Golden Medical Discovery" were genuine cases of that dread and fatal disease? You need not take our word for it. They have, in nearly every instance, been so pronounced by the best and most experienced home physicians, who have no interest whatever in misrepresenting them, and who were often strongly prejudiced and advised against a trial of "Golden Medical Discovery," but who have been forced to confess that it surpasses, in curative power over this fatal malady, all other medicines with which they are acquainted. Nasty cod-liver oil and its filthy "emulsions" and mixtures, had been tried in nearly all these cases and had either utterly failed to benefit, or had only seemed to benefit a little for a short time. Extract of malt, whiskey, and various preparations of the hypophosphites had also been faithfully tried in vain.

The photographs of a large number of those cured of consumption, bronchitis, lingering coughs, asthma, chronic nasal catarrh and kindred maladies, have been skillfully reproduced in a book of 160 pages which will be mailed to you, on receipt of address and six cents in stamps. You can then write to those who have been cured and profit by their experience.

Pardee's Remedy,
THE GREAT CURE
—FOR—INDIGESTION
and Constipation.
A Regulator of the Liver and Kidneys

A SPECIFIC FOR Scrofula, Rheumatism,
Salt Rheum, Neuralgia,
And all other Blood and Skin Diseases.

It is a positive cure for all those Painful, Delicate Complaints and complicated troubles and Weaknesses common among our Wives, Mothers and Daughters.

This remedy has been used in the hospitals throughout the old world for the past twenty-five years, as a specific for the above diseases, and it has and will cure when other so-called remedies fail.

The effect is immediate and lasting. Two or three doses of DR. PARDEE'S REMEDY taken daily keeps the blood cool, the liver and kidneys active, and will entirely eradicate from the system all traces of Scrofula, Salt Rheum, or any other form of blood diseases.

WHIPPING IN RUSSIA.

A Means of Moral Improvement in the Empire.

SOME EXTRAORDINARY INCIDENTS.

The Lash Used Indiscriminately for all Sorts of Purposes on the Bodies of the Lower Classes.

Very few people believe the stories of whipping in Russia. They are called "travelers' tales," and "newspaper inventions," or at least "gross exaggerations." The special correspondent of one of the great London dailiers lately received instructions to personally investigate the truth of the matter, and from his voluminous report I send you the following:

He begins by asserting that the "entire Russian people feel a perpetual hankering after the birch rod and the knout." In olden times, no doubt, it was so. The Slav peoples of bygone ages felt a weakness for the rod and a strong affection for him who wielded it. Whenever the boundaries of a field, an estate or a district were to be marked off, the method in vogue was this: A number of boys were taken to the boundary mark, which was generally a mound or a hill, and told to note it well, walking around and over it. Then the little urchins were undressed and flogged unmercifully on the mound to within an inch of their lives. That impressed the scene on their memory, and they ever after remembered that spot. Some years ago, at Moscow, in the course of a lawsuit about the ownership of certain acres of land, one of the witnesses, a hoary old Lithuanian, deposed: "The Leitis Hill is the boundary. I was flogged on the place as a boy."

The upper classes are exempt from flogging in Russia, but only the upper with a large "U." Government officials of a certain rank are liable to receive the rod for remissness, and here is a recent case: An ex-official was flogged in Poltara last March. Eight years ago he was exiled to Siberia for something, which he did or left undone. But he never reached his destination; having given the slip to his Cossack escort on the high road, he returned in safety to Jitomir, near Kieff, became a lawyer and yet a very honest man. His services were in constant demand, especially among the poorer classes, whose cause he defended always ably and often successfully. One day, however, his identity was discovered, and he was condemned, although an old man of sixty-eight years, to receive forty lashes and to be sent back to Siberia.

Flogging, however, is no longer seriously regarded as a punisment in Russia; it is one of the privileges of the lower classes—a sort of sacramental means of receiving political grace. This view was brought into strong relief during the trial of a number of peasants the other day for taking part in riots during the cholera epidemic. On being asked what they had to say to the charge, one of the prisoners raively replied: "We were all flogged for it already, your honor, so perhaps you might let us go now." "Oh, as to flogging," remarked the presiding judge, "that was merely a salutary measure adopted on the spot for your own good. The punishment for your revolt has yet to come."

This is the way a St. Petersburg paper describes the process: "Instead of taking place, as formerly, in a private room, the "patient" is laid down in the public street and whipped in presence of his family and of the men, women and children of his village. The elder and the secretary (chief officials of the town or village), drive up and administer the first two strokes, which are understood to be the most vigorous and cutting of all. Such spectacles delight the village children. Into their scanty repertoire of rural games a new one has now been introduced—the game of flogging, in which the whole procedure of their elders is rehearsed with a fidelity of modern realism."

Every petty town or village in Russia is ruled by its elder and secretary or peasant chiefs, and these men have no other discipline except the rod. "What are you generally flogged for?" a peasant was asked the other day. "For everything you do or don't do," was the reply; "for lying, for speaking the truth, and for keeping silence; for not being punctual in paying the taxes, for not uncovering our heads when a 'peasant chief' passes—I couldn't tell you all the reasons."

In the government of Smolensk the peasants refused, some time ago, to assemble and discuss some communal questions. They were officially summoned to appear in the government house (a larger kind of hut), but, contrary to the rule, were not told on what business they were wanted. Seventeen of them responded to the invitation, and, instead of the eighteenth, a young lad came as the representative of his father, who was ill. As soon as they were all inside the key was turned in the door. "Now, what might this be for?" cried one of the rustics. "For a sound flogging," was the answer. "But you've no right! The law says you must first give us notice! We won't lie down!" shouted the peasants in chorus. "Then you'll get a double allowance—that's all," said the elder.

One of the oldest of the "patients" then addressed his fellows in affliction: "Brothers, let us strip. It's no use fighting with fate." "Who'll lie down first?" was the next question. "I will, if you like," replied the same speaker; "it's all one whether I get the stripes first or last. We'll all get the same number." And, screwing his courage to the sticking place, he divested himself of his superfluous garments and lay down.

The thunder boomed and the hail rattled outside, and every now and again a dazzling flash of lightning illumined the pitch-dark hut, revealing the naked human back with its long red marks, the ruddy beard of the convulsed form on the ground, the scared crowd cowering close to the walls of this chamber of horror and crossing themselves piously or moaning piteously, the smart figure of the executioner wielding the lash with the self-complacency of a consummate artist, and the ironical smile of the conceited secretary. The group composing this scene of flogging by lightning light was well worthy of the brush of Verestchagin.

Suddenly there was a tumult among the villagers. First a hum, then a chorus of angry voices, and during a momentary pause a shrill, thin, boyish voice was heard: "I won't lie down! I'm not a man. I didn't do nothing!" "Which of the devils brought you here, then, you young imp?" asked the secretary. "Father sent me; he's in bed; he has a pain and can't get up, and he said I must come and tell you. If I'd known it was for a flogging I would not have come at all." "Off with your clothes this moment!" "Oh, please, do let me off," pleaded the boy. "Come, come; make no row, but lie down. It's all one, you or your father. We've no time to hunt him up." And the trembling lad had to submit to his fate. His father had eaten sour grapes and his young teeth were set on edge with a vengeance. At last the "operation" was completed, and the "patients" left the room with bruised bodies, muttering the Russian equivalent of the Hebrew question, "Is there no balm in Gilead?" They finally found some in a neighboring tavern, where, as the Russian saying, picturesquely puts it, they "drank themselves into blue devils," and "Morn, wak'd by the circling hours," met them reeling to their huts.

So much about the place where the "patient" has to be treated for his moral or political disorders. As to the time, there would appear to be no limits or restrictions, as the following tragi-comical instance tends to show.

In the government of Kursk a peasant lately presented a petition in the Holy Orthodox Consistory asking the reverend and right reverend members of that august body to use their influence to prevent his being flogged on a Sunday. The memorial set forth that he had been arrested a fortnight before and flogged for no reason whatever. On inquiring why he had been so badly treated he was informed that the punishment had been inflicted by mistake, but that the "right fellow" would now get it "all the hotter."

He then complained to the authorities and was flogged again for daring to do so, and once more on a Sunday. He would now humbly request the consistory to take measures to prevent flogging on Sundays, "inasmuch as our holy religion prohibits work on the Lord's day." The reply of the consistory has not yet transpired. "Some griefs are medicinable," but it is a somewhat difficult task to find an appropriate remedy for a man who has been first flogged by mistake, then flogged for objecting to it, and each time on a Sunday, when he ought to have been attired in his best clothes, escorting his wife and children to church.

Flogging, like certain religious duties which have to be fulfilled in one's parish church, can only be administered in the native village or hamlet of the "patient," and wherever he happens to be he must be conveyed to his birthplace and there corrected with the lash. Three years ago, for instance, a boy named Martin, impelled by the pangs of hunger, stole a few pounds weight of potatoes. He was condemned to receive nine strokes of the lash, but being too young at the time the sentence was not to be executed until he should come of age (i. e., 18 years). Some months later he and his father left their hamlet and traveled to the Crimea in search of work, the mother remaining at home until such time as by their joint efforts they could manage to support her. Fate at first was against them, but at the end of some two years they wrote and asked her to come, as they had found fairly profitable employment and had established a little home.

When the poor woman arrived in Yaltta and found the whereabouts of her husband she at once missed her son. "Where's Vanya?" was her first question. "He's just been arrested and taken back," answered the husband. "My God! has he broken the law again?" "No, the time for his flogging has come, and they're sending him back to our village by etape" (about eight hundred miles distant) "to give him the nine lashes he was condemned to three years ago. You see, he was eighteen years old last week." "Well, but couldn't they do that here just as well?" "I thought they could, and I begged them not to move him, as he'll lose his place, and must travel the nine hundred versts at our expense, but they said the law was the law, and they couldn't change it."—N. Y. Mail and Express.

DANCE AND BE SLIM.

Carmencita is learning to speak English. She knows several things about keeping in condition.

"If you want to have slim body, no bad, ugly fat all round, dance. If you like very little the sore face, dance. If you like it all comfort into yourself, the liver not still, the stomach not up to the belt buckle, dance. If you like very much the fire, the quick, the youth, the freshness, the good appetite, dance."

The brilliant danseuse is a living illustration of her theory. She keeps the lines of a race-horse, the freshness of her girlhood and a comfortable income by seven hours' practice a week.—N. Y. World.

SORGHUM SIRUP.

The Manufacture of a High-Grade Article.

CONSIDERABLE SKILL REQUIRED.

The Method Adopted by the Department of Agriculture Under the Direction of Mr. A. A. Denton.

With each recurring season, numerous inquiries are addressed to the Department of Agriculture at Washington, relating to the manufacture of sorghum sirup. This circular is published to answer such inquiries in a more satisfactory form than can be done in an oridnary letter. The production of a sirup molasses of good quality, free from many of the objectionable features of this product as ordinarily made, requires a considerable degree of skill on the part of the workmen. Such high-grade product can not be manufactured by the haphazard methods in vogue in many localities. In manufacture, the term "molasses" implies that the sirup resulting from the evaporation of the juice of the plant employed, has been concentrated sufficiently to cause a part of the sugar to crystallize. This sugar is removed either by drainage or by means of a centrifugal machine. The famous open-kettle molasses of Louisiana is usually separated by drainage. From these statements it may be seen that the sorghum product so often called "molasses" should be termed "sirup." This is a distinction of some importance, since if adhered to and superior products be manufactured, sorghum sirup should gain more than local fame and be regularly listed as a standard article for the grocery trade. Experiments in the manufacture of a high-grade sorghum sirup have been made by this department, under the direction of Mr. A. A. Denton, of Sterling, Kan., and the following method has been adopted by him as capable of producing the best results:

The cold juice as it comes from the mill, is treated with sufficient cream of lime to render it slightly alkaline. Blue and red litmus papers, which can be procured from dealers in chemicals or from druggists, are employed in making the tests for alkalinity and acidity. The blue paper is reddened by an acid juice and the red paper is blued by an alkaline solution. If no red paper is at hand, it may be prepared by dipping the blue paper in unlimed juice. If sufficient lime has been added, the precipitate formed will settle to the bottom of the tank, leaving the liquid clear and bright. A test sample should be examined in a narrow white glass bottle, or in a test tube, in order to note the effect of the lime. A little experience gained by a few trials will enable one to judge with reasonable certainty the quantity of lime required. A considerable excess of lime will increase the expense of manufacture in the subsequent stages without corresponding advantage. The addition of clay is recommended to facilitate the settling of the impurities. Coarse-grained clays are not suitable for this purpose since they subside rapidly without carrying down the impurities. With very fine clays, however, the particles subside slowly. The sediment is easily disturbed in drawing off the clear liquid and turbid juices result. To be suitable for sirup manufacture the clay should contain no water soluble matter. In general it has been observed that fire clays are usually too coarse grained, the pure white clays too fine, blue clays gumbo, or waxy clays are not suitable, and that yellow or brown clays are best. The clay is added to the juice in the form of a smooth, thin batter. Experiments on a small scale, using small round bottles to permit observations of the progress of the precipitation, will soon give one the necessary experience. For the sake of economy as little lime and clay should be used as is consistent with good work.

The clear juice should be carefully drawn off from the lime and clay precipitate, when the latter has thoroughly settled. Heat the clear juice nearly to the boiling point then sufficient superphosphate of lime should be added to render it distinctly acid. This point is determined by the use of blue litmus paper, which turns red in an acid solution. A distinct change in the paper from blue should be considered an indication of sufficient superphosphate. About one gallon of superphosphate of lime is sufficient for from 400 to 500 gallons of juice, the amount depending largely on the excess of lime employed. Use the superphosphate with care, since too great an excess will result in a sirup of disagreeable taste. After permitting the precipitate formed in the above process to settle, draw off the clear juice and rapidly concentrate it in a suitable evaporator. The sediment form the treatment with lime and clay and that formed by the addition of the superphosphate should be mixed, a quantity of water added, and the whole thoroughly agitated. Settle and decant as before. The clear liquid should be added to the fresh juices coming from the mill and the sediment rejected. It should always be noted in the manufacture of sirup, as well as in the production of sugar, that bright, brilliant, clarified juices are essential to success. After the sirup has been evaporated to a suitable density it should be rapidly cooled. It should not be barreled until it reaches the oridnary temperature of the air. Before beginning the season's work a sufficient quantity of clay should be dried and ground in a mill.

Without the use of clay as soon as the juice is expressed it should be treated with cream of lime. It is a good plan to slake the lime, then thin it with a considerable excess of water. This additonal water permits the resulting milk to be thoroughly strained for the removal of lumps and unslaked portions. A sieve with one eighth of an inch mesh is recommended. After straining, the milk of lime should remain at rest a few hours and part of the water which collects on the surface should then be removed. In treating the juice care must be taken to avoid excess of lime. The juice should be lined to neutrality—that is until neither the blue nor red litmus test paper changes color when immersed in it. Many prefer to leave it slightly acid. For making a light-colored sirup this is the preferable method, or the juice may be limed till slightly alkaline and after clarification superphosphate of lime may be added as described in connection with the process employing clay.

After the addition of the lime the juice should be slowly heated to the boiling point. It should not be boiled at this stage. The heat should be continued until the blanket of scum shows signs of breaking in several places. The heating should then be discontinued and the blanket of scum be removed by a suitable skimmer. The juice should now be boiled briskly, the scum being brushed off as fast as it rises to the surface. It is well to examine a test sample of the juice in a small bottle after brushing. The particles of suspended fluculent matter should move rapidly; those near the sides of the bottle rising nearly to the surface and descending at the central part forming a cone shaped deposit. The juice between these particles should be bright and of an amber color. To obtain the conditions described above requires skill and patience, but it must be remembered that a bright sirup of good flavor can be made only from bright, well clarified juice. An excellent sirup may be made by adding a little bisulphate of lime in the above process. This bisulphate is made by passing the fumes of burning sulphur, to saturation, into cream of lime.

Returning to the clarification—after the juice has been boiled and thoroughly brushed, the heat should be withdrawn and the suspended matter permitted to settle. After settling as long as necessary, usually from one to two hours, the clear juice should be drawn off and evaporated very rapidly to a sirup. The skimmings should be settled and the clear juice decanted. The residue should be treated with water settled, and the diluted juice drawn off. The drainings from the skimmings should be added to the fresh juice from the mill. Some form of continuous evaporator based on the old-fashioned apparatus of Cook is best adapted to sorghum work. The juice constantly runs in at one end of the evaporator, passes back and forth across it, and finally the finished sirup runs out at the other end. The evaporation should be as rapid as possible. The sirup should be cooled rapidly. If the sirup shows a tendency to granulate, the cane should be cut three or four days before it is to be worked and allowed to lie in the fields. If there is on tendency to granulation the cane should be worked immediately after harvesting. A fairly good article of sirup can be made without the use of lime. Sirup made in this way always retains the rank flavor of the sorghum. It is exceptionally good, however, for baking purposes.

GOING TO BED HUNGRY.

Fasting during the long interval between supper and breakfast and especially the complete emptiness of the stomach during sleep, adds greatly to the amount of emaciation, sleeplessness and general weakness so often met with. It is well known that in the body there is a perpetual disintegration of tissue, sleeping or waking; it is, therefore, natural to believe that the supply of nourishment should be somewhat continuous, especially in those in whom the vitality is lowered. As bodily exercise is suspended during sleep, with wear and tear correspondingly diminished, while digestion, assimilation and nutritive activity continue as usual, the food furnished during this period adds more than is destroyed, and increased weight and improved general vigor, is the result.

All animals except man eat before sleep, and there is no reason why man should form an exception to the rule. I am satisfied that were the weakly, the emaciated and the sleepless nightly to take a light meal of simple, nutritious food before going to bed, for a prolonged period, nine in ten of them would be thereby raised to a better standard of health. He has found that after digesting a bowl of bread and milk, or a saucer of oatmeal and cream, before going to bed, for a few months, a surprising increase in weight, strength and general tone has resulted. Persons who are stout and plethoric are recommended to follow an opposite course.—Dr. W. T. Cathell.

ELECTRIC ENERGY.

Hundreds of Motors Whirling in San Francisco.

GREAT DEVELOPMENTS IN STORE.

Utilization of the Water-Power at Folsom Long-Distance Transmission a Reality —Interesting Possibilities.

A little electric motor, that a man's hat would cover, revolves the big Porterville wheel in the exhibition room of the State Board of Trade. The wheel is laden with tons of dried fruit, but the insignificant looking little motor turns it steadily and with scarcely a murmur to attract attention to the source of the power.

To most visitors, especially those from the country, the little motor is more of a wonder than anything in the exhibition. It is within but a few years that electricity for power has come into general use in this city. Now electric motors are employed for many purposes, and to a considerable extent they have displaced the direct use of steam engines.

But for the relatively high cost of coal in San Francisco, which makes electric power correspondingly expensive, the small electric motors would be employed to a much greater extent as a substitute for labor; but, even at comparatively high cost, it is found advantageous to use electric motors for many purposes. Not a few are running in Chinatown in shoe and clothing factories. Even the poor seamstress may find a profitable economy of energy in hiring a motor of one-twelfth of a horse power at a cost of $3 a month, with power from morning to night to run a single sewing machine.

Dentists are using electricity to turn the wheels that actuate their boring instruments and to operate the lathes in their laboratories. Ice cream is frozen by electric power; coffee mills are run by it; it drives pumps, runs elevators, the presses of job printers and many other sorts of machinery.

There are hundreds of electric motors running in San Francisco, of capacity ranging from one-twelfth of a horse-power to ten-horse power each. Those of larger capacity than seven-eights of one horse-power are supplied with the electric current at meter rates. The smaller motors are rented with power, at a certain charge per month, whether used much or little.

The company which supplies electric power to consumers using a full horse-power or more, has about 100 customers. This company sublets electricity to another company, which supplies small motors and power at a monthly rent charge. The larger company generated electricity in July last equivalent to a daily average of 16,950 electric "horse-power hours," as technically expressed. The greater part of this electricity, however, was used for lighting purposes.

An ingenious device, known as an automatic cut-off, in connection with the meter system, stops the flow of the current through the meter when a motor is not in use, so that the consumer is required to pay for no more electricity than he uses.

Not many years ago it was supposed that electricity for power purposes could not be transmitted more than a few miles, without fatal loss of energy. But electrical engineering has made remarkable progress, and some of the impossibilities of a decade ago are among the achievements of the present day. Electric energy, generated by water-power, is now transmitted many miles with comparatively small loss. In Europe there are some lines carrying electric power long distances with a loss of little more than 3 per cent. The extent of the loss is governed largely by the character of the apparatus used and by the size of the copper wire employed for transmission.

A late engineering publication mentions a project for the conversion of coal into electric power directly at the mouth of coal-pits in Yorkshire, England, the electric energy to be transmitted by wire to Manchester and other manufacturing cities many miles away. The first step in this plan is the making of fuel gas from the coal, as in this way the available energy of the coal is greatly increased. The fuel gas would then be consumed on the spot in driving the electric generators.

The great hydraulic works at Niagara Falls, for the purpose of generating electrical power, are expected to be in operation by the end of next month. The transmission of electrical energy to Buffalo will then be made, and the percentage of loss will indicate what distance it may be profitable to carry electricity by wires.

Enigneers concerned in this mammoth enterprise think it may prove feasible to transmit electric power from the Falls to the cities of New York, Philadelphia and Chicago. Governor Flower is quoted in the September "Cosmopolitan" as saying:

"From assurances I get from the Cataract Company, which has in its employ the ablest electrical engineers in the world, I am satisfied that electricity can be easily transmitted at least 300 miles. In fact, I am confident that within the next five years these great electrical work now progressing at Niagara Falls will turn the Empire State into a great workshop, that will be one of the wonders of the civilized world.

The power which is to generate electricity at Niagara is to be developed by turbine wheels at the bottom of shafts or tenstocks 140 feet deep. These shafts are seven feet in diameter. They are supplied with water from a canal or inlet, which starts from the river a mile or more above the Falls. The water from the turbines escapes through a tunnel one and one-quarter miles long, discharging into the river gorge at a point below the falls. This tunnel is twenty-one feet high, and of a horse-shoe shape. It cost $1,250,000, and the entire works will represent an investment of $4,000,000.

Three dynamos are in place, each capable of developing 5000 horse-power. Ultimately ten of these will be used in connection with the present tunnel.

It is estimated that by the use of two tunnels on the American side, and similar works on the Canadian side, 450,000 horse power may be developed without appreciably diminishing the falls. A tunnel on the Canadian side is to be begun next summer.

No doubt is entertained of the success of these works at Niagara. The city of Rome, in Italy, receives 3000 electrical horse-power for lighting from the cascades at Tivoli, a distance of seventeen miles. The works have been running two years without interruption.

Horatio P. Livermore, who has given close attention to the advance of electrical engineering, declares that electric power will by-and-by be profitably developed at the Mount Diablo coal mines, for transmission to this city, a distance of fifty miles. It appears that there would be much greater economy in this conversion of coal into electricity at the mouth of the mines than in transporting the same fuel to this city, to be used here either for the generation of steam or electric energy.

Mr. Livermore is largely interested in the Folsom Water-power Company, which owns the stone dam and water right at Folsom, on the American river. This dam is eighty-nine feet high, of granite and cement, and creates a reservoir three miles long, holding over 13,000,000 cubic yards of water. The size of the canal supplied by this reservoir is 50 by 40 by 8 feet, giving a flow of 85,000 cubic feet a minute.

This tremendous water-power is partially used by the State Prison, which has a perpetual right, in consideration of the construction of the dam by convict labor. But by far the most important utilization of the power will be the generation of electricity for use in the city of Sacramento, eighteen or twenty miles distant from Folsom.

The original company has conceded to the Sacramento Electric Power and Light Company the use of the water for power purposes, reserving the flow from the canal for all other purposes, including that of irrigation. The water supply is estimated as sufficient for the irrigation of 300,000 acres of land, including large areas on both sides of the American river, and extending as far north as Wheatland, on Bear river. The whole country has been accurately surveyed for a system of irrigation works.

The canal is to be finished to the power-house at Folsom in the course of four months, and in from four to six months from the present time the electric machinery will have been fully installed and electric energy be in course of transmission to Sacramento. Albert Gallatin, one of the capitalists interested in this great undertaking, is now in the East on business connected with the enterprise.

At the Folsom power-house there will be installed four pairs of horizontal, cylinder-gate, special turbine wheels, each pair having 1260 horse-power, under a 55-foot head. Each pair of wheels is to be connected on its shaft with an electric generator of 1000 horse-power, rated capacity. This installation, large as it is, will utilize only about one-fourth of the water-power of the canal.

It is estimated that four-fifths, or 80 per cent. of the electric power so developed may be transmitted to Sacramento, using bare copper wires strung on poles. The 20 per cent. of loss could be much reduced if necessary, but with the enormous water power at command, it is not an object to enlarge the outlay for copper beyond a certain point.

This line of electric power transmission will be the longest in the State, with the exception of that at San Antonio Canon, in Southern California, which is a few miles longer.

At Sacramento the electric power will be used for the operation of street cars, lighting and manufacturing purposes. With abundance of cheap power for manufacturing, and the increased development of the country north and east of the city through irrigation, the Capitol should profit greatly by the enterprise of the companies that are thus utilizing the flow of the American river.

There are many other streams in California whose flow could be utilized for the purpose of generating electric power, as in the case of the American. No doubt the time is coming when many of the sources of energy will be turned to good account. The upper Sacramento, the Feather, Yuba, Bear, Mokelumne, Cosumnes, Merced, Russian and other rivers, with many smaller streams in the Sierra Nevada and the Coast Range, afford opportunity for dam-sites and the electric conversion of power.

The electric age has but begun. Numerous as are already the uses of the mysterious electric force, whose essential nature is still unknown, these are but few compared with the utilization yet to be made. In the not very distant future, electricity may be as familiar an agent in the household as gas and water now are. Electricity may do the cooking, heating and lighting, scrub the floors, wash the dishes and rock the cradle, as well as set the clock, ring the doorbell and do a host of other things when the appropriate button is pressed. Some of these services electricity does now, in the best-equippep dwellings of the larger towns and cities.

Ultimately the benefits of electric power, by some system of cheap distribution, may be extended to rural neighborhoods. The electric force may pump the water, trun the churn and do the washing for the farmer's wife, as well as plow and sow and harvest the crops, as steam power is doing now on some of the larger farms.—Bulletin.

THE PLAGUE IN CHINA

The Condition of China From a Sanitary Standpoint.

CLEANSING AND DISINFECTING.

The Terror Stricken Chinese Fleeing in Great Numbers From the Public Works—Precautions Taken.

So long a time has elapsed since the plague has made its appearance in such a way as to attract the attention of civilized countries, this dread malady had been almost forgotten. Two hundred years ago the same plague which is now prevailing in different parts of China, devastated Europe, but modern sanitary regulations have practically exterminated the disease among civilized nations. The conditions of Chinese and most other Asiatic cities, is, at the present day, from a sanitary standpoint, about like that of London before the great fire. It is not surprising, therefore, that the genuine bubonic plague should recently have made its appearance at Hong Kong, Canton and other centers of population in China. The disease has now been prevailing for several months in different parts of China; and although at the present time it seems to be somewhat abating, it is by no means certain that some months more will not elapse before its ravages cease. From a recent paper kindly sent us by our friend, Dr. Kerr, by the overland China mail, we gather a number of interesting facts, one of the most curious of which is the belief of the natives that the disease emanates from the ground, through fissures which have recently opened up in great numbers in consequence of the prevailing drought.

The disease has become so widespread that the Chinese authorities have caused a house-to-house visitation for purposes of cleansing and disinfecting—quite an innovation in China, but a most wholesome one, and one which, if the custom becomes a permanent one, may possibly lead to the saving of so many lives that the plague will prove, after all, to be a blessing, notwithstanding that so many thousands have fallen victims to it. So many houses have been condemned that it is stated as possible that one-tenth of the entire city of Hong Kong may be destroyed and rebuilt, to put a stop to the dread malady. So far, only a few foreigners have suffered, although there is so great a dread of the disease that attempts have been made to restrict the disease to its present localities by preventing the migration of the sufferers. However, Tsung-La Yamen has informed the British minister at Pekin that, unless the plague patients are allowed to leave the colony, the Chinese Government will cease to be responsible for the safety of the lives or property of missionaries in China. There is, as usual among heathen people, when any national calamity befalls them, a general feeling of hostility against foreigners, and especially against missionaries. Mobs have produced serious disturbances in many places, and at Canton, recently, a conspiracy was discovered, the purpose of which was to murder all foreigners and destroy their property. It is probable that this great catastrophe was only averted by a premature outbreak of the hostile feeling, which nearly resulted in the death of two lady medical missionaries, but gave warning of the impending danger in time to permit of the adoption of necessary precautions.

The Chinese appear to be terror-stricken by the plague, fleeing in great numbers from the public works upon which they are employed, and their terror seems not without cause, for thus far the disease has proved to be fatal in almost every case. Dr. Kerr writes to us that he has succeeded in saving a half-dozen or more in the floating hospital which he has established in the river, opposite the large hospital of which he has had charge for nearly half a century. Between the plague on the one hand, and war with the Japanese on the other hand, China would seem to be having a rather hard time just now; possibly she may learn a useful lesson from both calamities. If the Japanese should happen to come out best in the contest, China would doubtless be more ready to adopt modern improvements, in which she has been far behind her rival; and the plague may teach her the importance of introducing some thorough-going sanitary measures for the suppression of the numerous nuisances which, according to the reports of missionaries, "smell to heaven" in almost every part of the empire.—Good Health.

DANIEL WEBSTSR.

I shall always remember the first time I saw Mr. Webster, and the impression he made upon my then very youthful mind. It was at a gathering at Faneuil Hall. As he rose and stepped forward amid tumultuous applause, I noticed the broad chest, across which the blue coat was fastened with shining brass buttons; his large head, broad forehead, cavernous eye sockets, in which shone the deep, solemn-looking dark eyes; his firm-set lip and ponderous jaw. And when the solemn hush fell on the assembly as he stretched forth his right hand and began, the deep, melodious voice rang through the hall like the musical bass notes of a church organ, his enunciation clear, emphatic, strong, and the compass of his voice filled the whole hall.—Boston Bulletin.

Mamma—What was the sermon about this morning, Willie? Willie—Well, I guess it was telling about cash boys. Mamma—What did the minister say about them? Willie—Nothin', but his text was "All the days of my appointed time will I wait till my change come."—Chicago Inter-Ocean.

A PEN PICTURE.

The Man Had Not Meant to Make Trouble, but Was Unfortunate.

"A strong wind had set in from the sea, banking huge masses of clouds over the city. The rain descended in a blinding, staggering deluge, and solid sheets of fire flashed athwart the angry skies, followed by crashing peals of thunder. The gloom was excessive. The lights in the streets cast a fitful, sickly glare over the wet pavements and the few belated pedestrians who were hastening home. It was a night for dark thoughts and darker deeds.

I laid aside the book which I had been reading—an absurdly impossible tale of midnight horrors and ghastly crimes—and sat moodily looking at the raindrops chasing madly down the window pane and at the fierce night without. The cabbies in the street below were swearing, and the call bells in the hotel were clanging like wild.

Suddenly in the adjoining room I heard a sharp click like the cocking of a firearm. The connecting door was unbolted and slightly ajar. I sat still, with bated breath and hair bristling all over with terror. A shuffling of heavy feet and a muttered imprecation as something fell on the floor. A cold, paralyzing dread seized on me, freezing the lifeblood in my veins. God of heavens, what horrible tragedy was being enacted behind that door?

Sharp, clear and loud, above the raging of the elements, rang out the report of a pistol, followed by a terrible oath and a heavy fall. Pale as a specter, I sprang, tottering, toward the door to escape, and with a horrified scream fell crashing to the floor in a dead swoon.

I awoke with a start. The connecting door was wide open. Above my prostrate form stood a rough looking man in his shirt sleeves. His right hand was bloody. I seemed to feel his clutches on my throat already and closed my eyes with a gasp. I opened them again cautiously. In his bloody grasp he held the shattered remains of an electric light globe.

"Sorry, stranger," he said, "but I tried to open the durned thing to light up, and hit busted."—Atlanta Constitution.

EVERY HOME SHOULD OWN A DYNAMO

Then Housewives Could Magnetize Hammers and Make Tack Driving Easy.

There is an easy way to render the ordinary tack hammer an article that may be used with comfort and to do away with all danger of bruised fingers from its misdirected blows. A little electricity will do the trick. The process is so simple that it should be universally adopted.

All that is required is access to a dynamo. Then lay the head of the hammer on the framework and leave it there for about five minutes. This needs no strength, but the hammer cannot be detached without the knowledge that some force holds it fast to the ironwork, and herein lies the secret. By contact with the dynamo your hammer has been magnetized and will pick up bits of iron or steel that are not too heavy for its strength.

Tacks and small nails, too short to be held in the fingers when driving, may be easily placed in position for the hammer blows without using the finger or thumbs and much speedier work accomplished. In retacking torn shades the man of the house will at once appreciate the blessing of a magnetized hammer, since he can pick the tiny tacks from the box direct with his magnet, press them into the roller with the same tool and by one blow drive the elusive fasteners home.

Carpet laying is made easy and stray tacks in quantities such as will slip from the fingers a thing of the past.—New York Herald.

Frog Catching as an Industry.

Frog catching is a leading industry along the river, and the most successful operators work all night and sleep in the daytime. Their tents along the river are silent during the sleeping hours of the forenoon, but at night the swampy shores are alive with the moving lanterns of the fishers, or rather the froggers. The frogs are caught with an ordinary fishhook, and the most successful bait is a small piece of red flannel. The operator has a reflector lantern fastened in the bow of his boat, and it is claimed that the light makes the frogs snappish without discrimination. The baited hooks are passed freely among them as the canoes, punts, skiffs and rafts are pushed and paddled through the marshes. The frog catchers do a profitable business with the Toronto restaurants.—Toronto Globe.

Beer by the Pound.

"What do you think of getting 1¼ pounds of beer for a nickel?" said a man the other day. "Well, out in the southern part of the city they sell beer in this way altogether, especially at the little German groceries with a saloon annex. When people come into the place for a pitcher of beer, the vessel is set on scales and weighed. Then the customer is asked if he wants lager or common beer. If he wants 5 cents' worth of the first, he gets 1¼ pounds, but if he wants common beer he gets 1¾ pounds. The dealer I saw did not know how the custom of weighing beer originated. The stand has been handed down for several generations, and beer was never measured otherwise than by weighing.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

THE SLANG OF LONDON

ITS RHYMING FEATURE, WHICH IS PECULIAR TO ENGLAND.

Say "Daisies" For Boots, and You Will Have Made a Good Start, but That Is Not All of It by Any Means—A Dissertation on an Unknown Science.

By way of introducing the subject let me premise that there is a certain school of thinkers—dwellers for the most part in very unfashionable districts of London—who hold that a policeman in plain clothes, dress he ever so plainly, may always be known as such by a cursory inspection of his boots. Whether this opinion is well founded I know not, but its existence, and also the existence of rhyming slang, was brought to my notice not long ago in Oxford street—not the Oxford street of west enders and De Quincey, but Oxford street "out Stepney way." I happened to be rather stoutly shod, and I wear spectacles, which are, I suppose, often assumed for the purpose of disguise, and as I passed by a group of ill favored loiterers at a street corner I distinctly heard one of them remark to another: "'Ere's a tec. D'yer dick 'is goggles and 'is blanky daisies?"

I walked quickly away, but the words remained in my mind. The opinion they conveyed, except as affording proof that the speaker belonged to the school of thinkers above alluded to, did not interest me so much as the words themselves. "Tec" is of course merely an abbreviation for "detective." Much might be written about "dick." It is pure Romany, connected, as every student of that attractive language knows, with the Sanskrit "drish" and the Hindoostance "dekhna," meaning "to see." But "daisies"—being the slang term and, as I shall show, the rhyming slang term for "boots"—is a good specimen of a most singular perversion of the English language, which is well worth the attention of any one who cares about linguistic oddities.

Rhyming slang is peculiar to England and, I believe, to London. The French language, so rich in slang, does not admit of such treatment. It is of modern origin, and I doubt if any trace of it is to be found in the records, which are fairly plentiful, of the slang of last century. Nor do I recollect any instance of its appearance in the works of Dickens, Harrison Ainsworth or Bulwer Lytton.

Rhyming slang expressions may be divided into two classes—the simple and the complex. The simple method consists in substituting for a word some other word or phrase which rhymes with it. Not that every one is free to choose his own rhymes. Usage has established certain rhyming slang equivalents for certain words, and, although no doubt new rhymes are always being introduced on trial, yet when one has become recognized as belonging to the dialect it can never be dislodged. For instance, the rhyming slang for "a pocket" is "skyrocket," and neither "locket" nor "socket" would be tolerated. The eyes are "mince pies," the ear and the nose are, oddly enough, the "frosty and clear" and the "I suppose." How, when and why these particular rhymes were universally adopted will never be known. As Professor Dowden remarks in connection with a very different subject, "To the eyes of no diver amid the wrecks of time will that curious talisman gleam." Who was "Charlie Prescott," whose name is immortalized as a synonym for "waistcoat?" And why should coat and trousers be concealed under such circumstances as "I'm afloat" and "round the house?"

Other examples of what I have called the simple form of rhyming slang are "cat and mouse" (house), "elephant's trunk" (drunk), "bull and cow" (row), and "I'm so frisky" (whisky). But if I am asked how "daisies" can be the rhyming slang for "boots" I answer that we have here an example of the second or complex form of the jargon, which finds its highest development in the mouths of experts. Having got your rhyme—say, "skyrocket" for "pocket"—you are permitted, within certain ill defined limits, to make your slang equivalent shorter and more occult by omitting the rhyming portion. Thus "pocket" becomes "sky" and "daisy roots," the simple or first standard form for "boots," is contracted into "daisies." In the same way no master of the language would ever give brandy or gin their primitive names, "Jack the dandy" or "Brian O'Lynn." The one is always referred to as "Jack," the other as "Brian." It will be seen that words treated in this way must have a tendency, in constant use, to lose signification, as it were, of their original forms and to become merged in the great mass of ordinary prosaic slang. For instance, in act 1, scene 1, of "The Cotton King" some one says that somebody has "a streak of black across the chivvy." An Adelphi audience knows, of course, that "chivvy" means "face," but the earlier form of the word, "chevy chase," being now rarely if ever used, the rhyming original is probably known to few playgoers, and the word "chivvy" is thus in danger of being left with no more poetry about it than is attached to such terms as "conk" or "boko," the ordinary slang for nose.

We hear a great deal about the way in which slang has invaded our conversation and our literature; but, in spite of the recent popularization of the coster, I doubt if much rhyming slang is heard in west end drawing rooms. And I have only come across one example of its employment, except occasionally in a music hall song, in which might be called a literary form. There is a poem which begins thus, and readers who have followed me so far will find no difficulty in translating it:

I was sitting one night at the Anna Maria,
Warming my plates of meat,
When there came a knock at the Rory O'Moore
Which made my raspberry beat.

This opening makes one wish for more, but I am sorry to say that I can only recollect the first stanza.—Pall Mall Budget.

LOST AND SPOILED MONEY.

The Bank of England Makes a Big Profit on Her Notes.

Bank notes of the value of thousands of pounds are annually lost or destroyed by accident. In the 40 years between 1792 and 1832 there were outstanding notes of the Bank of England, presumed to have been either lost or destroyed, amounting to £1,330,000 odd, every shilling of which was clear profit to the bank.

In many instances, however, it is possible to recover the amount of the note from the bank in full. Notice has to be given to the bank of the note supposed to be lost or stolen, together with a small fee and a full narrative as to how the loss occurred. The note is then "stopped"—that is, if the document should be presented for payment, the person "stopping" the note is informed when and to whom it is paid. If presented, after having been "stopped," by any suspicious looking person, and not through a banker, one of the detectives always in attendance at the bank would be called to question the person as to how and when the note came into his or her possession. It is quite a mistaken idea that "stopped payment" of a bank note has the effect supposed by very many people. It simply means that the Bank of England carefully keeps a lookout for the note which has been "stopped," and, though it cannot refuse to pay such note immediately on its being presented, a notification would at once be made to the person who stopped it, and the bank would give all the assistance in its power to enable the loser to recover the amount.

In the case of a bank note having been, say, burned by mistake, if the number is known and notice sent to the Bank of England it will pay the amount after an interval of five years from the date of lodging notice of destruction should no one have presented the note for payment in the meantime. The bank in such cases also insists on a guarantee being given by a banker or two householders that it shall be repaid in the event of the document turning up and being again tendered for payment. It is not at all an unusual circumstance for a mutilated note to be presented for payment, burned perhaps half through, with marks of burning on the fringes. Nor is the damage always accidental. The men who indulge in the luxury of lighting their pipes with a bank note are not always, as some may think, millionaires or recognized lunatics of society. The spoiled notes are more often than not presented by workmen or laborers, who confess without hesitation that they have intentionally lighted their pipes with them from mere braggadocio.—Ashton (England) Reporter.

An Anecdote of Perier.

Once during the schooldays of the president of the French republic his professor in geography asked him, "Perier, give us the exact position and indicate the latitude of the Gambier group." Casimir-Perier crossed his arms tightly upon his chest, looking very perplexed. One of his neighbors whispered to him the wrong answer, whereupon the professor gave him the exact position of this little group, which belongs to the more important French establishment of Tahiti, and after a short pause, and with a little point of irony, said: "You ought to know that, Perier, because it is thanks to your grandfather that France acquired the ascendancy in these parts of the world. It was through his efforts and entreaties that the dusky queen of these islands was induced to come to France, and the men of my generation still remember the comical songs which celebrated the event." Perier blushed considerably, but, holding his head still higher, answered the professor with his quick and peculiar diction, "I will most certainly go over this lesson again and try to be more proficient at the next lecture; but, so far as the deeds of my grandfather go, they are so numerous that I am not old enough yet to know them all."—San Francisco Argonaut.

A Rare Stamp.

An interesting and valuable addition has been made to the splendid collection of stamps in the Philosophical museum. It is a half crown stamp, lettered "America," and is the sole survivor of those attempted to be forced upon our colonists at Boston who threw the chests of tea into their harbor, for the colonists destroyed all the stamps as well, except this, which Mr. Philbrick, Q. C., is fortunate enough to be the possessor of. Another valuable addition is a series of fine specimen copies of Australian stamps sent by Major E. H. Watts of Newport.—Boston Traveller.

M., and running thence West eleven chains and 58-100; thence North-east following the meanderings of the bank of Creek along its North branch to Edwards street, in the town of Independence, thence following said Edwards street along its West line to the place of beginning, six and 80-100 acres; also lot No. 4 in Block No. 9 in the town of Independence, all constituting what is known as the Reddy place.

Lots Nos. 2, 4, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11 and 12, in Block No. 29, in the town of Independence, the said County of Inyo, as the same appears by the official plat of the said town of Independence, now on file in the office of the County Recorder of said Inyo county, having been the residence of said John A. Hannah, deceased, at the time of his death.

Lot Nos. 2 and 4, in Block No. 22, in the town of Independence, County of Inyo, State of California, as the same appears by the official plat of the said town of Independence, now on file in the office of the County Recorder of the said Inyo county.

Two hundred feet undivided, of in and to that certain mining claim, lead, or lode, situate, lying and being in the Cerro Gordo Mining District, County of Inyo, State of California, known and designated as the "La Dispricada Lode."

That certain lot, piece or parcel of land situate, lying and being in the County of Ventura State of California, commencing at a point twelve and nine-twentieth (12 9-20) rods south of the general corner of the north west quarter and the North-east quarter of Section No. twelve (12) and the South west quarter and the South-east quarter of Section No. one (1) in Township No. three (3) North, of Range Nu twenty-one (21) West, San Bernardine Base and Meridian, running thence South sixty-eight and eleven-twenth (68 11-20) rods; thence West twenty-three (23) rods; thence Northwesterly along a small branch or swale to a point twenty four (24) rods North of the general corner of the North East quarter and the South-east quarter, and the North-west quarter and the North east quarter of the North-west quarter of Section No. twelve (12), in Township No. three (3) North of Range Nu twenty-one (21) West; running thence North forty-four and eleven twentieth (44 11-20) rods thence East eighty (80) rods to the place of beginning, containing thirty acres: Together with ten shares of the Capital stock of the Highland Water Company.

Bids or offers must be in writing, and will be received at the residence of the undersigned at Georges Creek, Cal., and may be left at said place, or at the office of the District Attorney, at Independence, Cal., or delivered to said Executor personally, or may be filed in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court, at any time after the first publication of this notice, and before the making of sale.

The Executor reserves the right to reject any and all bids.

Terms and conditions of sale: Cash, lawful money of the United States, ten per cent. of the purchase money to be paid to the said Executor when the sale shall be made, balance on confirmation of sale by said Superior Court. Deed at the expense of purchaser.

WILLIAM L. HUNTER.
Executor of the Last Will and Testament John Allen Hannah deceased.

Dated, Independence, Cal., February 11th 1892.

OUR PRESIDENT,

GROVER CLEVELAND,

OF NEW YORK.

OUR VICE-PRESIDENT,

GEN. STEVENSON,

OF ILLINOIS.

Religious Services.

Rev. S. W. Albone will conduct services until further notice as follows: Lone Pine 11 a. m.; Georges Creek, 2:30 p. m.; Independence, 7 p. m.

Sunday Schools, Fort and Lone Pine 10 a. m.; Independence, 2 p. m.

As near as we can learn no polls were held at Cottonwood.

Election day passed off very quietly, not a row of any kind anywhere.

A. O. Collins came down from Big Pine yesterday and is visiting in town.

H. D. Gill was in town election day, having nearly recovered from his recent severe illness.

Judge Gill has recovered from his recent sick spell and was at the Court House this morning.

Benigno Aguirre Jr. came down from Bishop Wednesday on land business, returning to-day.

An earthquake in the City of Mexico this week killed several people and caused a terrible panic

Miss Lena Reinhakle came down from Big Pine on Tuesday, returning early Wednesday morning.

The Board of Supervisors for the next two years will consist of four Democrats and one Populist.

We give the election returns this week so far as they can be obtained. Next week the full official vote will be given.

T. B. Scovil was released from the County jail on Wednesday, the term of his sentance having expired.

The condition of John Shepherd remains much the same. He improved slightly early in the week but is very feeble.

Frank Shaw was elected Supervisor in the First District by a majority of thirty-eight. The vote by precincts cannot be obtained.

Henry Levy will start for San Francisco on to-morrow's train. He has been in poor health for some time and will get medical treatment.

Sportsmen are hereby strictly forbidden to hunt or shoot upon my premises.

F. Schabel.
Camp Independence.

Paul Carrier expects to start on a prospecting trip through Arizona. He will leave here to-morrow morning for Mojave with J. W. Murphy.

The next excitement will be the quarter race between Sagebrush and Gold Piece a week from Monday. The Harmony Orchestra will give a social dance in the evening. See their ad.

The placer diggings on Mazourka Canyon still continue to yield gold in paying quantities. Yesterday J. W. Lacy brought in over four ounces of gold which he had obtained with a dry-washer.

Ed Reed formerly of Candelaria came down from Bishop yesterday and went on to Lone Pine to-day, on his way to Los Angeles. Mr Reed is located in San Diego County, where he is superintending some mines.

Election Gossip

The bulletins received at local telegraph office have been very meagre as to State news. According to latest quotations the election of Budd for Governor is safely assured. He will probably be elected by 5,000 majority. It is said that the remainder of the ticket is mostly Republican. Jackson Temple is elected as Supreme Judge. The Republicans elected six Congressmen, Caminetti being defeated. Throughout the East the Republicans have made a clean sweep, and the next Congress will have a Republican majority. Hill has been defeated in New York. The entire Eastern election has the appearance of a crushing defeat for silver. All the silver candidates have been defeated, Beard included. The only hope the friends of silver can have is that Cleveland will veto and robbe anti-silver measures that may be passed by the next Congress. Caminetti, a strong silver advocate, has been defeated in this District. Latest returns indicate that the silver candidate for Governor in Nevada has been defeated and a Republican elected. Newlands is elected to Congress. Ingalls is elected sheriff of Esmeralda county by a small majority. The Populist vote in California has been very large, probably over 50,000. In this county they polled over 120 votes, and elected one county officer, Supervisor Eldred. Sutro has been elected Mayor of San Francisco.

11 o'clock, a. m.

Complete returns from 308 precincts in a total of 327 precincts in the 2nd Railroad district give Earl, R. 18,147; Stanton, D. 20,723; Johnson, Pop. 5,634.

Complete returns from 328 precincts in a total of 457 precincts in the 2nd Congressional district give Johnson 14,789; Caminetti 11,409; Cornell 7,192.

Complete returns from 177 precincts in a total of 200 precincts in the fifth Congressional district, give Loud 11,273; Kelley 7,512; Roger 5,562; Duncan 7,207.

Complete returns from 320 precincts in a total of 479 precincts in the 7th Congressional district gives Bowers 14,039; Afford 10,131; Gilbert 7,991.

Complete returns from 234 precincts in the 6th Congressional district give McLaughlin 17,325; Patten 10,631; Bowen 8,446.

Budd 2,000 ahead, a few small precincts still to hear from.

MME PATTI'S BEDS.

No one ever sees a bed in any of the bedrooms at Mme. Patti's Craig-y-Nos Castle until the evening, and what might be taken to be a handsome wardrobe with a mirror was really a bedstead. The housemaids, after making the beds in the morning, touch a spring and the bed sinks down into the frame of the bedstead, and is drawn up so as to give it the appearance of a wardrobe.—London Weekly Sun.

The extremely low water in the Ohio has exposed several acres of gravel in the river-bed at New Richmond, Ohio. The whole area is alive with mussel shells. These are particularly rich in pearls, and 100 persons are working the pearl mines.

TWO LUCKY MEN.

They Invest in a Lottery Ticket and Each Gets a Small Fortune Which is Well Invested.

Less than a month ago S. Lahishensky was a poor, struggling young tailor, at 214 Jackson Boulevard. To-day he is one of the happiest men in Chicago, for dame fortune has smiled upon him in a most substantial way and he is the proud possessor of quite a comfortable bank account. It happened in this way:

Mr. Lahishensky is a Hebrew. He was born twenty-two years ago in the land of the Czar, where the Jews are much persecuted. Five years ago, alone and almost penniless, he left his native land and sought a home in America, finally locating in Chicago in 1891. He had learned tailoring, in Russia and at 214 Jackson boulevard he started a little repairing shop about five months ago.

On Friday, Aug. 10, W. Rothenberg, a customer of Mr. Lahishensky, came into the shop and chanced to show two one-twentieth tickets in the Honduras National Lottery (Louisiana State Lottery) which he had purchased for 50 cents. Mr. Lahishensky offered to take one of them, more as a jest than ought else, and was given one of the slips for which he gave Mr. Rothenberg 25 cents. The drawing took place on Aug. 14, and Mr. Lahishensky was surprised that the number on his ticket, 18,172, had drawn the second capital prize of $20,000. He presented his ticket and last week received a check for $1,000, being the one-twentieth to which he was entitled.

Mr. Lahishensky is an industrious, energetic and deserving young man in whose hands the money will be well spent. When asked by a reporter for The Dispatch what he intended to do with the money he replied: "I am going to send a part of it to my father and mother, who are still in Russia. The remainder I shall use to enlarge and expand my business, and to build myself up in Chicago. I appreciate the good fortune and I have purchased another ticket in the september drawing of the Honduras National Lottery. That company is honest and prompt and paid my price without a quibble."

W. Rothenberg, who held the other one-twentieth of the same number, lived at 25 Newbury avenue, but when a reporter of The Dispatch called there it was found he had moved, none of his neighbors could give his present address. But Mr. Lahiscensky said he knew Mr. Rothenberg had gotten his money also. Mr. Rothenberg was a workingman in very moderate circumstances, and the money paid him by the Honduras National Lottery company will prove a blessing to him and his family and will be well spent, no doubt.—Chicago (Ills.) Dispatch, Sep. 11.

BUDS, Society buds, young women just entering the doors of society or womanhood, require the wisest care. To be beautiful and charming they must have perfect health, with all it implies—a clear skin, rosy checks, bright eyes and good spirits. At this period the young woman is especially sensitive, and many nervous troubles, which continue through life, have their origin at this time. If there be pain, headache, backache, and nervous disturbances, or the general health not good, the judicious use of medicine should be employed. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the best restorative tonic and nervine at this time. The best bodily condition results from its use. It's a remedy specially indicated for those delicate weaknesses and derangements that afflict womenkind at one period or another. You'll find that the woman who has faithfully used the "Prescription" is the picture of health, she looks well and she feels well.

In catarrhal inflammation, in chronic displacements common to women, where there are symptoms of backache, dizziness or fainting, bearing down sensations, disordered stomach, moodiness, fatigue, etc., the trouble is surely dispelled and the sufferer brought back to health and good spirits.

"WOMAN'S ILLS."

MRS. W. R. BATES, of Dilworth, Trumbull Co., Ohio, writes:

"A few years ago I took Doctor Pierce's Favorite Prescription, which has been a great benefit to me. I am in excellent health now. I hope that every woman, who is troubled with 'women's ills,' will try the Prescription' and be benefited as I have been."

MRS. BATES.

You Shiver

and say: "I'm taking cold." But you shiver because your system is weak and cannot resist outside influences.

MY SAINT.

My saint is a saint that few may know
In all that she does for us sinners below;
She is fair as faithful and faithful as fair,
With a halo encircling her beautiful hair.

She is full of wiles and moods as an elf,
And yet is the spirit of truth itself,
And well for him who his burden can bear
In the light of the halo about her hair.

Her face is a mirror where men may read
The truth that inspires her, thought and deed;
Her life is a life of devotion and care,
And she has a halo about her hair.

Her care is for others and not for herself,
And naught she recks of profit or pelf;
Enough for her that her goal is won—
And she knows not her halo is bright as a sun.

All things she does from the splendid love
That comes to her here from a Power above,
And I who adore her can hardly dare
To look at the halo about her hair.
—W. H. Pollock in Longman's Magazine.

TURN ABOUT IS FAIR.

"Just draw your chair round a little. I know there's a draft on that side. I did intend at one time to have it cured in some way, but it does not much matter now. I'll have a screen put round your corner tomorrow. Mine is comfortable enough."

This was said to me one winter evening by my cousin, John Elder, as we sat on each side of the fire in his particularly cozy dining room, where the table, with its lamp, flowers and dessert, had been drawn up to an easy distance from our hands. John was sipping port and I was cracking nuts, for which in spite of my years I have an abiding affection, and behind my chair was the door from which might, but did not, come the draft. John was speaking of.

John is an elderly gentleman, a bachelor, very well off, very comfortable and very popular, but still rather mysteriously a bachelor, because he has always liked and been liked by women. I am an elderly lady, a widow, and John and I have been warm friends all our lives. The reason why I was sitting beside John's dining room fire was that I had come to pay him a visit, and as there were no other guests in the house it was much more sensible for me to stay and talk with him while he enjoyed his after dinner ease than to go away by myself into the drawing room.

"There is no draft," I said; "none at present, I am sure. But there may be when the wind is north, and a screen would make all safe."

"Yes," he answered musingly, as he looked at the wine he had just poured out, "a screen would do, but I did think once of altering the door, making a really good job of it. I planned that with other alterations."

"And the plans were never carried out?" I asked, after I had waited a moment to see if he would say more. "Well, I suppose I know when they were made, but I never did quite understand why they came to nothing."

"No," he answered. "I don't think anybody knew but ourselves. It was my fault—certainly, it was all my fault."

He stopped, but I thought he was not disinclined to go on, and I was curious. Indeed there had been an episode in John's life about which we had all been curious, and though it was a good while past I still felt I should like to know. So I said, "I fancied it had been Miss Woodroffe's doing?"

"I said it was my fault," he answered. "I did not say it was my doing."

"Oh!" I answered rather blankly, and there was a silence.

Then John gave a little laugh, half ridicule of himself, I thought, and half ruefulness for the story that was in his mind.

"I may as well tell you all about it," he said. "You are not likely to tell it to any of the young ones, and it certainly was an odd way of losing one's promised wife. You'll see that she was not to blame."

I saw now that I was in for the story, whatever it might be, the catastrophe of which had left John a bachelor, so I settled myself in my chair, put my feet more comfortably on my footstool and laid down the nuteackers.

"Well," he said, "I dare say you remember that I have always been much fonder of seeing my friends in my own house than of going elsewhere for society. I don't suppose I've dined out ten times in the last ten years; and ten years ago I disliked doing it almost as much as I do now. Only I wasn't quite such an old fogy, and I believe I had some vague idea of marrying. The difficulty was that I had never seen exactly the right woman, and very naturally I wasn't nearly so keen about finding her as I had been twenty years before that. It is just ten years now since I met Miss Woodroffe."

"Yes," I said, "I remember it is about ten years since I heard of her."

"The only house where I ever cared to dine in those days was Joddrells', and I used to go there about once for every four times they asked me. One evening in September I went there much against my will. Joddrell had promised me that I should meet some old friends, but when I arrived there was not one present but strangers, and nearly all the party were young people. Fancy asking me to meet a room full of young people! It wasn't till dinner was announced that I saw the lady I was to take in; then Joddrell led me into a corner of the drawing room and introduced me to Miss Woodroffe, a friend of his wife."

John stopped a little here, and I fancied he was trying to find words in which to describe Miss Woodroffe. If that were so he did not succeed. After a minute he went on again, without attempting to give me any portraiture of the heroine of his story.

"Upon my word, Mary, I can't tell how it happened. All I know is that she was the most charming woman I ever saw in my life. We talked a great deal during dinner, and we talked a great deal after dinner, and the more she talked and the more I looked at her the more I thought with disgust of my solitary existence. Somehow or other before I got up next morning I had made up my mind that I would try to persuade her to become my wife. All this of course is very commonplace. Plenty of men, I suppose—even some men of fifty-five—must have had the same sort of experience. Now comes the part of the story which I think must belong to me alone. Do you remember how, years ago, I persuaded you to let me send some of your handwriting to a lady who professed to know all about the people whose writing she was allowed to examine? I sent yours and some others. Do you remember?"

"Yes," I answered, "I remember very well, and we thought the characters sent back were wonderfully true."

"We did," said John emphatically, "and that was the mischief of it. Some time after that I had a housekeeper whom I suspected of cheating me, and I sent a note of hers to Miss Harris by way of clearing up my opinion of her. Miss Harris wrote back that she was civil and plausible, but not to be trusted, and sure enough after a time I detected her in downright robbery. Upon my word, Mary, if I did believe in Miss Harris, I had good reason, and I'm not so very sure yet that she doesn't deserve to be believed in. Well, now, what do you think I did? I determined to get a note from Miss Woodroffe and send it to Miss Harris before I took another step in the affair. Miss Woodroffe, as it happened, was to stay at the Joddrells' for two or three weeks, and before a week was over I had managed to get a note of two or three lines from her. This I sent to Miss Harris, and I can show you the answer I received."

Here John took from his pocket a letter case or pocketbook, from which, after some turning over of the papers it contained, he drew out a much worn letter, and handed it to me. It began: "The handwriting of the note of which you have requested my opinion is a very remarkable one; it expresses in the strongest degree the qualities of a noble and refined character. The writer has a clear brain, an affectionate heart and great rectitude of mind; she talks well, and neither too much nor too little." There was a good deal more in the same style, describing such a paragon of our sex that I really felt an inch or two taller for the reading of it.

"If Miss Woodroffe was all that," I said, "I can't imagine how you ever let her go."

"She was," he answered. "At any rate I have no reason to doubt it."

He put the paper back in its place and went on:

"I think I may say that I lost no time after that. She was friendly from the beginning. About four weeks after our first meeting I asked her to marry me, and she said 'Yes.' Upon my word, Mary, if I had been twenty-five instead of fifty-five, I don't think I could have been happier. She was just going away from the Joddrells', and before she went I told her all about Miss Harris and what a thorough belief I had in her skill. Miss Woodroffe laughed at me, but unfortunately I was quite convinced that my belief was well founded and quite determined to persuade her to think so too.

"She went away, and of course I wrote to her. In one of my first letters I sent her the one I have just shown you, and I begged her to send my handwriting also to Miss Harris for her own satisfaction. You see, I felt quite safe in doing this, because the description of me which had been sent at the time, you remember, had been rather flattering. On that occasion Miss Harris had declared that I 'was of an amiable temper, liberal, but trustworthy.' I remember the words well, and I thought it could do me nothing but good if such an account of me found its way to Miss Woodroffe.

"What fools people are! The woman was a rank impostor of course, as I found afterward to my cost and as I ought to have known then, but I did really believe in her. Could you have guessed it?"

"Well, no," I answered. "I really don't think I should have believed it—only you know, John, you shrewd men can be so dreadfully credulous. Why, I remember a friend of my husband who doubted everything, and yet he believed in Mme. Blavatsky."

John grunted. He did not seem to like the comparison, which was foolish of him, poor fellow.

"She said," he went on, "that she could trust her own judgment and did not want anybody else's. That might have satisfied anybody, but it did not satisfy me. I wrote again and begged her to do as I wished, telling her about the housekeeper. At last she wrote that she had done to please me what she never would have done for herself, and she said, 'I suppose you expect me to abide by whatever Miss Harris may say.'

"Do you know that those words gave me a fright? I had never doubted till then that Miss Harris would give just the same character of me as she had done before, and also I had only thought of it as giving me more value to Miss Woodroffe. I got nervous after I heard she had really consulted the sibyl, and two days later I received these."

He turned over his pocketbook again and handed to me two papers, sinking back in his chair after he had done so with a gesture that said, "You have the catastrophe and its results before you."

I opened one of the papers, and literally I opened it with trembling fingers. There was something tragical in poor John's gesture and in the emptiness and silence of the house. My eyes fell upon a sheet of paper, half covered with a neat, legible handwriting, the words of which were much as follows:

"This writing belongs to a person of a singularly impulsive and eager temperament, easily carried away by the feeling of the moment; very uncertain and unreliable, sadly inconsistent, without fixed purpose or deliberate judgment; not wanting in ability, but only in the power to apply it usefully; careless of money, but scarcely to be called generous; not altogether free from vanity, his temper is very irritable and passionate"——

There was more, but a sigh from John—poor John! the most faithful and generous of friends, and the most steady going of mortals—made me drop the sheet and take up the other.

This was a very short note:

DEAR MR. ELDER—You insisted that I should consult Miss Harris and trust her verdict on your character rather than on my own. What that is you will see by the inclosed, and I am sure you cannot wonder that I dare not marry the man described. I am sending back your presents and letters by next post. With most sincere wishes for your happiness, yours truly, LOUISA WOODROFFE.

"Oh, John," I said when I had read this, "but she could not have meant it."

"She meant it so thoroughly that when I got to her mother's house in London the very evening of the day I received it they were both gone abroad, and I have not so much as seen her from that time to this."

So that was why the dining room door was never altered.—New York Recorder.

A Chicken That Catches Mice.

On my place, near Montemorilos, Mexico, I have Plymouth Rock chickens. One day two of my children were crossing the field about a half mile from the house, when they came across a mother partridge with her young, which on sight of the children began to hide in the woods. Noticing one of the brood hide in a bunch of grass the children concluded to capture it, and did, but instead of a young partridge it turned out to be a young Plymouth Rock chicken, which by some means had been adopted by the old mother partridge.

This chicken after being taken to the house soon became tame, but has confined its diet to insects and similar food; but, most wonderful of all, it has developed into an extra good mouser, hardly a day passing that it does not catch at least one mouse. It first commenced killing little mice, until now it has no hesitancy in attacking and killing full grown mice, which it pecks to pieces and eats.—Cor. Louisville Courier-Journal.

It is related of Miss Trella Foltz Toland, an actress in San Francisco, that she persistently unchecks horses that she finds standing with their heads strained back according to the present ungraceful and indefensible custom. She says she did this for over 100 horses in Kansas City and Denver and received a letter of thanks from the president of the Kansas City Humane society. Here's a practical philanthropy open to everybody, without waiting for organization or officers.

Opinion of a Tippler.

A notice bulletined at one of the well known clubs informs members that water used in the cafe is boiled. Beneath this comforting assurance some one has written, "It would be better if you boiled the whisky."—New York Times.

THE ART OF BREWING.

Africans on their native heath use bread for the foundation of a very potent beverage. The bread is broken up, placed in a large vessel, a quantity of water is poured in also and the mixture of bread and water is exposed to the firecest rays of the light for fully twelve hours. The result is called "Marissa," and is said to greatly resemble bock beer in taste and potency.

The use of beer, which is in reality nothing but bread in its fluid state fermented, is on the increase in this as well as in other countries. Beer drinking and Germany have always been synonymous terms, while England and the United States have been beer consumers for years, but now even wine-producing France has fallen into line.

The brewing of lager beer in this country was begun about fifty years ago in the outskirts of Philadelphia.

Before that brewery products were entirely ale and porter. Now, however, nearly all the output, which last year amounted to 33,822,000 barrels, is of lager. Each barrel contains two hundred and forty-eight pints or four hundred and ninety-six glasses; therefore, according to the latest internal revenue returns, there was made and sold last year an average of a glass of beer for every working day to every man, woman and child in the United States.

In the production of beer, New York leads and Pennsylvania, Illinois, Wisconsin, Missouri, New Jersey and Massachusetts follow in order. New York produces two-thirds as much as all the other States put together.

The brewing of beer is an interesting operation. After the malt grain has been ground it has to be thoroughly sifted. Every bit of dust must be got out. The sieves are studded with magnets which attract any metallic substances happening to be therein. When clean the malt is weighed and stored for future use. The next step is to mix the malt with water in a mash-tub where all the saccharine matter is extracted by intricate machinery. Huge copper kettles are the next receptacles for the sugar-laden liquid, while the discarded residue goes to feed animals.

This filtered, sugary liquid, called wert, is boiled for four hours before the hops are added, when it is boiled some more until the essence of the hops has been sufficiently extracted. Then the liquor is cleared of all uncharged albuminous substances and pumped up into a cooling tank. When sufficiently cool, fermentation by yeast begins and the saccharine principle is converted into alcohol and carbonic acid gas. This is accomplished in fermenting tuns. From these the liquor is racked off into settling vats, and from there it goes into storage casks. Storage casks remain in the cellar from five to eight months before their contents take another journey through miles of pipes for a further clarification. Then the liquor goes into casks and is ready for the bottler or the retailer.

PRESERVES THAT WILL KEEP.

A chemist of this city, who has been making a special study for the life and growth of ferment plants, says the remedy for this is double boiling. This must be done with a certain reason and system. If proper precautions are not observed, he says, you might keep right on boiling the things, time and again all the year round, and still they would spoil. Boiling will kill all the ferment plants that are developed from the spores, but it will not kill the spores.

Spores of ferment plants require only from eight to twelve hours to develop. If they are left longer than this time, the spores will have become new plants, and in turn have deposited new spores. To get rid of plants and spores, therefore, the preserves should have first a good boiling, and be set away in sealed vessels, and then about eight hours later be brought again just to a boiling heat. Treated in this way, the chemist says, no further trouble can occur unless new ferments get in from outside sources.—New York Sun.

MAN'S FALL.

Since the original fall of man we have had some signal examples of great falls—not to include Niagara or the immense fall in values which the times have brought about—in the nature of accidents which waylay men at all times. One such is that of Mr. George W. Lord, Olanta, Pa., who says he fell down stairs and suffered four weeks with a sprained back. The use of St. Jacobs Oil completely cured him. Mr. G. Roeder, 609 S. 17th St., Omaha, Neb., relates that he jumped from his engine in collision and sustained a very bad sprain to his ankle; he had to use a cane for weeks, but was finally cured by St. Jacobs Oil. Never fail out with so good a thing.

A World's Tribute.

America Leads the Nations in the March of Progress.

Among the wonders of the World's Columbian Fair the grandest was the exhibit of American products. The Exhibition was, in this respect, an object lesson of the grandeur and glory of the Republic. Among the exhibits from the United States no article of its class stood so high as

Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder.

The Chief Chemist of the Agricultural Department at Washington, backed by an intelligent jury at the Exposition, found it strongest in leavening power, peerless in its purity and beyond comparison in uniform excellence, Received Highest Award At the World's Fair.

The award is a matter of official record.

Nothing could settle so decisively the immeasureable superiority of Dr. Price's over all other powders as the great honor bestowed at Chicago.

Senator Stephen Salisbury has offered to give the city of Worcester, Mass., 65,000 feet of land, comprising the Salisbury homestead place, and valued at $250,000, as a site for a city hall, with an addition of $100,000 in cash toward erecting the municipal building.

There are rumors that St. Augustine, Fla., has suffered great damage by the West India hurricane. Other parts of Florida, cut off by the destruction to wires, cannot be heard from, but a belief that the damage will be found to have been heavy is growing.

LIFE OR DEATH?

It is of vital importance that it should be understood by persons whose kidneys are inactive, that this condition of things is finally inductive of a state of the organs where life hangs in the balance. Bright's disease, diabetes, albuminuria are all diseases of a very obstinate character in their mature stage, and all have a fatal tendency. They often baffle the most practiced medical skill, and the most approved remedies of materia medica. But opposed at the outset—that is to say, when the kidneys begin to discharge their functions inactively—with Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, the dangerous tendency is checked. Very useful, also, is this household medicine for those ailments of common occurrence—constipation, biliousness, dyspepsia and nervousness. It is a safeguard against malaria and averts chronic rheumatism.

No matter how it may be in other business, a man always kicks when he finds it dull in a barber shop.

Every sportsman who is "posted" and has a good gun uses "E. C." smokeless powder. It is used by Mr. Welch, the great amateur who is outshooting all competitors.

WOMAN'S SPHERE.

A Few Anecdotes Told by Prominent Women.

VERY SHORT, CRISP AND POINTED.

Not so Blind to a Sense of Humor as Some Men Suppose—Facts That Prove It.

Every now and then some man arises and announces that women have no sense of humor. He admits that school girls giggle and seem to enjoy jokes of an unintelligible nature, but claims that from the time she reaches the age of reason until she quits this vale of tears woman is blind to the point of jokes, gropes blindly about in the effort to grasp the meaning of anecdotes and is generally densely and hopelessly ignorant of the meaning of humor. That man has never attended a woman's meeting, never heard laughter wafted through the closed doors of a woman's luncheon, or even listened to the women whom he has taken down to dinner. Women are humorous. They enjoy jokes. They tell them surprisingly well, and they even have favorites. If women were really to enter into competition with Chauncey Depew and other diners-out, the reputation of those worthies would dwindle. Here are facts to prove it.

"I think my favorite dinner story," says Jeannette Gilder, the editor of the "Critic," "is of a colored woman who lived in my family for a number of years and who was more remarkable for her mispronunciations than for hiting the nail on the head in this respect. She got a general idea of a word and then gave you a composite pronunciation of it. You always knew what she meant, but it was an intuitive knowledge. One day she had been out to Central Park, and when she came back she came eagerly into my room—she was a privileged servitor—and said delightedly:

"'Miss Jean, I seen the hickapox!'

"'Where was it?' I asked; 'up a tree, or in a cage?' though I knew at once what it was that she had seen.

"'Oh, Miss Jean,' said she, with a deprecatory tone in her voice, 'who ever seen a hickapox up a tree—it lives in the water.'

"I could not suppress a smile, whereat she asked, reproachfully:

"'What have I said now?'

"I explained that her pronunciation of the name of that amphibious animal was not the one given in the dictionaries, and put her right in the matter, but she was not to be shaken in her faith.

"'I never could call it any name like that—hickapox is good enough for me!' was all she would say. And it has been good enough for me, too, ever since."

Dr. Grace Peckham Murray, who might be forgiven if she were too absorbed in her profession to provide herself with a store of jokes, is another who has several favorites.

"The kind I like best," she says, "is the one where the point is not evident at first sight—a rather subtle sort. There's the story of Adam and Eve, which I am fond of on that account. They were walking in the garden naming the animals. When they saw a toad Adam asked:

"'What shall we call that?'

"'Well,' answered Eve, 'since it's a toad, let's call it a toad.'"

Another of Dr. Murray's favorites is illustrative of the tactful way in which some people lead up to their jokes. A soldier of the war of 1812 was in the habit of telling a certain military tale whenever the opportunity offered itself. When it did not offer itself he made it by stamping on the floor and then saying:

"Hark! Did I hear a gun? Speaking of guns reminds me," and so on.

One of the stories Mary Wilkins is fond of telling is of a certain New England worthy whose duty it was during the winter to take care of a Brooklynite's New England summer home. One summer the Brooklynite found the stock of canned tomatoes which he had stored in his cellar marvelously diminished. He inquired of the care-taker what had become of them. The old man threw his head defiantly back and replied:

"Well, I don't reckon that one jewel will be misin' from my crown of glory in the next world; but I et them tomatoes an' they was good."

Mrs. Eva Wilder McGlasson goes into the literary world for her pet anecdote. It is one about Jeffrey and her daughter. The young woman had a suitor whose courage was equal to asking her to be his, but who could not bring himself to mention his desires to her father. Finally they decided to let her go in and pave the way. Jeffrey was writing busily and his pen scratched on while the young woman stumbled through her tale. Then, without looking up, he wrote something on a card, pinned it to her dress and pushed her out of the room. When she and the timorous young man read it they found it said: "With the compliments of the author."

Mrs. Christine Terhune Herick is almost as famous for her dinner jokes as for her dinner recipes. Here is one of her pet stories:

"When my eldest hopeful was about four years old he was much worried because his three-months'-old brother had no teeth. He tormented me by frequent inquiries into why and wherefore of the delay in their arrival.

"'My dear,' said I one day, when patience was at a low ebb, 'If you are so anxious for baby to get his teeth quickly you would better pray to God to send him some.'

"My youthful Thomas cast upon me a look of scorn.

"'And I fink 'Id beter pray to the dentist,' he retorted. 'God's got no teef.'"

This is a story which Modjeska is fond of telling on herself. She is a good deal of a believer in will power. On one of her summer jaunts she and a friend had discussed the subject. Her friend maintained that it was all nonsense to place much reliance in the will. And Modjeska stoutly claimed that by a mere exertion of will she could accomplish almost anything. They finally agreed to test it by having Modjeska fix her mind and will on the hour of 4 the next morning to see whether she would waken in time to catch a 5 o'clock boat.

"I clinched my hands and ground my teeth together," says Modjeska, "in my effort to fix my thoughts on 4 o'clock. Finally I fell asleep, convinced that no alarm clock could equal my brain. I awoke with a start. It was 1 o'clock. I fixed my mind again with a good deal of labor, for I was sleepy. I awoke again. It was half-past 2. For the third time I fixed my entire brain on the thought of 4 o'clock. I awoke for the third time. The sun was streaming in, the birds were twittering loudly, my friend was nearly dressed and it was a quarter past 8."

Dr. Jenie M. Lozier, the President of Sorosis, likes to tell a story about Modjeska.

"There were present," she says, "quite a number of brilliant literary and artistic women, and each was asked in turn for the making of what dish was she famous. I was asked whether cherry pie wasn't my great piece de resistance and I denied the soft impeachment and said lemon pie was.

"When it came Mme. Modjeska's turn she hesitated a moment, and then boldly said she could make coffee. Her husband openly scoffed at her being able to make anything and called for her recipe.

"'Well,' said the great actress, 'I take some—some water——,' here she hesitated.

"'Go on,' came cries from all over room.

"'Then I take——' another long pause, 'a lot of coffee,' she finished, triumphantly 'and that is how I make it!'"

Mrs. John Sherwood, busied in sending young girls to country homes, has letters from them which are of the pathetically humorous kind that is very attractive, and she sometimes uses these stories to enliven her readings and talks.

One of her favorites is the story of Annie, who was transported from Houston street to a home in Ulster County, and who wrote to her benefactor describing her pleasant life. After the fashion of women, she left the crowning glory of existence to the postscripts, and said: "P. S.—I sleep in a clean feather bed every night!" But that is the kind of humor which is near to tears.

Ella Wheeler Wilcox has a pet story, which is partly on her and partly on a certain magazine which accepted one of her maiden productions. Years passed and the production did not appear. The young woman married; she wrote and achieved fame, but still that youthful effusion was not published. Finally, she wrote to the editor:

"Several years ago you accepted a poem of mine which I sent under my maiden name. Since then I've married, and when you publish the poem I want it to appear under my present name, so that my grandchildren may know I wrote it." And the poem appeared promptly.

When Kate Field enters a street-car with a companion for a long ride up or down town, she often whiles away the time by telling her friends stories. They help her to forget the crowding and jolting and the straining horses. On such occasions she has been known to resurrect the good old English favorite about the man and woman who were so horribly sea-sick crossing the Channel. The stewardess found them sitting together on the deck, the woman leaning back with closed eyes and the man's head resting on her shoulder.

"Your husband seems to feel even worse than you do," said the stewardess, sympathetically.

The sick woman opened her eyes and glanced at her fellow-sufferer with a sort of despairing indifference. Then she gasped as she closed her eyes wearily again:

"He's not my husband; I'm sure I don't know who he is."

A LEGAL STANDARD FOR CHEESE.

As the cream fat is the most costly part of good cheese, there are constant efforts to abstract it from the milk, and then use such substitutes in the cheese as oleo oil, inferior butter, or vegetable oils. In order to protect honest makers against dishonest makers, and to so protect buyers and consumers, that they may be certain in regard to the character and sources of the materials from which the cheese is made, and thus be better able to judge its quality and value, Dr. L. L. Van Slyke of the New York State experiment station proposes that cheese which contains one and one-fourth or more pounds of milk fat for one pound of casein shall be legally known as full-cream, full-milk, whole milk or normal-milk cheese. He recommends from his extended series of investigations that all cheese which contains less than one and one-fourth pounds of fat for one pound of casein should be legally known as skim-milk cheese and that all factory cheese should be properly branded with one or the other of these names. He argues that the abstraction of the cream from the skim-milk cheese constitutes it an adulterated food, as it is thus made to hold more water, and its food value is much less than full-milk cheese. The motive which lies at the basis of the manufacture of skim-milk cheese is wrong, tending to demoralize dealers, and to injure the growth and prosperity of the cheese industry.—American Agriculturist.

COOKING SCHOOLS.

Defective Training the Cause of Much Poverty.

PRACTICE OF THE CULINARY ART.

Little German Girls Taught to Cook, Market and Keep House in a Practical Manner.—Dishes for the Poor.

Unless a remedy is found for certain existing evils in the larger cities of civilized countries their future inhabitants will all become the unhappy victims of indigestion.

This gloomy prospect includes all classes. Impecunious females look with aversion on the culinary vocation. Household work and cooking are their "dernier resort." Rich men's wives, on the other hand, are, as a rule, better parlor ornaments and piano-thumpers than roasters and bakers. In the upper stratum for society, therefore, only those who can or will be willing to pay the high salaries which the kitchen autocrats of the future will demand will be able to enjoy well-prepared and wholesome cookery.

It will be no better among the middle classes. Most mothers are unwise enough nowadays to neglect the education of their daughters in feminine domestic arts. The girls learn to be everything but good cooks and housekeepers. The hard-earned money of the breadwinner is spent to give them courses in vocal and instrumental music; to keep them in school until they can become teachers; to prepare them for a stage career; or they become clerks, cashiers, typewriters, milliners, dressmakers—fit for anything but the management of a household of children.

The professional man, scribe, clerk, or mechanic of the future who will feast on a square meal when he comes home from his day's work will be called blessed in his generation.

And what will be the fate of the proletarians. From the way the rich are getting richer and the poor poorer it would seem as if there is no need to worry much over the decline of the culinary art among them. There will, perhaps, be little or no food to cook for them. They will be lucky if they get the crumbs off the rich man's table. And supposing there will be enough earned to keep the cupboard filled, are the girls of the poor being taught frugality and how to cook plain and wholesome meals, so that they will grow up to be good housewives or efficient domestics? An investigation in the residence district of the laboring classes in any metropolis will reveal a sad state of affairs. The average poor man's daughter, after spending barely time enough in school to learn to sign her name, is made to earn something toward the support of the family. She rises before 6 and begins her day's work in the shop, store, or factory promptly at 7, and it is usually 7 p. m. before she gets a chance to swallow a hasty supper at home.

The hour or two that she can keep awake after she comes home is often spent away from the family circle. The wife of the future laborer will also be a poor cook and housekeeper. From dyspeptic misanthropes their husbands will evolve into despairing anarchists. Bad cookery will yet be one of the principal causes of future demagogic par oxysms.

Even in old Berlin, where the proverbial "echte Deutsche hausfrau" used to reign in all her glory, this social evil is now almost as bad as in other large cities. Well-meaning philanthropists are determined to ameliorate the conditions of the poor girls. The Germans are far-sighted enough to know that defective domestic training is the cause of much poverty and misery among the lower classes and the indigent. It has been ascertained statistically in the German capital that the inability of many housewives to make ends meet on small incomes is productive of matrimonial schisms, poor raising of children, the husband's preference for the saloon, and finally results in divorces.

Many workingmen with large families earn only from 1½ to 2 marks (a mark is less than 35 cents) per day, and from this the poor wife is expected to provide three good meals for a lot of hungry mouths, saving enough to pay for house rent and clothing. A difficult task indeed for the most frugal and experienced housekeeper!

How can the poor women be expected to fulfill their duty who immediately after confirmation must leave the parental home to begin a weary drudgery for a number of years as seamstresses, laundry women, factory girls, etc., until they are married, when they know less about cooking than the average society belle?

Berlin has now her cooking schools, not, however, as a fad for the daughters of capitalists to learn to make dainty angel cakes and charlotte russe, but for poor girls, who are instructed how to market and get the best of the wily stallkeepers and grocers, and how to prepare a square meal for a few pfennige. The institutions are called haushaltungsschulen, and no more popular innovation could have been introduced.

"Zur Guten Stunde" furnishes a finely illustrated description in its last issue of one of these establishments. The pedagogues in domesticity are all women, and experienced cooks and housekeepers, experts in the theory and practice of the culinary art.

Before the instruction proper begins the girls must daily repeat their chores—carry wood and water and start the fires. They are also given money with which to buy provisions. When they come in the class-room they must give reasons why they have perferred this or that part of the meat. They are taught the merits of the various parts of beef and veal for soups and all kinds of roasts and fries. Orally and from textbooks they receive lessons in vegetable and dairy food so that they will be enabled to determine the nutritive value of all kinds of fruits and greens.

The girls, of course, change places every day in the purchase of provisions. They are told exactly for how many to buy and they must bring neither too much nor too little.

They soon can tell precisely how much is required per head for a meal. Every child must cook alternately for large or small families, for invalids and for healthy individuals. The attention of the class in the theoretical instruction is called especially to such provisions as are the most nutritious and appetizing.

How to prepare a good meal from the leavings of a dinner forms one of the principal branches. This is very important, as the girls must be trained not to waste anything, and since a poor family cannot afford to buy fresh meats and vegetables for every meal.

The teachers do as little as possible of the practical work. Almost from the time the pupil enters she begins to fry and bake, and stew even at the risk of having some of the dishes spoiled or burned, for which they are gently reprimanded, when they will do better next time. The girls seem to take a deep interest in the course and feel proud when they have come so far that they can prepare a repast without the teacher's assistance. They vie with each other especially in the baking of cakes and pastry of all kinds, and are joyous when their work receives praise from teacher and pupils.

It has been observed that girls who had not the least taste for such occupation soon take to it wiht delight, and when they come home they surprise their hard-worked mothers with their learning, and soon assume their burdensome labors. Besides, it is noticed that they become more earnest and moral in demeanor, lovers of order and cleanliness. They feel the responsibility with which their sex has been divinely intrusted, and as they grow into young womanhood it is their ambition to show their ability in making some good, loving husband happy with their temperance, economy, and proficiency in all domestic duties.

The cooked victuals of the haushaltungsschulen are sold for a trifle to the prarents of the children or to the municipal institutions. One of the meals each day is given to the class. Even if these schools, established in various parts of the city, do not reduce all of the misery of the poor, they have the beneficent effect of equipping domestics and of keeping many girls out of the demoralizing factories. One of the great sources of complaints in large cities on the part of ladies who employ cooks and servant girls is that so few understand their work.

A good systematic training in such schools will remedy this evil, and girls themselves will see that a good home in a family where they can apply what they have learned is more remunerative and greatly preferable to almost any other employment.

In France and Belgium a course in cooking has for a long time been offered in the public schools and with great success. In Germany the first haushaltungsschule was begun in Chemnitz, Saxony. Others have been started in Naumburg, Karlsruhe, Kassel, Ebeerswalde, and Berlin.—A. S. in Inter-Ocean.

FOR PROSPECTIVE GUESTS.

Most women are socially inclined, and no doubt the pleasure of having one's own house is enhanced by a judicious amount of entertaining; but the way in which one does it makes a vast difference to the hostess and the guest.

Where there is much entertaining, it is absolutely necessary to comfort of mind to know when one's friends are coming to stay, and it is not only perfectly proper, but by far the best way, to send an invitation for a definite time. You wish to invite Cousin Abby in June, when the roses are out, and you know her usual visit is two weeks, so you write and ask her to come at a certain date, and you let her know that at such a date two weeks later you have planned to invite your dear friend, Mrs. A., from the city, who can come at no other time. Cousin Abby realizes the situation, and comes when she is asked. All these arrangements have to be calcuated beforehand, for in that way only can one comfortably invite the number of guests she wishes to entertain during the summer.

It is fairly exasperating to receive a letter from some thoughtless relative, saying, "I am coming pretty soon to stay a few days with you." What does it mean? How soon? How many days? You were just planning for a little trip yourself, and while you await this indefinite visitor, who, perhaps, changes her mind and does not come at all, the days are rapidly flitting by, and your chance for an outing is gone.

Relatives often take liberties with each other that they would never think of taking with friends, and it seems hard, sometimes, to make them understand that, while at one time they would be gladly welcomed, at another their visit may prove a great inconvenience.—Domestic Monthly.

The Queen of England, who is worth $200,000,000, probably never had a broom or dishcloth in her hands in her life. But the next queen, the Princess of Wales, when her father had an income of $1,200 per year, had to sew, cook, sweep and make her own dresses.

A beautiful granite monument has recently been placed over the grave of Dr. B. F. Stephenson, the founder of the Grand Army of the Republic, in Rosehill Cemetery, near Pittsburg, Ill. The monument will be unveiled some time this fall.

A CHINESE PRISON.

The Mongolian Jailer a Most Conscienceless Extortioner.

A TRIP THROUGH A MODEL JAIL.

How the Prisoners Fare in Other Places—Schedule of the Charges Made by Some Grasping Keepers.

There is one prison in the Orient which may be held up as a model establishment. It is situated in the center of this ancient and picturesque city, and presents a neat and attractive facade to the street on which it fronts. It is a large two-story building, with massive walls, spacious corridors and wide stairways. In front of the main entrance two soldiers armed to the teeth stand always on duty, while next door a handsome guardhouse shelters a company which supplies these sentries and has enough men to immediately suppress any insubordination or revolt no matter how serious. Only the outside and not the inside of the prison is under military protection and control.

One of the soldiers opened the wicket for us, and we stepped into the jail yard. It was roomy and clean enough to suit a mad health reformer.

The walls had been recently whitewashed, the wood and iron work painted and the stone walks and roadway, the doorways and yard saturated with liquids containing carbolic acid and chloride of lime. These substances, patricularly the latter, seemed to be everywhere. No matter what part of the buildings we visited, high or low, roof or cellar, these chemicals were offensively present. The jailer informed us that it was very rare to have sickness in the place.

"The stuff," he added, "the doctors bring and which smells so horrible seems to prevent it, and then it is so bad that when a man does get sick it either cures him quickly or else he dies."

The latter part of the assertion struck me as a novel and important discovery in disinfection. The ground floor of the buildings around me were not used for prisoners. A large part was used as a residence by the jailer, another portion as a residence for the turnkey. A third was a laundry, in which a steam engine and modern machinery assisted the washermen in their work. The rest was utilized for store rooms, work shops and offices.

We went up a wide stairway protected from the hot tropical sun by a heavy roof, and were in the vestibule of the jail proper. It was a large establishment, built in half Spanish and half Chinese style. The floors were covered with large brick tiles or else with stone flags. The walls and partitions, which were equally large, were constructed of brick and granite. The roof beams were huge trunks of teak and other insect-proof woods, and were at least twenty-five to thirty feet from the ground. The rooms were so high that they were always cool, dusky and well ventilated. A narrow window that reached almost from floor to ceiling let in a breeze that swept through every room and corridor, but only enough sunlight to lighten the interior without heating it. The coolness was still further increased by the damp tiles, which seem to absorb heat and never give it back. I went from cell to cell, if that term may be applied to rooms ten and twelve yards wide, twenty and thirty yards long and eight to ten yards high. We looked through a steel wicket in the cell door each time before entering and could see the inmates passing away their montonous time. None were manacled, not even a murderer, or even required to remain in one spot. Some were reading, others writing; some sewing, others playing cards; some were sleeping and others pacing restlessly to and fro. Everyone, no matter how crowded, was scrupulously clean and orderly.

After we had seen without being seen, for the corridors are so much darker than the cells that is well-nigh impossible to look out from the latter into the former, the jailer called out: "His Excellency comes," unlocked and unbarred the heavy door in a series of bangs and crashes and threw it wide open for Registrar General and our party to enter. As we came in the prisoners formed in line with a half-military precision, stopping whatever they had been doing before, except smoking their interminable cigarettes. They looked sheepish with but few exceptions, but seemed to thrive in their surroundings. Every one appeared to be healthy, active and vigorous. They ranged from one to twenty to a cell, and were a wonderfully mixed lot. I recall Portuguese, Spaniards, and Eurasians, Negroes and Chinese, Hindoos and Japanese, Malays and Manillamen. They ranged from blonde to coal black, from mere dwarfs to giants. All seemed to have caught the old-fashioned but courtly politeness of the Portuguese and bowed and smiled, smiled and salaamed when we appeared when we spoke to them and when we went away.

Very unlike the prison described are those supported by John Chinaman in other districts. Like everything else, they are historical institutions and are said to be the same to-day as in the days of Confucius. If this be true, I am very sorry for the people of his age. Theoretically a Chinese prison is a close approach to heaven; practically it is a slice, and not a small one, of hades. They are constructed on the same general plan as the official buildings of China. An outer wall with a gate and gate-keeper surrounds the place. Within this is a paved courtyard with houses for attendants on either side and an inner wall with gate and gate-keeper. This in turn opens upon a courtyard, ante-rooms and a court room. Behind this in another courtyard are the prisoners' quarters, consisting usually of small houses one-story in height with a barred door, no window, a clay or stone floor and a rotten, rain-penetrating roof. These dens or pens are indescribably filthy. They are seldom or never washed and the dirt accumulates in malodorous heaps in every corner and edge. The walls and roof are alive with vermin and other insects, while rats and parish dogs often dispute the right of occupancy with the luckless prisoner. Some are so low that a prisoner cannot stand upright; and some so narrow that he cannot lie down. The more uncomfortable and agonizing the quarters, the more is it esteemed and employed by the mercenary jailer and his satellites.

In another style, the prison proper is a series of small, dirty one-story houses about 20x20, in which are confined from eight to twenty inmates. The quarters of the jailer, or se yuki, are quite handsome, and worthy of a man with an income of $2,000 a year. As the se yuki receives a salary of about $50 a year it is obvious that he must have other sources of income. While there is no provision for any other public employee, unless it be gate-keepers and a night watchman, the jailer keeps a large, if not a respectable, retinue. He has three or four gate-keepers, eight or ten watchmen for the day and night, a torturer, a clerk, a scribe, several messengers and an indefinite number of hangers-on and of waiters who never wait and cleaners who never clean.

This army of cheap retainers receive little or no wages, but, like their superior, depend upon the prisoners for their living. They have only one law or rule, and that is that anything can be done for money. A bank robber or a skilled burglar need never saw the bars of his door or mine through stone walls in order to effect an escape. He can do it through the court room and the front door, escorted by the jailer in person, if he will pay the price demanded by the latter. If he should attempt to escape by actual flight his action would be considered an infamous endeavor to rob the jailer and his retainers, and he would receive a beating with a bamboo that would confine him for a week in bed. They carry their brutality to the verge of death. If a criminal is sentenced to be beheaded the executioner or jailer will call upon him and offer to kill him at one stroke of the sword for a certain sum of money, stating at the same time that the law allows him to bungle the job and prolong the agony two or three strokes.

The criminal or his family accept the offer and pay the money. It is but fair to add that the fellow keeps his word. If the money is paid the head falls off at the first blow, while if not paid the first blow inflicts a slight but painful wound, the second disfigures but does not kill, while the third or the fourth ends the tragedy.

The rapacity of these jailers is proverbial. Where our adages and humor refer to the horse-leech and the shark, the plumber and the ice man as models in this regard, the Chinese refer to the judicial mandarins and culminate with the jailer as the highest epitome of human greed.

As an illustration, the case of a wealthy merchant in Canton in July, 1892, may be cited. He was arrested on a trivial pretext and thrown into jail. He was kept without water, but received dirty rice cooked with a little salt in order to increase his thirst. This became so intolerable, especially by reason of the heat of the summer, that he was glad to buy a cup of dirty water for $200, a pot of tea for $250, a chicken for $500 and a bed for $500 a night. A fortnight's incarceration cost him about $30,000. The jailer knew his man was rich and could raise the money to pay his charges. Had the merchant been less opulent, the charges would have been lighter. The treatment would have been exactly the same.

A sick prisoner in jail at Amoy who was neither rich nor poor, but merely prosperous, paid his jailer as follows:

For sending for the doctor, $5; for letting him see the M. D., $10; for making the medicine, $5; for letting him take the medicine, $10; for sending for a relative, $2; for letting him see the relative, $5; for letting his son send him a dinner, $5; for eating the dinner, $20.

Still another way of extorting money is to accuse a prisoner of trying to escape or violating a prison rule, or to accuse the friend or relative who calls to see him in his distress or disgrace of some technical offense. The fear of receiving a hundred blows of the bamboo, of sitting in the stocks for a week or of wearing a cangue a month is sufficient to raise a goodly amount of cash from even the very poor. Then there is the torture, of which we Americans know but little. Thanks to the treaties between China and the great powers, neither Europeans nor Americans can be tried in a native court. To what extent they employ torture we do not know. It depends largely upon the discretion of the magistrate and the rapacity of the jailer. These things are skillfully managed in the East. They know how to inflict pain so as to cause a sufferer to faint promptly or to remain conscious for hours. They understand how to apply opium, morphine or other anesthetics without exciting the suspicion of third parties or injuring the prisoner. For a large sum they will deprive the torture of most of its terrors. The mortality in Chinese prisons is extremely large. Why it is no larger is a mystery to any person who has ever seen one.—Margherita Arlina Hamm, in Mail and Express.

One good, hearty laugh is a bombshell exploding in the right place, while spleen and discontent are a gun that kicks over the man who shoots it off.—De Witt Talmage.

A BOY'S IMPRESSIONS.

Life in the Interior of Old Mexico.

AS VIEWED BY A YOUNG AMERICAN.

Wages are 37 Cents Per Day, Yet People Live and Clothe Large Families—Their Religious Duties.

The following letter, descriptive of life in the interior of Old Mexico, was written by Fred Birtwhistle, a seventeen-year-old American boy, who went a few months ago to join his fortunes with those of his uncle, in the mining country near Nieves Zacatecas:

Well, this is a wonderful country and a peculiar people. There are two distinct classes, the peons, or poor people, and the better class. The peons are nothing better than slaves. They work, when they work at all, for what in our country a common laborer will make in two hours. Wages here are 37½ cents per day (tres reales), yet these people manage to live and clothe a large family out of this, and always save enough money to be able to bet on a cock-fight on Sunday afternoon—for a Mexican is a born gambler. The native costume is very fashionable, heavy cotton called manta is the clothing material. The trousers are made in a very rough manner, two rough strips are sewed together without any regard to fit. That makes the trousers. The shirt is on a similar order, with two holes for arms and one for the neck, the most loosely constructed suit of clothes I have seen in a long while. The native women have usually a red flannel skirt, and an exceedingly decolette waist. This is the costume of both sexes among the lower class. On the contrary, a Mexican dandy, when he is promenading on the plaza on a Sunday afternoon in his best, wears trousers that fit so tight that they look as if they were molded on him, always profusely fitted out with silver buttons down the sides—the buttons generally clank like slave-chains when he walks—long, narrow-pointed shoes, regular "toothpick" shoes. I don't see where the toes come in at all. He also wears a coat that barely reaches to the pants behind, giving the appearance of his being hump-backed, his vest always bears his initials, or in some cases the full name, on the same order as the name of a baseball club is put on the shirt of the player. An immense sombrero caps his head, so weighed down with silver and gold trimming that I would have a headache in five minutes if I were to wear it. This, with the everlasting cigarette in his mouth, completes him, and he is ready to promenade on the plaza or pass his girl's house to his heart's content. The dress of the girls is quite ridiculous to a person coming as I do from a large city. A few years ago one of the girls from Nieves went to Mexico to school. While there she learned considerable she never knew of. On her return there was a complete dress reform in Nieves. The old Spanish dresses made way for this girl's ideas of American dress, and the result is "killing." An American girl of fashion would die of laughter in a few hours could she see these girls as they walk on the plaza on a Sunday.

Sunday is the great sport day in Mexico. A Mexican will rise early on this morning and very religiously attend church. It is only skin-deep with him, for he is then ready for all the amusements of the day. In the afternoon he either goes to a bull or cock-fight, where he has an excellent opportunity to show his betting proclivities, and in the evening he gets drunk. This is a part of his religion which he never neglects. The native drinks here are awful. Our strongest whisky or rum at home is tame alongside of them. The two strongest are "peciela" and "mescale." The latter is made from a species of cactus. It is a perfect liquid fire, and a few small glasses drives a man almost crazy, so strong are its effects. Yet these people smack their lips, get roaring drunk over it, and for a day or two they are as sick as dogs. Then they turn around and do it over again.

I have often heard of the politeness of the Japanese, but do not believe it can equal a Mexican's. Politeness is carried to such excesses that it is sometimes very disagreeable. Meet a person whom you know on the street and he will stop, shake hands with you, inquire after your health, your family, and several generations back. With another shake he will leave. This you have to go through with a hundred times a day.

WAITING.

Few words in the English language have so great significance as the word waiting, and few whose significance is so universally felt. It touches the loftiest intellect and is felt no less by the humblest and most ignorant.

Life is made up of waiting. We wait with tired brain and weary body for the falling of the shades of night which shut out the turmoil of day, and wrap the world in peaceful slumbers. Watching by the sick-bed of a friend, or racked by suffering, we wait for the rosy dawn which shall dispel the shadows that grow more weird as the night wanes. We wait for tidings from absent ones; we wait for their return, sending far out our anxious gaze to catch the first glimpse of their familiar forms. We wait for the development of infancy into intelligent childhood, and we wait for the fruition of our hopes in the perfect manhood or womanhood of the child we nurtured in our bosom. We wait for success in our undertakings; we wait while the wheel of time, slowly and surely turning, brings us the good we have striven for.

FRIDAY, NOV. 16.....1894

Los Angeles, Nov. 8.—In the Supreme Court this morning the case of the people against Richard Heath was dismissed. Heath was charged with the murder of Attorney W. H. McWhirter in Fresno nearly two years ago, and has stood two trials in Fresno county with a "hung jury" at each trial. A change of venue was taken after the last trial to Los Angeles county and the case set for today, and when called today was dismissed. The case has cost the county of Fresno over $100,000 with no conviction, and they do not feel that they have a certainly of any conviction here and do not wish to go to any further expense.

The fight for Governor has been a bitter one, but aside from a firm denial the Democratic candidate never looked back on his traducer. He bore the standard on to victory. Perhaps no candidate was more vigorously assailed, perhaps no other ever made his aim so sublime, and led forward with more vim and determination. His idea was to win for himself and party and he has done it. If his administration be conducted with the same energy and honest determination, (and it will be) what a wealth will the election bring to our State. It is incalculable.

The predictions in regard to an advance in the wheat market seem in a fair way to be realized. Prices are again on the upgrade from the abnormally low point which was reached under bear pressure. Everything now points to a sharp reaction in the markets all over the world, with possibly a discovery that the stocks are not so heavy as estimates in the past would make out. A decline in prices to such an anomalous position, far beneath the cost of production, would naturally favor a change to more favorable conditions under an ordinary range of circumstances.

It is extremley amusing to hear the Republican leaders gravely talking about Democratic frauds in San Francisco. The registrar of voters for that city is Mr. Evans, the brother-in-law of Dan Burns, and the latter named all the election boards in addition. If a contest should be made, Mr. Budd would probably gain from five to ten thousand votes, as Burns unquestionably attempted to count him out, but found the landslide too overwhelming.

Some of the railway men who were thrown out of work by their actions during the late strike have formed a company which proposes to build a railway from San Diego across the continent. It is organized on a co-operative basis The late employees who are now officers of a railway company, by the time that they have a section of road under operation, may change the views they had last summer about sympathetic strikes.

There was never such a sweep on Congressmen as the Republicans have made. In the present Congress the Democrats have 218 members, while in the Congress to come the Republicans are likely to have between 250 and 260. The Senate, also, is likely to be recovered, although there the two Silver Party Senators — Jones and Stewart— may hold the balance of power.

Democrats will rejoice with Republicans in the defeat of Governor Waite of Colorado. His violent course, his wild theories of government and advocacy of revolutionary methods in solving the great economic and financial questions that devide the country deserved the rebuke which he has received at the polls.

Governor Flower has announced his willingness to allow experts to make a test to ascertain whether a man killed in the electrical chair can be resuscitated. None of the gentlemen who claim that "electrocution" is a sham appear to be anxious to receive the regulation "jolt" in the interest of science.

Mrs John Martin, who figured conspicuously in the contested Martin will case. is going on the stage. She has got to act better than she did at the trial to get anything like an audience.

A Parisian Industry.

A Paris correspondent describes one of the oddest industries of that city to be found in a little shop in the Rue des Ecoles, which deals exclusively with the secondhand boots of the men who work in the sewers. These boots are furnished by the state and come half way up the thigh, and each man is allowed a new pair every six months. When new, they cost $9; when sold secondhand, they realize the modest sum of 50 cents, but as at least 6,000 pairs per annum are sent to the Rue des Ecoles it makes quite a booming industry. The leather of these boots is, so to speak, tanned by the alkaline and greasy water in which the sewer cleaners paddle, and they are eagerly sought for by the great Parisian bootmakers, for this leather, being at once tough and light, serves to sustain the curve of the Louis XV heel.

His Favorite Color.

Old Mr. Kerr-Muggeon, who agrees with George II in hating "poetry and painting," and who is never agreeable except when he is smoking, was engaged in this favorite amusement on his doorstep when Mrs. Gusscher passed.

"Oh, Mr. Kerr-Muggeon," she said, "I am glad to see you enjoying the beauties of nature!"

"Heh? What d'ye mean?" asked Mr. Kerr-Muggeon.

"Why, weren't you looking at the sunset?"

"The sunset! Well, no, not just exactly. But, now that you mention it, it does look fine, doesn't it? Looks a good deal like a meerschaum pipe just after it's begun to color!"—Youth's Companion.

An old Dutch legend says that Thomas a Becket cursed the Kentishmen of England, who spitefully cut off his horse's tail, and that the entire generation of Kent which followed wore tails like horses.

Order of Adjudication of Insolvency.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE County of Inyo, State of California.

Pierre Beyeye and Francois Hagata, Co-partners under the firm name of P. Beyeye & Co., Insolvent Debtors.

Pierre Beyeye and Francois Hagata, Co-partners under the firm name of P. Beyeye & Co., having filed in this Court their petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, from which it appears that they are insolvent debtors, the said Pierre Beyeye and Francois Hagata, Co-partners under the firm name of P. Beyeye & Co., are hereby declared to be insolvent. It is hereby ordered that the Sheriff of the said County of Inyo be, and he is hereby appointed Receiver of the property of said Insolvents and that upon his giving a bond to the people of the State of California, conditioned as required by law, and in such sum as the Court may order, and qualifying, he take charge and possession of all the estate real and personal, of said insolvent debtors, whatsoever and wheresoever situate, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all their deeds, vouchers, books of account and papers; and to keep and care for and dispose of the same until the appointment of an Assignee of their estate. All persons having the same or any part thereof in his or their possession are hereby directed to deliver said property to said Receiver, and all persons owing money to said insolvents, or either of them, are hereby directed to pay the same to said Receiver, and that said Receiver keep said property, or the proceeds thereof, till the further order of this Court. And all persons are hereby forbidden to pay any debts to said insolvents, or to deliver any property belonging to such insolvents, or either of them, to him or them, or any person, firm, corporation or association for their use, and the said debtors are hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered.

It is further ordered, that all the creditors of said debtors be and appear before the Hon. Geo. M. Gill, Judge of the Superior Court of the said County of Inyo, in open court at the court-room of said court in the town of Independence, in said County of Inyo, on the 22nd day of December, 1894, at 10 o'clock a. m. of that day, to prove their debts and choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtors. It is further ordered, that this order be published in the Inyo Independent, a newspaper of general circulation, published in the County of Inyo, as often as the said paper is published before the day set for the meeting of creditors.

And it is further ordered, that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvents be stayed.

Dated November 14th, 1894.

Sunday Schools, Fort and Lone Pine 10 a. m.; Independence, 2 p. m.

Remember the social dance on Monday evening.

O. I. Mairs visited Bishop early in the week.

F. W. Holbert was down from Big Pine yesterday.

J. W. Lacy came up from Lone Pine this morning.

Wm. Rowan was down from Bishop early in the week.

Ed Walker and W. T. Grant came up from Olancha on Tuesday.

The complete official election returns will be found in this issue.

Tom Williams of Round Valley spent several days in town this week.

The board of Supervisors met last Monday to canvess the election returns.

Mrs. C. H. Parsons of Bishop visited Independence at the close of last week.

The President has proclaimed Thursday November 29 as Thanksgiving day this year.

Mrs W. H, Uhlmeyer of Big Pine spent several days in town this week visiting with friends.

Mr. and Mrs. M. B. Miller started for Los Angeles on Wednesday last, going by way of Mojave.

Henry Rhine arrived home last Monday from an extended visit to Los Angeles and San Francisco.

S. G. Sneeden Esq. came down from Bishop last Friday remaining in town until Tuesday morning.

Ed. Schober of Bishop passed through town this morning with a six horse team and load of flour.

Two men of the Salvation Army entertained an audience at the M E Church three nights the past week.

Mr. John Shepherd, who has been so ill of late, suffered a relapse yesterday but at latest reports last night was better.

F. K. Andaews, T. F. A. Connelly and Henry Gerkin came down from Bishop last Saturday on business in the local land office.

Sportsmen are hereby strictly forbidden to hunt or shoot upon my premises.
F. Schabbell.
Camp Independence.

Owing to a typographical error last week the average percentage of attendance of our Independence school was given as 89 when it should have been 98.

Pat Keys came in from the White Hills yesterday. He just finished a run at the McVoy Mill that yielded eighty dollars per ton. He has been in poor health for some time past and will go to San Francisco soon for medical treatment.

A Rich Strike at Goler.

J. W. Bledsoe is in from Goler, and brings the good news that he and his partner, I. B. Hobson, have made a good strike there which promises splendidly. On the mountain between Goler and Red Rock camp they have found a ledge of decomposed quartz four feet wide which carries gold in large quantities. As soon as he can arrange his affairs here, Mr. Bledsoe will return to Goler with the necessary appliances for working the claim. There are from 250 to 300 men in both camps, and much placer gold continues to be taken out.—Californian.

A Marvellous Showing.

The U. S. Government, through the Agricultural Department, has been investigating the baking powders for the purpose of informing the public which was the purest, most economical and wholesome.

The published report shows the Royal Baking Powder to be a pure, healthful preparation, absolutely free from alum or any adulterant, and that it is greatly stronger in leavening power than any other brand.

Consumers should not let this valuable information, official and unprejudiced, go unheeded.

DROP YOUR BUCKET WHERE YOU ARE

"Oh, ship ahoy!" rang out the cry;
"Oh, give us water or we die!"
A voice came over the waters far,
"Just drop your bucket where you are."
And then they dipped and drank their fill
Of water fresh from mead and hill;
And then they knew they sailed upon
The broad mouth of the Amazon.

O'er tossing wastes we sail and cry,
"Oh, give us water or we die!"
On high, relentless waves we roll
Through arid climates for the soul;
'Neath pitiless skies we pant for breath
Smit with the thirst that drags to death,
And fail, while faint for fountains far,
To drop our buckets where we are.

Oh, ship ahoy! you're sailing on
The broad mouth of the Amazon;
Whose mighty currents flows and sings
Of mountain streams and inland springs,
Of night kissed morning's dewy balm,
Of heaven dropt evening's twilight calm,
Of nature's peace in earth or star—
Just drop your bucket where you are.

Seek not for fresher founts afar,
Just drop your bucket where you are;
And while the ship right onward leaps,
Uplift it from exhaustless deeps;
Parch not your life with dry despair,
The stream of hope flows everywhere.
So, under every sky and star,
Just drop your bucket where you are.

A BICYCLE GHOST.

A group of cyclists were seated around the fire in the comfortable inn of Point-y Pridd, in North Wales. Their talk was of thrilling experiences on the wheel, and just as the interest was beginning to flag Tom Bodkin asked if any one of the company had ever seen a ghost upon a bicycle. Nearly all of them laughed at the idea.

"Don't laugh, gentlemen," said Bodkin quietly, "I saw one!"

"The thing happened in this way. To begin at the beginning Dick Naggs and myself were running neck and neck for a dear little girl whom I shall call Sophie Byles.

"Sophie was a tormenting little witch. She flirted with both of us in a thoroughly impartial way, and if either of us attempted any of those foolish remonstrances that fellows desperately in love will sometimes venture on in such provoking circumstances, she would only toss her dainty little head and, elevating her slightly retrousse nose, shrug her shoulders disdainfully and say, 'Please don't speak to me any more, Tom'—or Dick, as the case might be.

"Now Dick and I, strange to say, were the best of friends, although we were the best of rivals. We had been chums for several years, lodging in the same 'digs' and getting on together capitally.

"When we discovered that we were both hopelessly gone over Sophie we had a long talk over the matter, and the upshot of it was that we shook hands over a fair agreement to go in for her, each of us, fairly and squarely, and let the best man win, neither taking any mean advantage of the other.

"Things went on very nicely under this working arrangement for about six months. I often met Dick riding back after visiting Sophie at her suburban cottage near Stepaside, and he as often met me, but no oftener, for it was in the bond that such visits should be exactly equal in number.

"We always laughed good humoredly at each other when we met thus, chaffed each other about our prospects of success and went off and had a drink; so you see we were honorable chums.

"For some months we led this sort of life, and nothing could possibly be more satisfactory to either Dick or me—unless either of us would take himself forever to Jericho, out of the other's way. But as this was a very remote contingency indeed, we accepted the situation in a spirit of beatific cheerfulness and made the best we could of it.

"Sophie had only one relative living—but that was quite a sufficient number. It was her father—and he was a terror.

"Among the virtues Mr. Byles rejoiced in—and they were too numerous to particularize—was that of rigid honesty. He had never got into debt to the extent of a penny in his life, he used to boast, and he detested people who did.

"The old man seemed to have an impartial sort of liking for both Dick and me. He didn't object to our paying our addresses to his daughter, but seemed to be trying, like ourselves, to find out which of us she liked best—perhaps with equal unsuccess. At any rate, he always met us civilly, and chatted to us in his own dry way on such interesting topics as the weather and the crops, the stock and share markets and the like.

"Dick and myself were then in the enjoyment of a modest income each—quite enough for him, for he was not of an extravagant turn; but hardly enough for me, for my tastes were more luxurious.

"However, financial matters are not in Dick's case, any more than my own, ever thought of for a moment in connection with our mutually dear Sophie. We would have taken her without a penny, but we knew very well she wouldn't come so whenever she made up her mind.

"One evening I met Dick riding back from Stepaside, after one of his regulation visits, as I was going out to take his place. He jumped off his bicycle and came over to me in a state of great perturbation.

"'Tom,' said he, 'I'm in great trouble, old fellow. I have to go away for a fortnight. There's a maiden aunt of mine very ill over in Homburg, and she wants to see me.'

"'I don't see why you should, my boy,' I replied; neither do I perceive why you should be so dreadfully agitated. You're a lucky dog, so you are—coming in for a fortune.'

"'Don't see it!' he cried, opening his eyes in astonishment. 'What is Sophie to do in my absence?'

"'Don't trouble your head about that,' I answered. 'She'll get along just as usual, I'm sure.'

"'But you—you won't surely take any advantage of my absence, Tom? If I had your promise on that I'd feel quite relieved.'

"'Well, that's rather hard, Dick,' I returned. 'I don't see why my arrangements should be affected by your maiden aunt's proceedings. The old lady is not going to make me her heir.'

"'But don't you see, Tom, that my absence would be giving you an unfair advantage? You're too honorable a fellow, I know, to avail yourself of it.'

"'Look here, Dick,' I said at length, after he had gone on in this strain for awhile, 'I'll go this far to oblige you. I'll not come out here again for a fortnight. If you're back by that time, well and good. If you're not, the bargain is at an end.'

"'Do you give me your word on that, Tom,' he asked, brightening up.

"'I do,' I returned; 'you may haunt me when you die if I break it. Now be off.'

"We shook hands and parted, and when I saw our beloved Sophie I informed her of the arrangement agreed upon. She said she didn't mind, as she was going on a visit to a friend in Wicklow for a week.

"I was discussing breakfast one morning a week afterward, glancing over the newspaper now and then as I feasted, when suddenly my eye caught the heading—'Fatal Accident to a Dublin Gentleman.'

"I immediately looked at the item, and to my horror found that it related to my unhappy friend Dick. He had jumped out of a railway carriage while the train was in motion, got jammed between it and the platform, and was killed.

"The news upset me a good deal, although I could not help feeling that it cleared the ground for me in one important direction. Still, I was very much attached to poor Dick, and I couldn't bring myself to visit Sophie for a couple of days after I had heard the sad tidings, in order to break them to her.

"The year was fast getting into the sere and yellow leaf; brown October had brought its short and its (sometimes) lovely moonlight nights, and it was one of these—a glorious one it was—that I started off, with an equally balanced admixture of grief and hopeful elation at my heart, for the bower of my Sophie—my own Sophie, as I fondly hoped soon to call her now—to unfold my grewsome tale.

"I had got about half way toward my destination, when it occurred to me that I ought to strike a match and have a quiet puff of the soothing weed, as nothing could be more in keeping with the peaceful quiet of the scene. No sooner thought of than done, and I was in the act of remounting with pipe aglow, when my eye caught sight of another rider coming in the same direction, but at a considerable distance behind.

"This circumstance caused me no emotion in particular, and I forgot all about it as I sped on afresh. I slackened my pace to spin out the distance until I had finished my pipe, and was drawing on easily toward Stepaside, when some instinct or other made me glance backward down the road again.

"The other traveler had gained upon me with amazing celerity. He was now not more than forty or fifty yards behind.

"What a wonderful resemblance he bore at that distance to my dead friend, Dick! His garments looked white in the ghostly moonlight. Dick, when riding all last summer, had worn a suit of white flannel, as the stranger's seemed to be. And it appeared to me, as I paused, thunderstricken and trembling, for a moment in my ride that his form was exactly that of my dead friend!

"I was never superstitious, yet now for an instant a feeling of awe came over me; but as I wobbled to the ground of my machine, under its influence, I began to curse myself vigorously for a womanish fool, and, jumping up with the celerity of fully recovered spirits, I set my steel steed off with a lively start, and began to race away from the awesome stranger.

"I went at a spanking pace for some time, but I could not help turning my head backward again soon, to note how far I had left him behind.

"Horror of horrors! he was gaining on still!

"He was only a few yards behind. I could not distinguish his face, but the figure and the way in which it sat the machine were the same as Dick's.

"Again I spurted madly. Great beads of cold sweat burst out upon my temples and an icy feeling crept through my frame, even to the marrow of my bones, despite the heat into which the exercise had thrown me. My terror lent me strength. I must get away from this horrible phantom, even though my heart should snap in the effort. I tore along the road now like a maniac.

"I was just turning the corner of the rustic lane which led up to Sophie's bower when my machine came plump against a form doing the same from the lane side of the angle. The consequence was disastrous to both travelers.

"Machine and myself threw a double somersault over the body of the pedestrian. When we both regained our feet I thought I should turn into stone when I encountered the Gorgonlike eye of my intended father-in-law.

"'Hang it, man!' he shouted, as soon as he recognized me and found his voice, 'what the dickens are ye staring at me for instead of apologizing for nearly killing me? One would think you had seen a ghost.'

"'I have seen a ghost, sure enough, sir,' I answered, with trembling lips; 'the ghost of my poor dead friend Dick; and see, there it comes!'

"The white figure had arrived at the corner of the lane, full in the ghastly glare of the dazzling moonlight. It dismounted and advanced toward where we stood.

"I held up both my hands to shut out the fearsome sight.

"'Don't come near me,' I cried in an agony of desperation, 'until you tell me whether you are a man or the ghost of my dead friend Dick.'

"The thing laughed; it was a horrible, human laugh.

"'No ghost, sir,' it replied as its coarse chuckle ceased, 'but a messenger from a man who has ghosted you long enough in vain for his little bill of seven pounds ten for clothes—Mr. Tippet, the tailor, of Grafton street. Here 'tis for you, sir, now, and if you don't pay it by 12 o'clock to-morrow I'm instructed to invite you to an interview with the recorder at Green street court house.'

"This was my romance of the wheel. It shattered my day dream and lost me my Sophie. Old Byles turned on me with all the scorn of an enraged money lender who never owed a man a penny, and bade me never again show my face at the cottage.

"The fickle Sophie ratified this decision, and shortly afterward married a pawnbroker, who had, a couple of months before, laid his third spouse under the sod in Glasnevin; and I am left here alone with my faithful bicycle."

A Long Haired Dwarfess.

Rich Valley, Va., has a veritable dime museum curiosity in the person of the twenty-year-old daughter of Nathan Harris. Although little Miss Harris is now old enough to seriously contemplate the drawbacks of an old maid's existence, she is not as large as the average child of five years. On her nineteenth birthday she measured but 35 inches in height and weighed 39½ pounds. She is a not a stunted hunchback, as are a great majority of the so called dwarfs, but is a perfect Venus in miniature, pleasing and intelligent, and with a beautiful head of hair sweeping like a train across the carpet when she cares to let it down for the admiration of her many friends.

She is the oldest of four children, all the others being of regulation size. Her parents as well as herself shrink from notoriety. She declares that she would not go before the public for all the world, and that she expects to live and die in the beautiful Virginian valley that has always been her home.—St. Louis Republic.

A Mother's Story.

HAPPINESS COMES AFTER YEARS OF SUFFERING.

The Terrible Experience of a Well Known Official's Wife—A Story That Appeals to Every Mother in the Land.

From the Chattanooga, Tenn., Press.

No county official in East Tennessee is better known and more highly esteemed than Mr. J. C. Wilson, Circuit Court Clerk of Rhea County, at Dayton, the home of Mr. Wilson. He enjoys the confidence and respect of all classes, and in the business community his word is as good as his bond. Just now Mr. Wilson is receiving heartiest congratulations from his numerous friends because of the restoration to robust health of his estimable wife, who has for years been a helpless invalid. Mrs. Wilson's high standing in society, and her many lovable traits of character have won her a host of friends, and her wonderful recovery has attracted wide spread attention.

As the Press was the medium of bringing to the invalid lady's attention the remedy that has effected her remarkable cure, a reporter was sent to Dayton to interview Mrs. Wilson, in order that the general public might have the benefit of the sufferer's experience and be made aware of the treatment that wrought such a marvelous change in her condition. The reporter was welcomed at the Wilson home, and the enthusiastic lady with becoming reluctance gave the history of her affliction and the manner in which she was relieved:

"Yes," said Mrs. Wilson, "I was for 8 years an invalid with one of the most distressing afflictions woman can suffer. For 8 years I moped around, dragging myself with difficulty and pain out of bed. My little ones went untrained and were greatly neglected, while I looked listlessly and helplessly at the cheerless prospect before me and them. I suffered the most intense pains in the small of my back, and these seemed even greater in the region of the stomach, extending down to the groins. I suffered agony sleeping or awake. Despair is no word for the feeling caused by that dreadful sensation of weakness and helplessness I constantly experienced.

"I was treated for my trouble by several local physicians, but they were able to give me only temporary relief by the use of sedatives and narcotics. I had almost given up all hope of ever securing permanent relief when I saw an account in the Press of a cure which Dr. William' Pink Pills had effected. I decided to try them, as I knew the lady who had been cured and had great confidence in her statement. I began to take the pills in October, 1893, and in two months I was doing light housework and attending to the children without any bad effects or weakness, such as I had formerly experienced. Hitherto, I had been unable to retain any food, but now my appetite grew stronger, and with it came back that old, healthy and hearty tone of the stomach. Dr. Williams' Pink Pills cured me, and I assure you the cure has brought a great change in our home. I can now rejoice in my husband's success, for I feel that I have something to live for. Who has a better right to feel this than a mother? One thing more. I have recommended these pills to others, and many of the women of Dayton have taken them with good results, and it is my greatest pleasure to recommend to every suffering woman a remedy that has done so much for me."

An analysis proves that Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People contain in a condensed form all the elements necessary to give new life and richness to the blood and restore shattered nerves. They are an unfailing specific for such diseases as locomotor ataxia, partial paralysis, St. Vitus' dance, sciatica, neuralgia, rheumatism, nervous headache, the after effects of la grippe, palpitation of the heart, pale and sallow complexions, that tired feeling resulting from nervous prostration; all diseases resulting from vitiated humors in the blood, such as scrofula, chronic erysipelas, etc. They are also a specific for troubles peculiar to females, such as suppressions, irregularities, and all forms of weakness. In men they effect a radical cure in all cases arising from mental worry, overwork, or excesses of whatever nature.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People are now manufactured by the Dr. Williams' Medicine Company, Schenectady, N. Y., and are sold in boxes (never in loose form by the dozen or hundred, and the public are cautioned against numerous imitations sold in this shape) at 50 cents a box, or six boxes for $2.50, and may be had of all druggists, or direct by mail from Dr. Williams' Medicine Company.

AGRICULTURAL VALUE OF RAIN.

The Government report on the condition of the corn crop which was issued early in July, indicated, when translated into figures of quantity, a yield of at least 2,000,000,000 bushels. The same report issued early in September, when treated in the same way, stands for a crop that will not, at the outside, exceed 1,500,000,000 bushels, and some of the authorities put it at between 1,300,000,000 and 1,400,000,000. As indicated by the condition there has been a reduction here in the past two months of at least 500,000,000 bushels in the prospective yield, and possibly of 600,000,000 or 700,000,000. What caused this immense falling off in the crop? The absence of rain in the corn belt in July and August.

Here is furnished the basis for a calculation of the value of rain to the country in the crop-growing period. Estimating corn at about 50 cents a bushel, or a little less, which would be the price perhaps on the larger yield, this falling off of, say 500,000,000 bushels represents a loss of about $250,000,000 to the country. This immense destruction of prospective wealth or capital, moreover, merely covers the loss in corn. In hay, which is one of the heaviest of all the country's destructive crops, the damage must have reached $100,000,000 or $150,000,000. Then, too, the late wheat and the oat and rye crops are to be taken into the account, which, put together, perhaps suffered a loss of $150,000,000 at least. If we take the fruit and vegetable crops also into the account, the sum of $1,000,000,000 as an estimate of the damage to the country by the drouth in the summer months is hardly an extravagant figure, even if the higher prices to the producer, caused by the shrinkage in the product, be kept in view.—Globe Democrat.

Generally the crops all in California are secured, excepting the raisin grapes, the bean crop and a few late varieties of fruit, which are now being gathered.

THE MONEY THAT CIRCULATES FASTEST.

"Hello! that's bogus," said a ticket agent passing back a well-worn nickel.

The coin looked to me exactly like the regular thing, and I was curious to know how the ticket man could tell it on sight.

"Oh, it's easy enough," he said. "Feel it."

I felt it. I couldn't feel anything but the price of one beer in it. Then I took out another nickel and felt that. They looked alike, only the spurious coin was more worn than the genuine.

"That's because they circulate faster than good ones," said the ticket man. "Counterfeit bills and counterfeit coin," continued the philosopher, "are apt to wear out quickly. You see, people always and very naturally want to get rid of them. Some man got that nickel you just gave me, don't you know, and he shoved it out immediately, the fellow who got it passed it on as soon as possible, and the next fellow bought something with it, and so on until you got it and I shoved it back on you, see? Now you know it is counterfeit you'll naturally get rid of it the first chance you get, probably on a horse car-conductor; he'll give it in change to some woman, and she'll put it off so quick your head'll swim. There are so many of these bad nickels and so little thought of it that they 'go.' It takes bad money to circulate rapidly."

Barthelemy St. Hiliare, the French author and statesman, who is now ninety, writes and corrects his proof-sheets without the use of spectacles. He believes in the doctrine of hard work, and says: "If you want to live to be old be always at work and diligently. Do not listen to those who aspire to save money to rest. They are lazy bodies."

"People lift their eyebrows," says William Morris, the English poet, "over women mastering the higher mathematics. Why it is infinitely more difficult to learn the details of good housekeeping. Anybody can learn mathematics, but it takes a lot of skill to manage a house well."—Boston Transcript.

LIFE OR DEATH?

It is of vital importance that it should be understood by persons whose kidneys are inactive, that this condition of things is finally inductive of a state of the organs where life hangs in the balance. Bright's disease, diabetes, albuminuria are all diseases of a very obstinate character in their mature stage, and all have a fatal tendency. They often baffle the most practiced medical skill, and the most approved remedies of materia medica. But opposed at the outset—that is to say, when the kidneys begin to discharge their functions inactively—with Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, the dangerous tendency is checked. Very useful, also, is this household medicine for those ailments of common occurrence constipation, biliousness, dyspepsia and nervousness. It is a safeguard against malaria and averts chronic rheumatism.

The poorer a family the more romantic the names given the children.

R. W. Tansill, the millionaire cigar manufacturer of Chicago, and his wife recently figured in a serious runaway accident at Clayton, Ill., where they were visiting at the home of Mrs. Tansill's parents. The spirited horses which they were driving took fright and ran away, and both occupants of the buggy were thrown out. Mr. Tansill escaped with a badly sprained ankle, but Mrs. Tansill sustained a broken collar-bone and some severe bruises, and narrowly escaped death.

There is no more dangerous deception than self deception.

SAFE, SURE AND SPEEDY.

No external remedy ever yet devised has so fully and unquestionably met these three prime conditions as successfully as ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS. They are safe because they contain no deleterious drugs and are manufactured upon scientific principles of medicine. They are sure because nothing goes into them except ingredients which are exactly adapted to the purposes for which a plaster is required. They are speedy in their action because their medicinal qualities go right to their work of relieving pain and restoring the natural and healthy performance of the functions of muscles, nerves and skin. Ask for ALLCOCK'S, and do not be induced to accept a substitute.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are safe and sure.

For Tired Mothers

"I feel very thankful for what Hood's Sarsaparilla has done for me. I have taken three bottles and the medicine has made a great change. I was All Run Down from trouble and overwork, and had other complaints common to my sex at my age, 44 years. Now since taking Hood's Sarsaparilla I am much stronger and am gaining in flesh. I would advise all overworked, tired, weak mothers to take Hood's Sarsaparilla to build them up." MRS. G. W. WARNOCK, Beverly, Nebraska.

SOMEBODY'S GOOD.

To make our own troubles the means of helping the troubles of others is a noble effort for good. A well illustrated instance of this kindly sympathy is shown in a letter from Mr. Enoch L. Hanscom, school agent, Marshfield, Me., an old Union soldier. He says: "It may do somebody some good to state, I am a man of 60 and when 41 had a bad knee and rheumatism set in. I was lame three years and very bad most of the time. I got St. Jacob's Oil and put it on three times and it made a cure. I am now in good health."

DEAFNESS CANNOT BE CURED

by local applications as they cannot reach the diseased portions of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that can not be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars; free.

ASSIST NATURE a little now and then in removing offending matter from the stomach and bowels and you thereby avoid a multitude of distressing derangements and diseases, and will have less frequent need of your doctor's service.

Of all known agents for this purpose, Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets are the best. Once used, they are always in favor. Their secondary effect is to keep the bowels open and regular, not to further constipate, as is the case with other pills. Hence, their great popularity with sufferers from habitual constipation, piles and their attendant discomfort and manifold derangements. The "Pellets" are purely vegetable and perfectly harmless in any condition of the system. No care is required while using them; they do not interfere with the diet, habits or occupation, and produce no pain, griping or shock to the system. They act in a mild, easy and natural way and there is no reaction afterward. Their help lasts.

The Pellets cure biliousness, sick and bilious headache, dizziness, costiveness, or constipation, sour stomach, loss of appetite, coated tongue, indigestion, or dyspepsia, windy belchings, "heartburn," pain and distress after eating, and kindred derangements of the liver, stomach and bowels. In proof of their superior excellence, it can be truthfully said, that they are always adopted as a household remedy after the first trial. Put up in sealed, glass vials, therefore always fresh and reliable. One little "Pellet" is a laxative, two are mildly cathartic. As a "dinner pill," to promote digestion, or to relieve distress from over-eating, take one after dinner. They are tiny, sugar-coated granules; any child will readily take them.

Accept no substitute that may be recommended to be "just as good." It may be better for the dealer, because of paying him a better profit, but he is not the one who needs help.

LEARNED ANIMALS.

Four Very Highly Culured German Pigs.

MORBID DEMAND FOR EXCITEMENT.

Apes, Peacocks, Dogs and Horses Taught to Display Almost Human Intelligence.—Trained Seals

There are more learned aimals in the world now than ever before. In fact, if the animal trainer's art continues to develop at its present rapid rate, we may expect some day to see rattlesnakes and crabs dance a polka mazurka together.

Animal trainers of late vie with each other in their efforts to educate the proverbially most stupid beasts and have really succeeded in teaching them some astounding tricks. Hogs have learned to conquer the burdens of obesity and natural obtuseness to such an extent that they can climb up a ladder to a raised platform and there enjoy a pleasant tete-a-tete of beer, refreshments, cigars and tobacco, helping themselves with their forepaws in true human fashion. Fully as clever turns are now being performed in Europe, according to the "Illustrierte Chronik der Zeit, by the heretofore unmanageable geese, oxen, snakes, mud-turtles, etc.

Such exhibitions are much more popular nowadays with circus-goers than even the blood-curdling performances of ferocious lions and snarling tigers under the direction of a frail woman with an apparently harmless whip as her only protection. This change is, perhaps, due to the morbid demand of the public for the unexpected, the startling, the impossible. Certain it is that the art of animal training, which find its most skillful exponents on the European continent, has advanced phenomenally during the past decade. These successful results may be attributed principally to the fact that the best tamers and trainers have experienced that but little can be accomplished by physical force and brutal treatment; that relentless endurance and angelic patience are the cardinal requirements, and above all that the animal is best awed into obedience by a consciousness of man's intellectual superiority, and when he has learned to love his master.

Paul Herzog, of Germany, has made it his task to imbue the pig with some "fin de siecle" culture, and has demonstrated that the snouty grunter can rise above his menial servitude to a gentile gastronomy. He has transformed his four Marsch-Schweine into giddy, sportive creatures. They are what would be called in hog parlance, "slick, fat porkers," with long ears, very clean, and agile in movement. To see them in their make-up before an audience with stovepipe hats, neat ties, and bell-collars sitting on their haunches and smoking clay pipes, it is difficult to believe that they are in any way related to their uncanny brethren who thrive in the filthy mire of the pigsty. One of them walks leisurely across a very narrow see-saw, another's feat is to mount a chair-ladder and shoot off a small revolver with his snout. Then the clown of the quartet attempts it all and fails, but he is the first one to take his seat at the table and in a dudish nonchalance to sip from a large glass of beer, an example which his more industrious comrades are not slow to imitate.

Fully as remarkable results have been obtained in the training of a number of fat geese. In their natural sphere they are known to avoid all obstacles which impede their march. On the stage they will scale fences and everything else that is placed in their way, and can even be induced to jump through paper hoops held high above them. They finally step in their equipage, pulled by a little goat, bowing with their long necks through the carriage windows their acknowledgments to he applauding spectators. In their company is also a clown goose which manages to slip out of the way of all impediments and to jump next to the paper hoops instead of through them, this naive smartness exciting much merriment from the onlookers.

Excellent training has been shown of late by the famous seals of Mr. Woodward. They are being exhibited all over Germany, and have proved a great drawing card for their owner. Armed with string instruments, a kettle drum, a hand bell, and some smaller bells, they give a wonderful if not what musical critics would call a harmonious concert.

A truly remarkable swimming feat is the diving after small, slippery eels, which are thrown to them in the water. The trick consists in catching the eels and landing them on terra firma without injuring them in the least. They also attempt to remove a floating boy from the water by swimming under him; in this feat, however, their education is not yet completed. August, as the seal clown is named, and amuses the audience by floating on his back and enjoying a clay pipe smoke while the others are hard at work. He is placed in charge of a small basket containing a cute little baby seal, but, lost in his reveries, he clumsily upsets the cradle, causing the infant to struggle helplessly in the water until the mother comes to the rescue.

The accomplishments of dogs, monkeys, elephants, and horses need not be mentioned in this connection, these animals being in every clime the most apt and intelligent pupils. But even the phlegmatic oxen have been taught horse tricks. They can be made to climb ladders, to balance on see-saws, to stand on their hind-legs, and although they manifest but little ambition in their work, yet it is done promptly and without requiring the menace of a whip. Their action is very grotesque, and the more comical because of their awkwardness.

The champion bird-trainer is not a German. Among the feathered performers which Miss De Carey exhibited in the Buggenhagen Theater of Berlin not long ago since were a flock of cacadus.

These little bipeds could do almost anything—dance with measured steps to the music of a violin, roll a ball around the room with their feet, and they could even roll it up and down a slanting plane. Miss de Carey shoots in the flock and one of them falls apparently dead on the stage. Its comrades immediately bring in a small bier, upon which, while quaking and wailing loudly, they lay the corpse, covering him with a white shroud. While these funeral preparations are going on the supposed corpse manages to slip from under the shroud, and when the funeral procession starts he flies on the head of his mistress, seeming to enjoy the joke as much as the audience.

It is reported that some amateur in London has had great success in the training of peacocks. Another one in Paris has instructed eight turkeys in the terpsichorean art. The artist Brisset, of Paris, has finally taught a mud-turtle to write his name on a white sheet of paper after dipping the paw of the scholarly crustacean into a pot of black paint.—A. S. in Inter-Ocean.

WATER FOR IRRIGATION.

Those whose ideas of irrigation are taken from the wasteful systems of flooding or soaking from big ditches have something to learn in Southern California.

The standard of measurement is here the miner's inch under 4-inch pressure. It is the equivalent of a constant flow through a hole one inch square under a head of four inches. This equals 1,728 cubic feet, or 12,960 gallons in twenty-four hours, and is 1-50 of a cubic foot a second. It will cover ten acres about 18 inches deep in a year, which being equal to 18 inches of rain used just when and where you want it, of which nearly every drop is utilized, it equals about 50 inches of rainfall as it generally comes. This amount, in addition to the regular winter and spring rainfall, is enough for orange and lemon trees in full bearing, and for corn and even alfalfa on the uplands and soils not too sandy, and is too much for grapes and all the decidnous fruits. On clay and other subsoils very retentive of moisture this amount will often keep the ground wet.

They will tell you at Riverside that they use an inch of water to five acres, and some say an inch to three acres. But this is because they charge to the land all the waste on the main ditch and because they use 30 per cent. of the water in July and August, when it is the lowest. But this is no test of the duty of water; the amount actually delivered on the land should be taken. What they actually use for ten acres at Riverside, Redlands, etc., is a twenty-inch of three days' run five times a year, equal to 300 inches for one day, or one inch steady run for 300 days. As an inch is the equivalent of 365 inches one day, or one inch for 365 days, 300 inches for one day equals an inch to twelve acres. Many use even less than this, running the water only two or two and one-half days at a time. Others use more head, but it rarely exceeds twenty-four inches for three days and five times a year, which would be seventy-two multiplied by five, or 360 inches, a little less than a full inch for a year for ten acres.—T. S. Van Dyke, in Ontario Record.

DEMAND FOR FRUIT.

F. G. Withoft, president of a company that has an orchard in Ohio, planted with 100,000 peach trees, writes as follows to "Farm and Home:"

A great change has come over the fruit business of the United States within the last twenty years. Then railroad facilities were meager, both in good connections and fast time, and markets were circumscribed. Within the last decade the local and shorter railroad lines have consolidated into trunk lines, with lower freight rates and quicker transit, and have practically revolutionized the fruit trade.

Fine fruit sells, especially as cities increase in population and wealth, and prices are not deemed of essential moment among the waltby, who want the very finest and best. With cheaper freight rates the finest fruits are now sold in the cities at reasonable rates, all expenses deducted and still leave large profits to the grower.

In the large fruits, the regions of successful orcharding are not extensive—elevation of land, a suitable climate and a suitable soil are essentials to success. Something of love for horticultural pursuits and an adaptation to the business must be found in the grower. It is wonderful the amount of fruit that can find a market in a large city, for from the city commission houses are sent out daily large consignments to the smaller towns and villages within a radius of fifty miles and more. Thus, in almost every small town or village of the north will be found berries, fruit, melons, etc., on sale, all through the season. In 1893, from one shipping point in the southern peach region, was shipped on one day and in one train 10,000 bushels of fine peaches, which arrived in New York within forty-eight hours and were only "as a drop in the bucket" upon the market. Within the large cities of the Northwest, out of the fruit regions themselves, and consuming thousands of tons of fine fresh fruit annually, the markets were almost boundless.

Read not to contradict and refute, nor to believe and take for granted, nor to find, talk and discourse, but to weigh and consider.—Lord Bacon.

HIS LIFE A ROMANCE.

Exciting Career of Capt. Charles Frederic Thomas.

REMARKABLE LIFE OF ADVENTURE.

Removed With His Own Hands the Scaffolding from the Statue of Freedom at Washington.

Living in a flat at No. 967 West Adams street, Chicago, is a man with a history, Captain Charles Frederic Thomas.

Few paper-covered tales of adventure contain more startling incidents than have come to the surface in the life of this Massachusetts-born resident of Chicago, whose experience covers more than three-quarters of a century and has been acquired in all corners of the globe. The one achievement of which it is intended to particularly speak in this article is the connection that Captain Thomas had with the building of the present Capitol Building in Washington. Captain Thomas was called to Washington during the administration of Buchanan to take charge of the mechanical branch of the Department of Public Works, of which Montogmery C. Melga, Chief United States Engineer Corps, was then in command. The feature of this work was the work that was to be done on the Capitol Building, although there was also much work to be done in the way of building aqueducts and some hurried work in the early days of the next administration in the way of putting up fortifications.

Work on the Capitol proceeded rather slowly during the early days of the war, for good men were not easy to be had, and about the time that the refugees from the Bull Run Battlefield returned to Washington in great disorder there was some doubt as to whether a Capitol Building would be very much needed. It looked better after the Fourth of July, 1863, with simultaneous successes for the Union troops from both East and West. Six months later the work on the building was nearly completed and on December 2, 1863, Captain Thomas removed the scaffolding with his own hands from the Statue of Freedom. When two sides of the farmework of scaffolding had been removed Captain Thomas mounted the statue and with his back to the rebellion and his face turned toward rugged old England, he was photographed. While standing on the scaffold Captain Thomas left a souvenir on the highest feather of "Freedom," in the form of his own name, together with those of Abraham Lincoln, Benjamin B. French, and Thomas N. Walter. These names are wrought of steel letters, and were destined to last forever. A document that is prized very much by the veteran builder is a certificate signed by Abraham Lincoln and others, certifying to the fact that Captain Thomas built the dome of the Capitol and placed the statue in position, also testifying to his skill as a builder.

It is in the construction of engines that Captain Thomas has his greatest pride. As long ago as 1853 he constructed an engine called the "Mamcluke" for the Manchester and Lawrence Railroad. The work was done under the plans made by Oliver Bailey. On her trial trip the Mameluke went two miles in seventy seconds and scared nearly all connected with the road into other business—railroading at that rate was too swift. On the next trip that the Mameluke made it blew up and the various pieces have never yet been collected. About the same time Captain Thomas built the Mason engines. These he built upon his own plans, and they were in successful use for the following generation, although the credit for their construction is ordinarily given to the man whose name they bear instead of to the one to whom it rightfully belongs.

From the time when he gradnated from Blaisdell's Boys Academy in Boston, the life of Captain Thomas has been a record of restless activity. Long before reaching his majority, he visited the West Indies several times and also made trips to parts of South America and Europe.

One of his first financial successes was at the island of Doboy near the mouth of the Darien River. Then he was bathing in the river when a black man asked him how it was he kept his skin so white.

"By the daily use of this sponge," said Thomas.

The black man made an offer of a boat load of provisions for the sponge which was accepted.

"I never saw him afterward," says the captain, "but if he failed to get white it is all right now, anyway, since Lincoln's proclamation of emancipation has gone into effect, and I really think that the daily sponge bath was worth more to him than the provisions."

The title of "captain" worn by this interesting character is not of the nautical variety, but is due to the position that he held with a company of infantry that was raised among the attaches of the Interior Department for service in Washington during the days when it was thought to be a likely scene for invasion and a desperate conflict. After the war Captain Thomas was connected with the Chester Engine Company for a great many years, after which he came to Chicago and spent some time at Pullman, where he went to perfect plans for a new style of a street motor. This was calculated to take the place of the trolley and cable as a motor power for street cars, but its development was interfered with by an accident to Captain Thomas. Two years ago, June 7, 1892, the old gentleman was run down by a Madison street cable car in the tunnel. His leg was broken, and since then he seldom leaves his home. What an end! To travel all over the world, encounter dangers enough as a sailor to drive a pirate out of the business; to stand on the apex of the national Capitol and engrave his name with that of Lincoln—then to be run down by a cable-car.—Inter-Ocean.

SWIMMING CAVALRY.

Much has lately been heard of the rapidity and ease with which continental cavalry cross rivers, but a few of our cavalry regiments, notably the Royal Horse Guards, are not far behind in point of excellence in the art of crossing rivers by swimming. Captain Ferguson, of the Blues, has taken up this subject for some months past, and the swimming squadron of that regiment has been brought to a high state of efficiency, as was evidenced the other day when the detachment in question swam across the Thames at Eton in the presence of Lord Methuen. The idea on which the exercise was based was that a small force, advancing on Ascot, finding the Windsor bridge blown up, was compelled to find means to cross the river. One officer (Lieut. Forester) and four men, seeing some punts and boats, four in number, on the other side of the river, rode to the water's edge, stripped themselves and removed the kits from their horses, rode them into the river, swam with the animals to the other side, seized the boats from the enemy—the natives—who were expected to make some show of resistance, and brought them back. Meanwhile, the kits were removed from the horses of the main body of the detachment, leaving nothing but the bridles. By this time the boats and punts had been brought over from the other side. Into these the kits, carbines, etc., were unceremoniously bundled, the troopers scrambled into as many as each of the four punts would allow without sinking it, the horses hauled into the river, and, once in, they gallantly swam across to the other side of their own accord. Most of the horses appeared to be well-trained for the purpose, one, a gray, belonging to the trumpeter who accompanied the squadron, crossing over in splendid style. Twice did the boats make the return journey until all were safely across, and the troopers and officers having resaddled their horses, rode off on their way. In actual warfare, of course, stripping the horses of saddles and kits would not be thought of. The men would have to swim and carry their ammunition above their heads, but this was not done in the present instance, stern necessity ruling not, for the trouble of getting the kit in proper condition again would be very considerable. A special feature of the drill was the celerity with which it was done, and it says well for the men that from the time of the first reconnoiter of the advance party to when the men were mounted and rode off from the other side of the river, it was under a quarter of an hour, with a few seconds to spare. The movements were watched with evident interest by Lord Methuen and his staff.

COLOR AT THE FAR NORTH.

Frederick Wilber Stokes, who was a member of the first Peary Relief Expedition gives a new idea of the charms of the Arctic landscapes in a paper on "Color at the Far North," which he has written for the September number of "The Century." Despite the desolation, he found, from an artistic standpoint, a land of beauty, with seas and skies of surpassing loveliness. The intensity and brilliance of color impress the beholder as something supernatural. Our sojourn was from the middle of July, through August, and a few days of September—a period when the polar latitudes are teeming with animal, insect, and plant life. Of this brief period only am I qualified to speak; but from the accounts given by those who have passed through the long, dreaded night season, the phenomena occurring in the heavens are most beautiful. The chief peculiarity of color at the North, so far as my short experience tells me, is that there are no semitones, the general effect being either very black or just the opposite, intensely brilliant and rich in color. In fact, a summer's midnight at the North has all the brilliance of our brightest noon, with the added intensity and richness of our most vivid sunsets, while noon, when the sun is obscured by threatening masses of storm-clouds, is black. Indeed, it is the true land of "impressionism."

I remember one brilliant morning when the measureless ether overhead, a hue of exquisite blue, repeated itself in the perfect mirror of the sea. Far away, on the otherwise clear-cut horizon, a line of pure white ice shimmered its light up through a pinkish, yellow stratum of mist, which bathed in delicate greenish blue an enormous iceberg that strongly resembled an ancient cathedral. In the afternoon the sky, a threatening black, overhung a vast, contorted sheet of white and pink, composed of ice-floe and colossal bergs looming up above its mass at intervals, with deep, black patches of water, the whole carrying the eye to the horizon—a tapering band of deep, rich blue merging into the sky. In the immediate foreground of the ice-floe, near the water's edge, were shallow pools of delicate blues, purples and greens.

Of the wealth of color in flower, lichen, and moss; of its curious riches as manifested in insect, shell, and animal life, and of its wonderful limning skill as shown on the great inland ice, ice-cap, and glacier, I have neither purpose nor pen to write. This new world of color awaits the one who can truly describe it. In all these color effects at the North there lies a wizard-like power of enchantment—a distinctive uncanniness that, basilisk-like, both attracts and repels. Great nature's pitilessness broods over it with a force and penetration possibly not equaled, and surely not surpassed, in any other quarter of our globe. It is a land of beautiful and awesome dreams.

HOW THE BLOSSOMS ARE GATHERED.

The Crop in the Vicinity of Sacramento. A Grower Who Was Justified in Hiring a Band.

The writer of this having taken in the recent State Fair, which was largely attended, and the display fairly good, devote some time and attention to the numerous hop ranches in the vicinity of Sacramento, this product being the most important in the agricultural resources of that county. Referring to both State and county fairs of recent years, it is a notable fact that the exhibits at each are secondary to, and dominated by the racing, which in the opinion of the writer—however, it may advance the interest of the horserace—does not materially tend to elevate the human race.

The season of hop-picking in Sacramento commenced some six weeks since, the crop maturing earlier in Sacramento than in the other leading hop-growing counties of California. During the continuance of the harvesting of the crop, the scene at the various hop-fields located up and down the Sarcamento, and along the American river, within a radius of ten miles of the city, was an extremely lively one. Pickers were in demand, the supply falling far short of the needs of the producers. As the crop deteriorates each day after maturing, it requires to be gathered before such contingency occurs. Advertisements in the Sacramento papers headed "100 hop-pickers wanted" were not uncommon, in some instances the word "white" being inserted. While the Japanese, who have entirely driven the Chinese from this field of labor, the war between these races being as bitter here as in the Orient—and the Indian tribes employed are the most rapid pickers, they do not by any means clean the crop from the vines as thoroughly as the whites, employed. It would be difficult to find, congregated in the same limited area, as mixed a multitude of varied races and nationalities as were to be found in a number of the hop-fields near here. The whites, including Americans, Germans, Irish, and Portuguese, the latter being the most numerous; Japanese and Indians, consisting of Piutes, Washoes, Shoshones and other tribes from beyond the Sierra Nevadas, who, "bucks," squaws and "pappooses," with their limited "household and kitchen furniture" make their annual pilgrimage to this region to engage in the great hop-picking carnival. While at work, with their surroundings, these various nationalities form a picturesque group, furnishing scenes which would have proved most attractive to the artist in search of such subjects for is pencil. Of the various nationalities employed, the Portuguese, following the vocation of fishing, as well as farming along the Sacramento, were by far the most numerous. Of this class the heads of families, with women and children, old and young, were at work "from early dawn to dewy eve," many, in order to be "on time" reaching the field of their labors, as early as 3 o'clock in the morning.

The hop crop in this vicinity, although light in spots, proved much heavier than that of last year. The present ruling prices, 7 cents per pound, does not prove very encouraging to the producer, and such of this class as are able to do so are storing their crop, awaiting a rise which must inevitably take place during the next few months, as the present low price is undoubtedly owing to a "combine," as it is termed, among hop brokers and dealers in this important staple.

Owing to this low price, pickers in some instances were paid but 75 cents per 100 pounds, the price gradually rising to 80 cents, eventually reaching $1 near the close—it requiring an expert picker to work from 6 a. m. to about the same hour in the evening to fill his sack with more than the 100 pounds—and "find" himself, even where most of the male portion spreading their blankets in the open air, having no bills for lodging to meet, and also doing their own cooking, washing and mending, there was not a very wide margin of profit in the business.

The great increase in acreage in hop raising was undoubtedly owing to the failure of the crop in Kent and the other hop-growing counties in England some twelve years since. The greater portion of the crop produced on the Pacific Coast was sold for $1 per pound; a portion in Sonoma county, reaching the $1.25 notch. The owner of one of the largest hopyards in Sacramento county disposed of his crop, amounting to 80,000 pounds, for the snug sum of $80,000.

This tune certainly justified the fortunate owner in making a triumphant march through the Capital city, with a band of music, preceding the last six horse load of bales delivered to the buyer. Humulus lupulus, being the most indispensable ingredient in its manufacture, John Bull will not be deprived of his "hale," no matter how high the price of "'ops" may rise, and the portly Teuton will not under any circumstances forego his dearly loved lager, which even Americans are gradually substituting for the more ardent and stimulating juice of the corn.

Leading dealers aver that hops produced in Oregon, Washington and Birtish Columbia, owing to a greater degree of moisture in the climate, are worth from 1 to 1½ cents per pound more than those raised in California. Owing to the appearance of the hop aphis in Washington, this year's crop in that State has proved light, and the latest advices from Oregon demonstrate that owing to rains causing mold, combined with a scarcity of pickers, the crop in that region will also prove unusually light. It is further stated that owing to the low prices much of the crop will remain ungathered.

As an evidence of the short time required in the shipment of hops from the Pacific Coast to a European market, where the price rose from 12 cents per pound to double that rate, six years since, 50,000 pounds, shipped from New Tacoma, across the continent by rail, and across the ocean by steamer, were delivered in Liverpool in eighteen days from the date of shipment. The individual who, even a quarter of a century since, would have predicted such annihilation of time and space would have been deemed a fit subject for a lunatic asylum.

In conclusion, the writer of this would advise all who are suffering from a preponderance of adipose tissue to engage in hop-picking when the daily range of the mercury is 100 degrees in the shade.—E. R. C., in Bulletin.

THE FUSE WAS TOO LONG.

A writer in the "Washington Star" gives his experience in the coal mines during the strike. He says: "The two days I spent in the Hocking valley taught me a lesson in regard to the miners being thoroughly reckless. There was a coal train coming up the valley, the engineer, fireman and train men being known to everyone of the little band of strikers that had collected at a wooden bridge over which the train must pass. The trainmen had not received orders to quit and were gritty and had determined to put the train through. Several militiamen were on the train and kept back the strikers. About a quarter of a mile down the line from the bridge the strikers halted the train and told the engineer that he must not pull that train through. He said he would.

"'Come down, Jim,' sang out one of the strikers, 'we know you too well to harm you. Come down. We have a keg of powder on that bridge up there and when the boys see you coming they are going to light the fuse.'

"'All right,' replied the engineer: 'I've promised to pull this train through, and through she goes.'

"With these words he opened the throttle and the train dashed on. The strikers saw the train coming and lit the fuse. I held my breath in dismay, waiting for the shock as the train reached the bridge. On and over it went and as the last car cleared the structure, bang! went the powder and the bridge was blown to atoms. The fuse was about a quarter of an inch too long."

KISSING THE BRIDE IN KENTUCKY.

"Kissing the bride is out of date now," remarked Esquire Hause yesterday in a regretful tone. "The grooms object, and, of course, we do not insist, except in very rare instances. I formerly made a regular thing of kissing Lexington, Ky., brides, but upon one occasion I kissed one of them and the groom said it paid the fee. He refused to give me anything else. Still, I did not care much, for she was a beauty.

But times are too hard to permit of such fees as a regular thing, and I have tabooed the custom altogether. Some country brides and grooms think something has been omitted if the lady is not kissed by the man who performs the ceremony, and, in such instances, I always call the groom aside and make an arrangement with him whereby I am to get my fee in addition to the kiss. But most brides object to being kissed, too, and as a general thing they are too ugly for the magistrate to insist."—Louisville Commercial.

EASTERN CARPETS.

Costly Prayer Rugs and How They are Made.

A COLLECTOR OF EASTERN RUGS.

Those Made by Turks and Persions are the Finest in the World—Baron Albert Rothschild's Collection.

Baron Albert Rothschild, a member of that richest family in Europe, is a collector of Eastern rugs. In his splendid house in Paris costly rugs are spread over the waxed floors, but the most beautiful and precious of these bits of Oriental carpet hang like pictures or tapestry along the walls. They are far too valuable to be trampled by careless feet, since some of them cost many thousand dollars, and are five and six centuries old. Besides they are as beautiful as paintings, and every one boasts a history or possesses a series of meanings in its decorations, that have been studied and translated by able scholars.

In the museum of Paris is a second rich collection of rugs; the Emperor of Austria is another ardent collector, as well as several wealthy Englishmen and Americans, who prize beautiful specimens of Oriental carpets as highly as other persons prize paintings, statues, or carvings.

Now a collector of rugs will tell you that of all manufacturers of the East it was in carpet-making the Persians excelled, and that on their rough looms, in the factories controlled by the Shah, in the tents of the wandering tribes, or houses of the villagers, laboriously by hand, the most beautiful and durable carpets have ever been woven. Something more than floor coverings were these. Many of the most beautiful were prayer mats for pious Musselmans, and into them all were woven some verses from the Koran, some Oriental proverbs, some song to springtime and art, or some words in praise of the Shah. Often enough the weaver of a carpet tried to picture a glimpse in the Shah's pleasure garden or hunting party, and in cartouches or medallions. Along the border of one of these rugs is a verse or two of original poetry, extolling the Shah and Chinese art that the weaver evidently greatly admired.

In the days of Persia's greatness, special factories for carpet-weaving were owned by the Shah, and rugs made five, six, even eight hundred years ago are found today in excellent condition, a little worn as to fringe, but the colors as clear and fine as ever. One beautiful specimen in Baron Rothschild's collection was woven in 1582 for Shah Abbas and found in his palace Ispahan, and might have been made but yesterday, so perfect were every thread and color in it.

"Who makes the rugs?" some one asked.

In nearly every province of Persia, Asia Minor and Turkey will be found innumerable families who weave rugs, every member contributing something to the industry. Even the little children give a share of help, and very early the little girls learn to become expert workers at the big looms. When a Turkoman girl grows up, if she is a clever weaver, her husband pays to her father 100 tomans for so valuable a wife. If that husband dies and another suitor comes along and asks her hand in marriage, he must pay her father 200 tomans, and so on her price increases in proportion every time she is so unfortunate as to become a widow. This charge is made because it is supposed that as she works at rug-weaving for her husbands, she is steadily growing more expert, and is a more valuable helpmeet to any man lucky enough to claim her as his wife.

This is not pleasant work, for sometimes if the rug is large the loom reaches from floor to ceiling of the weaver's hut, and often all day the entire family sit aloft on a scaffolding, working like beavers from 6 o'clock in the morning until 6 o'clock at night. Sometimes a thrifty man will not only keep his family at work, but hire men to work for him and pay them less than ten cents a day for the long hours of labor. With their best efforts these patient toilers can only make a few inches of rug a day; and when the rug is very fine of quality, with a careful design, it requires months to finish a small one.

Is it not odd to find that though the Turks and Persians make the finest rugs in the world they care very little for their own fine handiwork and for their houses greatly prefer the cheap gaudy carpets made in Western Europe and America. These manufactured carpets they cannot wash as they do their own, however, for it is the custom among these Eastern people to have a great carpet-washing once a year. Ropes are stretched across a stream where the current is swift, and the rugs laid on the ropes hang all day in the running water. For another day they lie in the sun drying, and then again they are spread on the floors before the long divans that encircle every room and house-cleaning is accomplished for a twelvemonth.

But the prayer rugs rarely are washed; these are held a little sacred from common use, and some that hang in the mosques cannot be bought for any amount of money. One American gentleman, hearing of a very famous Persian rug, hunted for it through three cities of Europe, and finally found what he wanted in Constantinople. Here in a mosque he also saw another and yet more beautiful rug for which he offered $250, though in America the same rug would have been worth many thousand; but he was unsuccessful, the rug had no price.

FRIDAY, NOV 23 1894

Here's a state of things. For two years the country groaned under Republican legislation while a Democratic Congress held sway at Washington, and now, for two years to come, the country will prosper under Democratic legislation, while a Republican Congress twirls its thumbs at the capitol.

George A. Knight is likely to find out where Governor Budd will begin the business of reducing State expenditures. The people are paying Mr. Knight $3,000 a year to make campaign speeches for the Republicans—and they are mighty poor speeches at that.

Somebody ought to find out the San Francisco Post's opinion of itself about this time. It precipitated a deluge of filthy and malicious lies and slanders on the State, and the man whom it libeled has achieved a more phenomenal victory than any other man in the history of California.

The Republicans will have control of both branches of the next Congress. If they are in earnest on the silver question they can pass a free coinage bill. If the President vetoes the measure they have, with the aid of the free silver Democrats, votes enough to pass the bill over the President's veto. If the Republicans are really in favor of free coinage here is their chance.

John Sherman, Senator from Ohio, says that the recent Republican victory is not an endorsement of the McKinley bill and that he "is not inclined to believe the (Rebublican) victory will not be permanent" and that in a few years "the people may become as displeased with the Republicans and administer to them as crushing a defeat as they administered to the Democrats this year." If the voters who are opposed to Republican class legislation could be united the result two years hence would be a "crushing defeat" for Senator Sherman and his party.

The people of California should see to it that the official count of the gubernatorial vote promptly ends the contest. Mr. Budd has been fairly elected, and the juggling scheme to throw the election into the legislature is nothing more than the proposition of gamblers who bet on Estee's election to count him in in order to win their money. This proposed atempt to defeat the will of the people in the interest of trickoters and gamblers should be discountenand by all reputable people of all political parties.

Congressman Maguire is the only free coinage Democrat not from the South who has been re-elected. Bland of Missouri, Chairman of the Coinage Committee and the most persistent of all the free silver men, was defeated, as well as all the others on that committee. Every Congressman who was conspicuous as an advocate of the free coinage of silver at 16 to 1 has met the same fate. Whatever the Republican party may be it is not a free silver party, and Bill Stewart and John P. Jones and Frank Newlands knew it when they left that party and got aboard the new organization in Nevada.

Mr. Dan Burns is said to be sick, a result of the recent election; that is not at all unlooked for; he ought to be. Col. Burns undertook to boss the Republican party but had to defend himself before a larger and more intelligent jury than when he was tried for robbing the state. Mr. Estee had the misfortune to be the special favorite of Col Burns, receiving the Republican nomination for governor at the hands of that gentleman and was consequently defeated. The whole state of California is at present smiling at the ridiculous claim of Dan Burns that he was counted out in San Francisco. The colonel, as he is known to his agudantes, though whence the title no man knows, had his brother-in-law appointed registrar of voters in San Francisco by Governor Markham and in addition thereto appointed all the election boards in the city, and to have him come out afterwards and say he was counted out is excruciatingly funny. Dan Burns, Chris Buckley and Sam Rainey counted out in San Francisco! Ye gods and little fishes! Dan needs a guardian.

THE SLANG OF LONDON

ITS RHYMING FEATURE, WHICH IS PECULIAR TO ENGLAND.

Say "Daisies" For Boots, and You Will Have Made a Good Start, but That Is Not All of It by Any Means—A Dissertation on an Unknown Science.

By way of introducing the subject let me premise that there is a certain school of thinkers—dwellers for the most part in very unfashionable districts of London—who hold that a policeman in plain clothes, dress he ever so plainly, may always be known as such by a cursory inspection of his boots. Whether this opinion is well founded I know not, but its existence, and also the existence of rhyming slang, was brought to my notice not long ago in Oxford street—not the Oxford street of west enders and De Quincey, but Oxford street "out Stepney way." I happened to be rather stoutly shod, and I wear spectacles, which are, I suppose, often assumed for the purpose of disguise, and as I passed by a group of ill favored loiterers at a street corner I distinctly heard one of them remark to another: "'Ere's a tec. D'yer dick 'is goggles and 'is blanky daisies?"

I walked quickly away, but the words remained in my mind. The opinion they conveyed, except as affording proof that the speaker belonged to the school of thinkers above alluded to, did not interest me so much as the words themselves. "Tec" is of course merely an abbreviation for "detective." Much might be written about "dick." It is pure Romany, connected, as every student of that attractive language knows, with the Sanskrit "drish" and the Hindoostanee "dekhno," meaning "to see." But "daisies"—being the slang term and, as I shall show, the rhyming slang term for "boots"—is a good specimen of a most singular perversion of the English language, which is well worth the attention of any one who cares about linguistic oddities.

Rhyming slang is peculiar to England and, I believe, to London. The French language, so rich in slang, does not admit of such treatment. It is of modern origin, and I doubt if any trace of it is to be found in the records, which are fairly plentiful, of the slang of last century. Nor do I recollect any instance of its appearance in the works of Dickens, Harrison Ainsworth or Bulwer Lytton.

Rhyming slang expressions may be divided into two classes—the simple and the complex. The simple method consists in substituting for a word some other word or phrase which rhymes with it. Not that every one is free to choose his own rhymes. Usage has established certain rhyming slang equivalents for certain words, and, although no doubt new rhymes are always being introduced on trial, yet when one has become recognized as belonging to the dialect it can never be dislodged. For instance, the rhyming slang for "a pocket" is "skyrocket," and neither "locket" nor "socket" would be tolerated. The eyes are "mince pies;" the ear and the nose are, oddly enough, the "frosty and clear" and the "I suppose." How, when and why these particular rhymes were universally adopted will never be known. As Professor Dowden remarks in connection with a very different subject, "To the eyes of no diver amid the wrecks of time will that curious talisman gleam." Who was "Charlie Prescott," whose name is immortalized as a synonym for "waistcoat?" And why should coat and trousers be concealed under such circumstances as "I'm afloat" and "round the 'ouses?"

Other examples of what I have called the simple form of rhyming slang are "cat and mouse" (house), "elephant's trunk" (drunk), "bull and cow" (row), and "I'm so frisky" (whisky). But if I am asked how "daisies" can be the rhyming slang for "boots" I answer that we have here an example of the second or complex form of the jargon, which finds its highest development in the mouths of experts. Having got your rhyme—say, "skyrocket" for "pocket"—you are permitted, within certain ill defined limits, to make your slang equivalent shorter and more occult by omitting the rhyming portion. Thus "pocket" becomes "sky" and "daisy roots," the simple or first standard form for "boots," is contracted into "daisies." In the same way no master of the language would ever give brandy or gin their primitive names, "Jack the dandy" or "Brian O'Lynn." The one is always referred to as "Jack," the other as "Brian." It will be seen that words treated in this way must have a tendency, in constant use, to lose sight, as it were, of their original forms and to become merged in the great mass of ordinary prosaic slang. For instance, in act 1, scene 1, of "The Cotton King" some one says that somebody has "a streak of black across the chivvy." An Adelphi audience knows, of course, that "chivvy" means "face," but the earlier form of the word, "chevy chase," being now rarely if ever used, the rhyming original is probably known to few playgoers, and the word "chivvy" is thus in danger of being left with no more poetry about it than is attached to such terms as "conk" or "boko," the ordinary slang for nose.

We hear a great deal about the way in which slang has invaded our conversation and our literature; but, in spite of the recent popularization of the coster, I doubt if much rhyming slang is heard in west end drawing rooms. And I have only come across one example of its employment, except occasionally in a music hall song, in what might be called a literary form. There is a poem which begins thus, and readers who have followed me so far will find no difficulty in translating it:

I was sitting one night at the Anna Maria,
Warming my plates of meat,
When there came a knock at the Rory O'Moore
Which made my raspberry beat.

This opening makes one wish for more, but I am sorry to say that I can only recollect the first stanza.—Pall Mall Budget.

A PEN PICTURE.

The Man Had Not Meant to Make Trouble, but Was Unfortunate.

"A strong wind had set in from the sea, banking huge masses of clouds over the city. The rain descended in a blinding, staggering deluge, and solid sheets of fire flashed athwart the angry skies, followed by crashing peals of thunder. The gloom was excessive. The lights in the streets cast a fitful, sickly glare over the wet pavements and the few belated pedestrians who were hastening home. It was a night for dark thoughts and darker deeds.

I laid aside the book which I had been reading—an absurdly impossible tale of midnight horrors and ghastly crimes—and sat moodily looking at the raindrops chasing madly down the window pane and at the fierce night without. The cabbies in the street below were swearing, and the call bells in the hotel were clanging like wild.

Suddenly in the adjoining room I heard a sharp click like the cocking of a firearm. The connecting door was unbolted and slightly ajar. I sat still, with bated breath and hair bristling all over with terror. A shuffling of heavy feet and a muttered imprecation as something fell on the floor. A cold, paralyzing dread seized on me, freezing the lifeblood in my veins. God of heavens, what horrible tragedy was being enacted behind that door?

Sharp, clear and loud, above the raging of the elements, rang out the report of a pistol, followed by a terrible oath and a heavy fall. Pale as a specter, I sprang, tottering, toward the door to escape, and with a horrified scream fell crashing to the floor in a dead swoon.

I awoke with a start. The connecting door was wide open. Above my prostrate form stood a rough looking man in his shirt sleeves. His right hand was bloody. I seemed to feel his clutches on my throat already and closed my eyes with a gasp. I opened them again cautiously. In his bloody grasp he held the shattered remains of an electric light globe.

"Sorry, stranger," he said, "but I tried to open the durned thing to light up, and hit busted."—Atlanta Constitution.

EVERY HOME SHOULD OWN A DYNAMO

Then Housewives Could Magnetize Hammers and Make Tack Driving Easy.

There is an easy way to render the ordinary tack hammer an article that may be used with comfort and to do away with all danger of bruised fingers from its misdirected blows. A little electricity will do the trick. The process is so simple that it should be universally adopted.

All that is required is access to a dynamo. Then lay the head of the hammer on the framework and leave it there for about five minutes. This needs no strength, but the hammer cannot be detached without the knowledge that some force holds it fast to the ironwork, and herein lies the secret. By contact with the dynamo your hammer has been magnetized and will pick up bits of iron or steel that are not too heavy for its strength.

Tacks and small nails, too short to be held in the fingers when driving, may be easily placed in position for the hammer blows without using the finger or thumbs and much speedier work accomplished. In retacking torn shades the man of the house will at once appreciate the blessing of a magnetized hammer, since he can pick the tiny tacks from the box direct with his magnet, press them into the roller with the same tool and by one blow drive the elusive fasteners home.

Carpet laying is made easy and stray tacks in quantities such as will slip from the fingers a thing of the past.—New York Herald.

Frog Catching as an Industry.

Frog catching is a leading industry along the river, and the most successful operators work all night and sleep in the daytime. Their tents along the river are silent during the sleeping hours of the forenoon, but at night the swampy shores are alive with the moving lanterns of the fishers, or rather the froggers. The frogs are caught with an ordinary fishhook, and the most successful bait is a small piece of red flannel. The operator has a reflector lantern fastened in the bow of his boat, and it is claimed that the light makes the frogs snappish without discrimination. The baited hooks are passed freely among them as the canoes, punts, skiffs and rafts are pushed and paddled through the marshes. The frog catchers do a profitable business with the Toronto restaurants.—Toronto Globe.

Beer by the Pound.

"What do you think of getting 1¼ pounds of beer for a nickel?" said a man the other day. "Well, out in the southern part of the city they sell beer in this way altogether, especially at the little German groceries with a saloon annex. When people come into the place for a pitcher of beer, the vessel is set on scales and weighed. Then the customer is asked if he wants lager or common beer. If he wants 5 cents' worth of the first, he gets 1¼ pounds, but if he wants common beer he gets 1¾ pounds. The dealer I saw did not know how the custom of weighing beer originated. The stand has been handed down for several generations, and beer was never measured otherwise than by weighing.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

A Rare Stamp.

An interesting and valuable addition has been made to the splendid collection of stamps in the Philosophical museum. It is a half crown stamp, lettered "America," and is the sole survivor of those attempted to be forced upon our colonists at Boston who threw the chests of tea into their harbor, for the colonists destroyed all the stamps as well, except this, which Mr. Philbrick, Q. C., is fortunate enough to be the possessor of. Another valuable addition is a series of fine specimen copies of Australian stamps sent by Major E. H. Watts of Newport.—Boston Traveller.

Remarkable Vision.

An old woman who had been in the infirmary with sore eyes told a neighbor that the doctor took out her eyes and scraped them with lances. "Nonsense, woman," replied the other. "Ye shouldn't believe all ye hear. The doctors would only be stuffing ye." "Oh, but ye know it's no use saying that, for I awakened up out of the chloroform and saw both of my eyes lying on the table."—Montreal Star.

Dog Reputations.

Little Johnny—Yes, he's just as smart, but I isn't so good a liar as Tommy.—Good News.

AFRAID? NOT HE.

He Merely Wanted His Wife to Hold the Light For Him.

At 2 o'clock Tuesday morning, when all the people living on College avenue were fast asleep, there was commotion in one of the beautiful residences along that thoroughfare. It was the home of a merchant, and the commotion broke loose in the sleeping apartment of himself and wife. She started it.

She awakened suddenly and thought she heard some one trying to break in down stairs. She shook her husband, and after some time had elapsed succeeded in making him realize the situation. They both listened. There was some noise, sure enough, and a cold shiver crept down his spinal column and even to his toes.

He determined not to get scared, though his teeth were chattering, so he announced that he would go down and investigate.

"Aren't you afraid, dear?" nervously asked his wife.

He took out his revolver, struck a match, lighted a lamp and then looked at her in disgust.

"Afraid! Well, hardly. I never saw the man yet I was afraid of. Now, don't make any noise, but come on."

The little woman started in astonishment. "Do you want me to go too?"

"Do I want you to go? Why, of course I do. You must go ahead and carry the light so I can see to shoot. Do you think I could hit a burglar in the dark? Hurry up, or he'll be gone."

And that man made the little woman go ahead with the light, while he held the revolver over her shoulder at full cock. They traversed the house from garret to cellar, finally found a stray dog scratching at the back door and came back to bed. He sat up for an hour telling her what he would have done had there been a burglar there.—Indianapolis Sentinel.

A HARD TASKMISTRESS.

The Late Rosina Vokes Took Her Art Rather Too Seriously.

The late Mrs. Clay, better known as Rosina Vokes, was a hard taskmistress. She took her art both seriously and rigidly and demanded the same from others. A young American girl during a one time connection with the Vokes company suffered extremely from a felon on her finger. Every movement of the arm gave her pain, and she was at length obliged to evade her required participation in "A Game of Cards," where the players clap hands, the one against the other. "You shirked your part last night, Miss Blank," Mrs. Clay took occasion to observe the following morning.

"I did," acknowledged Miss Blank, "for my finger is in such a condition, as you see, that present use of it is impossible."

"You will not shirk your part tonight, however," remarked Mrs. Clay, with an ominous gleam in her eye. The young American knew only too well that further remonstrance would probably result in her dismissal, so nothing more was said. That night, according to orders, she, with infinite pain, clapped hands briskly. At the first touch the blood gushed from her suffering finger; but, although her partner was Mrs. Clay, neither reference nor apology was made by that exacting star either then or afterward. "Still it was splendid training," said the young actress in later years. But to impartial, unprofessional outsiders such "training" smacks of tyranny.—New York Advertiser.

Speeches From Notes.

It is usually supposed by the lay reader that the greatest speeches made in congress are the result of long preparation and are delivered from voluminous notes. This is not always correct. The preparation may be all right, but in many cases notes do not exist at all. This may be illustrated from a little conversation I had with ex-Congressman John M. Farquhar. He was booked to speak at a reunion of veterans. Half an hour before he was announced to take the platform I approached and said:

"Mr. Farquhar, I shall be glad to get an advance copy of your speech."

"My dear sir," he replied, "I never wrote a speech in my life and never shall. I never spoke from notes but once in my life. That was when I was in congress, and my speech occupied over four hours. My notes consisted of five words scribbled on a piece of paper. I have kept that piece of paper, and when I have joined the majority it may be considered an interesting souvenir to somebody."

I thought so too.—Buffalo News.

Our Future Population.

The territorial area of Japan is about one-twenty-fourth that of the United States, not counting Canada, which is likely some time to come in, and it supports 40,000,000 people. At this rate it is computed that the North American continent would sustain a population of 1,000,000,000. How soon that limit is to be reached may be remitted to the prophets and the statisticians, but it will come some time without doubt, requiring an increasingly wise type of statesman and politician on the way if we are to hold together and carry out the destinies which seem appointed to us.—New York Tribune.

Shell Sounds.

The peculiar murmuring sound, not unlike the ripple of the waves on a still evening, which we hear on placing a shell or other hollow object to the ear, is due to the fact that the concave surface concentrates and multiplies all different sounds around us, so as to render them audible. The many sounds always present in the air are augmented by the resonant cavity of the shell.—Science Journal.

An Eye Cleaner.

In traveling you can easily guard against the dread of getting cinders in your eye by carrying with you a tiny box of flaxseed. The instant you feel a foreign substance in the eye throw back your head and drop three or four flaxseed on the ball of the eye; then lift the upper lid and draw it down over them so as to hold them in. The relief will come immediately, and soon the seeds will begin to work out and bring the offending particle with them.—Philadelphia Ledger.

Pledged to Suicide.

"There are five men in Deadwood who once belonged to the same suicide club," said T. R. Wortham. "They constituted the entire membership and don't often speak of it. A solemn compact was made that they should hold monthly meetings, at each one of which the members drew balls, one being black and its holder being obligated by oath to kill himself before the next meeting, the last one to hold a solitary dinner and destroy himself. The meetings, with the exception of the last one, were held, and in each case the victim disappeared, first settling up all of his affairs and leaving a farewell letter to his associates. No bodies were found, however. One day, on the principal street of Deadwood, a crowd collected, and in it were all five of the supposed suicides. They had all gone west and drifted to Deadwood. The story got out some way, and their lives were made miserable by it for a time, but they have succeeded in quieting it down, and are all doing well."—Cincinnati Enquirer.

Goldenrod's Peculiarity.

Probably a great many people who travel have failed to notice that the period of blooming of the goldenrod does not begin first in the south and move northward, but apparently in the other direction—from north to south. In some places in northern Vermont and New Hampshire goldenrod of the common field and railroad track variety is in profuse bloom as early as the 10th of July. On the Kennebec river the other day a traveler noted that the goldenrod was much more golden and less tinged with green than it is in Malden or Cambridge, Mass. And the place where the plant is latest of all in yellowing apparently is Cape Cod, where the dwarf seaside variety, most common there, hardly begins to do itself justice before September. It is possible that the northern goldenrod ripens before that farther south for the same reason that Indian corn ripens earlier in Vermont than it does in Virginia—it has got to ripen earlier if it is going to ripen at all.—Lewiston Journal.

An Improvement In Electric Bells.

One of the most objectionable qualities of the electric bell is its uniform noisiness and shrillness. There are many places in which an alarm of a less aggressive and peremptory nature is desirable, and it is surprising that a "quiet" electric bell has not been manufactured for use in offices, hotels or private houses. The bell can be adjusted to make as much or as little noise as may be needed. Its principal feature is that it can be used either as a slow striking bell, a single stroke bell or as an ordinary trembling bell, according to the way it is connected on.—Philadelphia Press.

Remarkable Vision.

An old woman who had been in the infirmary with sore eyes told a neighbor that the doctor took out her eyes and scraped them with lances. "Nonsense, woman," replied the other. "Ye shouldn't believe all ye hear. The doctors would only be stuffing ye." "Oh, but ye know it's no use saying that, for I awakened up out of the chloroform and saw both of my eyes lying on the table."—Montreal Star.

Leuenhoek says that 4,000,000 webs, spun by young spiders when they first begin to use the spinneret, are not, if twisted together, as great in diameter as a hair from a human head.

Callsen vs. Claussen—I sued order of sale.

THURSDAY, November 22, 1894.

Entered order setting apart personal property for the use of family and making family allowence.

Lacy vs Chapman—Entered order of injunction.

R Hessian of Big Pine spent a couple of days in town this week.

Paul Pfefferle of Darwin has been in town all the week.

A. Tate has sold his interest in the Jockey Saloon to Marshall Naylor.

Taxes will be delinquent after Monday next and fifteen percent added.

A. F. Mairs and Arthur Smith are out on prospecting trip in the mountains.

The Independence Sunday School will have a Christmas tree this year.

Mrs. and Miss Horton of Round Valley visited Independence early in the week.

Ed Lark, who left for Fresno about a month ago, arrived home the middle of the week.

John Shepherd has very much improved during the past week. He is now considered out of danger.

E. H. Edwards and J. G. Dodge were up from Lone Pine yesterday, on business with the Tax-Collector.

George Mead will come down from Bishop next week with a load of flour for E. H. Edwards of Lone Pine.

The firm of N. Rhine has bought a new express wagon for their busines betwee Independence and the station.

Mead's team arrived in town last Wednesday evening en-route from Mojave to Bishop with freight for different points in the Valley.

Sportsmen are hereby strictly forbidden to hunt or shoot upon my premises.

F. Schabbell.
Camp Independence.

Taxes are coming in at a lively rate, but Tax-Collector Gorman anticipates that the delinquent list this year will be larger than last year.

Frank Williams passed through town early in the week on his way to San Diego to join his family. His son "Tommy" went with him.

Owing to the fact that the horse race did not come off the Harmony orchestra postponed its dance until next Thursday evening—Thanksgiving. See ad.

In an exhibition on the 17th Fitzsimmons struck Con Riordan a heavy blow on the chin, knocking him senseless and causing his death about five hours later.

The much-talked-of race between Goldpiece and Sagebrush failed to materialize. His owner was unable to get Sagebrush in condition in time and forfeited the one hundred dollars deposited.

About all the hay and pasture in this vicinity has been sold to sheepmen Owing to the fact of there no fall rains west of the mountains and consequent scarcity of feed the majority of sheep owners will winter in Owens Valley.

J. Scott Broder, Jim Rose, and Tim Madden came in from Fish Springs early in the week. They report the mines in that vicinity to be in a flourishing condition Several large runs of ore will be made as soon as spring opens sufficiently to run the arastras.

D. S. Lane, owner of the Sorba mine at Darwin, came in on Tuesday's train, returning next day. Mr. Lane contemplates considerable improvements at the mine and will increase his force of men. The Sorba is one of the most valuable mines on the coast.

On Wednesday evening next the young folks of Lone Pine will give a dramatic entertainment for the purpose of raising funds to repair the old school house and make it suitable for a Town Hall. A drama, "A Fair Encounter" followed by the laughable farce "Nan, the Good-for-nothing" will be presented, the evening closing with a social dance. A thoroughly good time is sure to be had.

The Comstock Was Rattled.

The Comstock was shaken incessantly between the hours of 2 and 5 o'clock last Sunday morning by a seismic disturbance, and timid people were thoroughly frightened. The tremors started shortly after 2 o'clock and were almost incessantly felt until twenty minutes to 3, when the seismic disturbance wound up for the time with a positive shock, lasting several seconds at this time. People got out of bed, lights shone from windows, and the community was thoroughly startled. No damage of importance was reported. In several buildings the plaster was loosened and came rattling down on the heads of the occupants. Windows and doors were shaken, and the vibrations of the earth were clearly felt. At five o'clock or thereabouts there was still another shock, followed by a series of tremors. There were also two slight tremors Sunday night. Although these shocks were quite apparent to all, and particularly noticeable to the occupants of the settled and dilapidated buildings, of which there are many on the Comstock, they cannot be called severe when compared with those prevalent in some countries, or even those frequently felt on the coast. Down in the mines the shocks were felt plainly. The center of the disturbance is apparently Mt. Davidson, and it is of narrow scope. All of the shocks felt here have apparently been felt at Carson, but no further away from the Comstock. A gentleman scientifically describes the tremors and shocks felt at the capital city Sunday morning as follows: Tremor, 2:38 a. m.; tremor, 2:40 a. m.; shock, 2:49 a. m. Motion east and west. Microseismic shocks at 5:15, 5:23 and 7:22 a. m.—Enterprise.

Pasadena Visitors

Marshal C. Parmley, Penton W. Lloyd J. H. Cole and two others, all of Pasadena, were at Independence last Saturday on their way to Olancha from a visit up the Valley. Mr. Parmley expressed himself as being delighted with the country surrounding Big Pine and will probably invest there. They are all interested in the artesian well-boring venture at Olancha and have the utmost faith in the final success of the undertaking. It is understood that active operations will be suspended until next spring, when they will again start in with improved appliances.

Through Trains

It is learned the officials of the Carson & Colorado R. R. are arranging a new time-table to go into effect on December 31. It is proposed to run trains through from Keeler to Hawthorne, and possibly to Mound House. With a close connection at the latter station and with the Westbound overland at Reno, Independence would be within 27 hours of San Francisco, instead of 49 hours as at present. The new time will probable send trains out from one to two hours earlier and bring them in about that much later. So mote it be.—Index.

California's Bullion Output.

The State Mineralogists report shows that in 1893, California more than doubled the silver output of the previous year, producing $527,155 as against $262,500. The increase was almost entirely due to San Bernardino county. The ores of the Calico mine being worked more cheaply than any other silver ores on the Pacific Coast. The gold output was practically the same in both years. This year the forty hydraulic mines, which have been unproductive for years, are again being operated.

On Tuesday Mr. McIver brought to this office a sample box of raisins grown and cured on his place on the Eastside. For size and quality we doubt very much whether they can be equalled in the State. The long, dry season of the Eastside, and entire absence of dew, gives them a high percentage of sugar and enables them to be perfectly cured.

Order of Adjudication of Insolvency.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE County of Inyo, State of California.

Pierre Beyeye and Francois Hagata, Co-partners under the firm name of P. Beyeye & Co., Insolvent Debtors.

Pierre Beyeye and Francois Hagata, Co-partners under the firm name of P. Beyeye & Co., having filed in this Court their petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, from which it appears that they are insolvent debtors, the said Pierre Beyeye and Francois Hagata, Co-partners under the firm name of P. Beyeye & Co., are hereby declared to be insolvent. It is hereby ordered that the Sheriff of the said County of Inyo be, and he is hereby appointed Receiver of the property of said Insolvents and that upon his giving a bond to the people of the State of California, conditioned as required by law, and in such sum as the Court may order, and qualifying, he take charge and possession of all the estate real and personal, of said insolvent debtors, whatsoever and wheresoever situate, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all their deeds, vouchers, books of account and papers; and to keep and care for and dispose of the same until the appointment of an Assignee of their estate. All persons having the same or any part thereof in his or their possession are hereby directed to deliver said property to said Receiver, and all persons owing money to said insolvents, or either of them, are hereby directed to pay the same to said Receiver, and that said Receiver keep said property, or the proceeds thereof, till the further order of this Court. And all persons are hereby forbidden to pay any debts to said insolvents, or to deliver any property belonging to such insolvents, or either of them, to him or them, or any person, firm, corporation or association for their use, and the said debtors are hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered.

It is further ordered, that all the creditors of said debtors be and appear before the Hon. Geo. M. Gill, Judge of the Superior Court of the said County of Inyo, in open court at the court-room of said court in the town of Independence, in said County of Inyo, on the 22nd day of December, 1894, at 10 o'clock a. m. of that day, to prove their debts and choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtors. It is further ordered, that this order be published in the Inyo Independent, a newspaper of general circulation, published in the County of Inyo, as often as the said paper is published before the day set for the meeting of creditors.

And it is further ordered, that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvents be stayed.

Dated November 14th, 1894.

GEO. M. GILL,
Judge of the Superior Court.

A LITERARY EXPERIENCE OF TOLSTOI.

The renowned writer, L. Tolstoi, met, a few years ago, a rather young aspirant and beginner in literary work. After exchanging a few thoughts in a little conversation they had together, the young man asked him if he would be kind enough to give his opinion of a manuscript that he wished to send to the great writer.

Tolstoi promised. A few days later he was sitting in his study and read over the manuscript sent by Mr. N——. It was a short little story, written in beautiful, plain language.

Its idea was clear and set forth in a manner that unmistakably proved that the story came from under the pen of a man of literary talent, and surely of a great future.

He returned the manuscript, and told the author what he thought of it.

Two years after he met again Mr. N——. In the course of a few remarks on literature, journalism, contributions, and contributors he inquired, by the way of the fate of his manuscript that he had read.

Much was the surprise when he was told that it was refused by all the leading newspapers of the capital.

"Well," added Mr. N——, "my article could not escape the fate of any other, signed with an unknown name."

This made such a deep impression upon the greatest Russian writer that he promised to himself to send his next little story to a prominent newspaper signed with a common name.

So he did, and some time passed away, he then sent an article signed X. Y. Z.

When he did not get any answer he went to see the editor, who, not knowing the Count Tolstoi by his face (all photographs of Tolstoi that are published present the Count in his peasant costume, and resemble little the great writer in ordinary dress), returned the article to the pseudo X Y Z, who curiously inquired the reasons why his article was not accepted, and, if possible, the opinion of it.

The editor looked sneeringly at the old man, and, shrugging his shoulders, answered that it was very poorly written, and were the author of it a young man he might possibly succeed in the future, but, seeing the age of the author, he could only advise him not to try any literary work at all.

"By the way" inquired the editor, "have you written anything before that was ever accepted by any publisher or newspaper?"

"Well, yes; some insignificant little things like 'Peace and War,' 'Anna Karenina,' etc.," was the answer. Judge of the countenance of the editor, who then understood that he was speaking with the Count L. Tolstoi.

Almost all kinds of labor are paid twice as well in Paris as in the departments of France; bakers in Paris make 67 pence per day, in the departments 35 pence; carpenters 83 pence and 38 pence respectively.

TO PUT ON needed flesh, no matter how you've lost it, take Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. It works wonders. By restoring the normal action of the deranged organs and functions, it builds the flesh up to a safe and healthy standard—promptly, pleasantly and naturally. The weak, emaciated, thin, pale and puny are made strong, plump, round and rosy. Nothing so effective as a strength restorer and flesh maker is known to medical science; this puts on healthy flesh not the fat of cod liver oil and its filthy compounds. It rouses every organ of the body to activity, purifies, enriches and vitalizes the blood so that the body feels refreshed and strengthened. If you are too thin, too weak, too nervous, it may be that the food assimilation is at fault. A certain amount of bile is necessary for the reception of the fat foods in the blood. Too often the liver holds back this element which would help digestion. Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery stimulates, tones up and invigorates the liver, nourishes the blood, and the muscles, stomach and nerves get the rich blood they require.

Spent Hundreds of Dollars with no Benefit.

M. J. COLEMAN of 22 Sargent St., Roxbury, Mass., writes: "After suffering from dyspepsia and constipation with untold agony for at least 18 months, I am more than pleased to say that after using Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery and 'Pleasant Pellets' for one month, I was entirely cured, and from that day to this I do not know, thank God, what even a slight headache is. I paid a doctor on Tremont St., Boston, in one day (for his advice only,) the sum of $10.00 with $5.50 for medicine, and derived no benefit. I got more relief in one hour from your medicines, as far as my stomach was concerned, than from all the other medicine I used.

M. J. COLEMAN, ESQ.

If any person who reads this is suffering from dyspepsia or constipation and will use your medicine as I have done, he will never regret it."

PARSON PLADLEY.

It was "meeting time" in Huddersfield, Massachusetts Bay Colony, on a Sunday morning in June, 1676. The fifty or sixty log buildings which made up the settlement stood silent as so many tombs among the black stumps of the half cleared fields, for every soul in the place, from the old man of ninety to the youngest child, was in the meeting house on the hill—every soul, that is, except Abner True.

Abner True, whose father was a deacon and tithing man and counted second only to the minister himself in rigid piety, was actually playing truant from meeting, and this in a village which looked upon Plymouth and Weymouth as dangerously worldly towns, relaxed in morals and manners by overmuch prosperity.

But Abner had worked from sun to sun every day of the last week, and knew he must do the same every day of the next week and the week after that, for the corn was to be hoed, the grass crops got in and a score of other tasks to be done.

It seemed to him too hard that on this one day of rest he should be obliged to sit upon a backless plank bench all the forenoon, if indeed he did not find himself forced to sit there longer, since Parson Pladley, who rarely preached less than three hours, sometimes preached four and once or twice had been known to exceed five hours.

Abner felt sure that the sermon would not be a short one this day, even according to the preacher's idea of brevity, and the more he thought of it the more he dreaded it until he became willing to incur any punishment for the sake of escaping that discourse.

So when Deacon Amos, with his wife and younger children, were ready for meeting no Abner could be found. Hidden in the little haymow of the rough barn he saw the family depart—his father marching ahead, equipped with musket, bandoleer and powder horn, for King Philip and his Indians were at war against the whites, and no man throughout the colony went to field or church without his arms.

Similar groups, similarly accoutered, paced solemnly along toward the rude sanctuary upon the hill until Abner, seeing that all Huddersfield had passed, felt that he was safe—for the present—and lay down upon the soft hay to prepare for the sound nap he had so longed for.

Below old Fly, the farm horse, stamped and munched; without the hens crowed in the sunshine with a drowsy note that should have been favorable enough for slumber. Put between his guilty consciousness of what he had done and his dread of what Deacon Amos would do Abner could not manage to go to sleep.

He began to wish himself upon that backless plank bench, even if the sermon were to last all day; yet a tardy arrival would be nearly as great an offense as not to come at all, and he had not the courage to meet the public reproof which Parson Pladley might administer, or to hasten the private chastisement that Deacon Amos would surely inflict.

The time went on. The old house was still now; the hens uttered only an occasional croak. From the far distance the preacher's voice came down on the warm breeze in a softened murmur. Abner was dozing.

What was that? He heard a sound that wakened him quite, and he sprang up to listen.

Nothing but a slight swishing sound in the tall grass behind the barn—nothing but that. It was probably some fox or polecat on the watch to snatch a chicken. Abner peered out through a crack to see if he could discover the animal, for the swishing sound seemed drawing nearer.

In the meeting house Parson Pladley had turned his big hourglass twice, and now the sands of the third hour were almost spent. Before him rows of serious men, women and children looked up in reverent attention, not once removing their earnest eyes from the minister.

The heavy door was flung open and shut again with a loud bang that startled every member of the congregation. A boy, staggering and streaming with perspiration, ran up the broad aisle and fell exhausted at the foot of the pulpit.

Every man stretched out his hand to the musket that stood beside him; but no one rose, no one said a word or uttered an exclamation.

Whatever the danger was—and they knew well what it might be—this was God's house, and in it none but God's servant should raise a voice or venture upon any action unless he permitted.

The minister descended from his place, leaned over the panting Abner and caught the few words the boy had strength to whisper, "Savages—full fivescore—stealing up—to take us unaware!"

The minister returned to the pulpit.

"Kindle your matches, brethren," said he in a voice of perfect tranquillity.

The ring of flint and steel sounded all over the house.

"Make ready your guns," continued the minister, taking up a heavy musket and blowing the match or fuse by which it was discharged. "Musketeers, to your stations. Ye that have but swords or pikes, be fast."

The congregation obeyed these orders as calmly as they had been given. Twenty-five men, headed by Deacon True, silently ranged themselves at the loopholes which which were pierced in the door and along the walls. Each knew his position and took it without delay or hesitation, while the fifteen men who had no firearms sat stiffly on the benches with the women and children, most of whom had not looked behind them since Abner rushed in.

Parson Pladley looked at the hourglass, which still continued to run, and quietly resumed his sermon. Around the sides of the room the musketeers stooped at the loopholes amid the light vapor from their smoldering matches.

On the benches the body of listeners kept their composed countenances turned upon the preacher. Save his voice, there was no sound but an infrequent metallic rattle as some musketeer examined his gun or loosened his iron hilted broadsword in the scabbard. The words of the preacher sounded through the house:

"And even as aforetime the heathen did furiously rage, and did compass the children of the covenant with spear and with javelin around about"——

A high pitched, thrilling screech filled the air without and now rose above the minister's voice. It was sustained and prolonged in many savage throats. There came quick, sharp patterings on the roof and walls, like hailstones.

Enoch Brett fell backward from his loophole with an arrow through the brain. Another man rose from his seat, picked up the gun which Brett had dropped and took the vacant station.

A dozen muskets answered the storm of missiles. Their fire seemed to check the advance of the Indians, inasmuch as the war cry grew fainter and the pattering of the arrows diminished.

Parson Pladley had not interrupted his sermon, although his voice had been temporarily drowned by the noise of the assault and defense, except for the instant that he cast one glance at the musket beside him and another at the hourglass.

All the men who could act were at their posts; why should he not continue to the end while waiting for the desperate struggle which must come? His sense of duty told him that he ought not to cease his holy office before the appointed time, except under compulsion in which he must recognize the hand of God.

His hearers understood this as well as if he had declared his determination in so many words. They did their part by listening with steady attention.

Again the cries grew louder and arrow flights thicker. The guns replied, but this time the attack was not repulsed. A ponderous thumping on the door, which shook the whole building, told that some kind of battering ram was being employed to break it down. A few more such shocks and the door must fall.

Only a pinch or two of sand remained in the hourglass. Still it was not quite empty, and Parson Pladley preached on.

Crash! The door was half off its hinges. The firearm men crowded behind it and delivered a volley that appeared for a minute to clear the passage. There was yet some sand in the hourglass. The parson's lips could be seen to move, though his voice was not heard.

A renewed yell, and the crashing blows once more beat upon the door. No shots answered this time, for the muskets were empty.

An arrow whistled across the church and stuck quivering in the front of the pulpit. Around the edges of the shattered door hatches and clubs were brandished in the faces of the defenders, who dashed them aside with the butts of their guns. The women began to scream.

The last sand ran out of the hourglass. Parson Pladley bowed his head and said "Amen!" And all the congregation answered together, "Amen!"

Up sprang the hitherto motionless listeners—women to the rear, men to the the front—and from the pulpit the old minister with sword and gun led the way to the aid of the others, who were beginning to give ground before the mass of hideously painted figures who were forcing their way through the entrance.

Then came out another side of the Puritan character. The fierce energy—almost joy—with which the colonists fought was as surprising as the stony self control they had shown but a moment before. Ahead of them all, Parson Pladley swung his mighty sword with cries which betrayed the old horse soldier of Cromwell and Harrison, for such he had been, and of those who followed him more than one had stood in the ranks of the pikemen who met the charges of Prince Rupert's cavaliers, and repelled them too.

As if he remembered this, the minister lifted up his strong voice in a stern psalm which had thundered over the battlefields of Naseby and Marston Moor—the war song of David, the king, rejoicing over his victory:

"I have pursued mine enemies and overtaken them; neither did I turn again till they were consumed.

"I have wounded them that they were not able to rise; they are fallen under my feet.

"For thou hast girded me with strength unto the battle; thou hast subdued under me those that rose up against me."

The Indians were like wolves combating lions. They shrank, wavered and were pressed back to the door, through it and outside of it. Then by one last rush they were broken, scattered and dispersed. They ran in every direction for the shelter of the woods; many of them fell by the way under the pikes and swords of their pursuers. Huddersfield was saved.

Within the meeting house, now half ruined, dim with powder smoke and heaped with broken benches, arrows and dead bodies, the congregation gathered around its minister, who, blackened and bloody, with gown torn to shreds and a great slash across his forehead, once more raised up his voice—this time in the glorious strains of one of their triumphant hymns.

All joined in it—even the wounded, who could scarcely lift their heads from the ground, and the dying, who sang their last breaths away in the grateful chorus.

When the injured had been cared for and there was once more time for ordinary matters Parson Pladley called Abner True to him.

"Son Abner, thou didst well so cunningly to avoid those ruthless savages and privily warn us betimes. For this thou meritest reward."

Abner looked up astonished.

"And this shall be thy reward—that for thy willful tarrying away from the sanctuary thou shalt receive no discipline—from the church."

"But my father will"— stammered the boy.

"Of a surety he will," placidly replied the minister, "and I trust it may do thee good."

"Come with me, Abner," said Deacon Amos.—Manley H. Pike in Youth's Companion.

Masonry Impervious to Water.

It is found that masonry may be rendered impervious to water, especially in positions exposed to direct contact with that element, by the application of coal tar. The latter is employed in a boiling state, in one or more layers, or it may be made to flame up before being used, the first being suitable for surfaces exposed to the air, while the second is appropriate in the case of parts intended to be covered up. This method of treating foundations is declared to be of special utility in all public buildings, particularly those designed for the preservation of works of art, preventing as it does exudations of water charged with lime salts from the mortar.—New York Sun.

Siberia.

A graphic idea of the immense size of Siberia may be gleaned from the following comparison: All of the states, kingdoms, principalities, empires, etc., of Europe, except Russia, and all of the United States, including Alaska, could be placed side by side in Siberia, and yet the uncovered space would be equal to a country containing an area of 300,000, square miles.

ACROSS THE MOUNTAINS OF CORSICA.

Charles H. Adams describes "A Jaunt Into Corsica" in the September number of "The Century," and Andre Castaigne furnishes striking illustrations. Mr. Adams says of a diligence ride:

"How can I describe that never-to-be-forgotten romantic ride across the mountains of Corsica? The conductor blew his horn, the driver thrashed his horses with his merciless, long-lashed whip, and the boy driving the lead horse pounded his weak-looking steed, and our heavy-laden diligence moved off, leaving the gaping crowd looking after us. As the roads in Corsica are in the same perfect condition that European roads generally are, we moved up the mountain at a good pace.

"The mountains of the island are very steep, so that our rise was rapid, and we were not long in reaching a great height, from which a magnificent panorama was enjoyed. I beheld the greater part of the island; to the north, the Capo Corso; to the west, Porto, Sagona, and Ajaccio. To the east, the blue Mediterranean was plainly visible, dotted with the islands of Monte Cristo, Pianosa, Capraja, and Elba, and farther away was the mainland of Italy. The entire island resembled a vast rocky relief-map, its principal mountain-chains, with their rivers, and valleys, being distinctly recognizable. To the right of us, on the lofty summits of Monte Rotondo, were fields of snow and ice, with the greenest of verdue close to the snow. At the side of the road, for miles, were little brooks, and on the edges of these brooks were washerwomen, who cast inquiring glances upon us as we whirled by."

HEAD OF HER CLASS.

A little girl just experienced her first term at a nearby school, and who had been working hard to reach the eminence of her ambition—the head of her class—rushed home not long since, her eyes as bright as diamonds, and her face flushed with triumph.

"Oh, papa, I'm head of the class now."

"I'm delighted to hear it. Who is in your class?"

"Why, me and Tillie Smith."

"How is it that you are at the head?"

"Why, papa, you see, Tillie she stayed home to-day."—Exchange.

NEVER IDLE.

"A million people out of work," says a newspaper writing of these hard times. Added to this misfortune are the physical infirmities with which thousands have to bear. But there is one thing that is never idle; always at work, unceasingly in search of those thus deterred it seeks to cure such and help them to grasp a chance when it comes. This is the mission of St. Jacob's Oil. Among the millions there are thousands suffering with neuralgia. For this it is a positive cure. Use it and there will be a thousand sufferers less and a thousand chances more to get work and hold it. Better times may soon come and there is nothing like the great remedy for pain to help you out of painful troubles and into place again.

The world owes us all a living, yet no man can collect the debt unless he pulls off his coat and takes it from the world's hide.

KIDNEY TROUBLE.

Some most excruciating pain comes from derangement of the kidneys. This is the testimony of Senator Henry C. Nelson of New York, as to the value of ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS in such cases:

"On the 27th of February, 1883, I was taken with a violent pain in the region of the kidneys. I suffered such agony that I could hardly stand up. As soon as possible I applied two ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS, one over each kidney, and laid down. In an hour, to my surprise and delight, the pain had vanished and I was well. I wore the plasters for a day or two as a precaution and then removed them. I have been using ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS in my family for the last ten years, and have always found them the quickest and best remedy for colds, strains and rheumatic affections. From my experience I believe they are the best plasters in the world."

Basil Caddledumph, of Rattlewax, Tex., has a nail growing on both his knee-caps. They are the exact size and shape of Caddledumph's thumb nails. They wore large holes in the knees of his trousers and procured for him the reputation for piety which he did not deserve. Caddledumph is a plumber.

While under the influence of liquor Jacob Shufeldt, of Akron, Ohio, rubbed liquid glue on his hair, under the belief that it was oil. He then went to bed. They had to chop the pillow case off with a hatchet in the morning, and Shufeldt's head looks as though somebody had tried to cut his hair with a sickle.

About three miles from the town of Cordele, Ga., is located a body of water called the "Vanishing Lake." It has an area of four square miles and every autumn it dries up completely, although a week before this phenomenon takes place it is twelve feet deep in some places. The water reappears in the spring.

It has often been told how instruments have been made, delicate enough to punch a hole in a human hair. A Parisian genius excels this in the invention of a machine that will split one hair longitudinally into thirty-six strips. He claims that some day he will be able to split the thread of a spider's web.

Beaufort le Binswanger, the gentlemanly floor-walker in a large Chicago pork-packing establishment, is suffering from gastritis, contracted, so he asserts, while examining his meter to see why it registered 10,000 cubic feet when not in use. Binswanger is not taken seriously, because it is remembered that in August last he wanted to weigh a striped bass with its own scales.

LIFE OR DEATH?

It is of vital importance that it should be understood by persons whose kidneys are inactive, that this condition of things is finally inductive of a state of the organs where life hangs in the balance. Bright's disease, diabetes, albuminuria are all diseases of a very obstinate character in their mature stage, and all have a fatal tendency. They often baffle the most practiced medical skill, and the most approved remedies of materia medica. But opposed at the outset—that is to say, when the kidneys begin to discharge their functions inactively—with Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, the dangerous tendency is checked. Very useful, also, is this household medicine for those ailments of common occurrence constipation, biliousness, dyspepsia and nervousness. It is a safeguard against malaria and averts chronic rheumatism.

DEAFNESS CANNOT BE CURED

by local applications as they cannot reach the diseased portions of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

HYPNOTIC TRICKERY.

A Professional Subject Fools a Number of Physicians.

GREAT INSENSIBILITY TO PAIN.

He Goes Through all the Catalogue of Manifestations and Laughs at the Mesmerizers.

Mr. Ernest Hart, editor of the London "Medical Journal," reveals many of the tricks of professional hypnotists in an aritcle in the October number of the "Century," entitled "The Eternal Gullible." After quoting literally from the confession made to him by a hypnotic subject, L., Mr. Hart continues:

Being curious to study the technic of so exceptionally gifted an artist as "L.," I accepted his offer, to use his own elegant language, "to give a show at my house." I invited several medical acquaintances interested in hypnotism, including J. Milne Bramwell, Dr. Hack Tuke, Dr. Outterson Wood, Surgeon-Colonel J. B. Hamilton, Mr. Wingfield, and others, to be present on the occasion. L. brought two other subjects with him; one of these was introduced by him as his cousin, but there was so strong a family likeness between all the three that they might easily have passed for brothers. There are few people, who, as Sydney Smith said of Francis Horner, "have the Ten Commandments wirtten on their faces." It is, therefore, not the fault of these ingenuous youths that their physiognomy is not exactly, to put it delicately, such as would generally be accepted as a guarantee of good faith. They went through all their ordinary "platform" business, stimulating the hypnotic sleep, performing various antics "under control," and in particular "going through catalepsy," to use my friend's own phrase.

Not the least interesting parts of the "show" was the preliminary hypnotization of L. by the demonstrator of physiology already referred to, whose eyes had not yet been opened to the fact that he had been imposed upon. When he commanded L. to "sleep," the latter obediently did so, with all the usual appearances of profound hypnotization, muscular relaxation facial congestion, upturned eyeballs, not moving when touched, apparent insensibility, stertor, insensibiity to sound, light, and external stimuli. The performance was splendid and complete, and Mr. —— enjoyed a moment's triumph. But L. instantly woke up again with a leer as soon as the operator announced that he was "under influence." Mr. —— made several further attempts to hypnotize his former subject, each time with the same result. The situation was comic, yet had in it an element of pathos; the operator was so earnest a believer that the shock of his awakening was almost painful to witness.

L.'s peformance was not destitute of merit, but to the critical judgment it left a good deal to be desired. He overdid his part, the congestion of his face being exaggerated to a degree almost suggestive of impending apoplexy, while his snoring somewhat overstepped the modesty of nature. These points were dwelt on by more than one of the gentlemen present, but I am not altogether free from a suspicion that in some of the cases at least the observation was of an ex-post-facto nature. On the whole, it was a very clever, but somewhat overdone imitation of the ordinary hypnotic sleep.

One of L.' companions seemed to me to simulate the hypnotic sleep better than he did, but L. at once dispelled any illusion there might have been by unexpectedly gripping him behind the knee. Some exhibitions of "post-hypnotic suggestion" given by the two were well calculated to tickle the groundlings in a music-hall, but could hardly have deceived any serious observer. The "catalepsy business" had more artistic merit. So rigid did L. make his muscles that he could be lifted in one piece like an Egyptian mummy. He lay with his head on the back of one chair, and his heels on another, and allowed a fairly heavy man to sit on his stomach; it seemed to me, however, that he was here within a "straw" or two of the limits of his endurance. The 'blister trick" spoken of by "Truth" as having deceived some medical men was done by rapidly biting and sucking the skin of the wrist. L. did manage with some difficulty to raise a slight swelling, but the marks of the teeth were plainly visible.

One point in L."s exhibition which was undoubtedly genuine was his remarkable and stoical endurace of pain. He stood before us smiling and open-eyed while he ran long needles into the fleshy parts of his arms and legs without flinching, and he allowed one of the gentlemen present to pinch his skin in different parts with strong crenated pincers in a manner which bruised it, and which to most people would have caused intense pain. L. allowed no sign of suffering or discomfort to appear; he did not set his teeth or wince; his pulse was not quickened, and the pupil of his eye did not dilate as physiologists tell us it does when pain passes a certain limit. It may be said that this merely shows that in L. the limit of endurance was beyond the normal standard, or, in other words, that his sensitiveness was less than that of the average man. At any rate, his performance in this respect was so remarkable that some of the gentlemen present were fain to explain it by a supposed "post-hypnotic suggestion," the theory apparently being that L. and his comrades hypnotized one another, and thus made themselves insensible to pain. Such a power would have been invaluable to the Jews whose grinders were extracted by our Plantagenet kings and to the heretics who fell into the clutches of the Inquisition. So far-fetched an explanation is, however, unnecessary. As surgeons have reason to know, persons vary widely in their sensitiveness to pain. I have seen a man chat quietly with the bystanders while his carotid artery was being tied without the use of chloroform. During the Russo-Turkish war, wounded Turks often astonished English doctors by undergoing the most formidable amputations with no other anesthetic than a cigarette. Hysterical women will inflict very severe pain on themselves—merely for wantonness or in order to excite sympathy. The fakirs who allow themselves to be hung up by hooks beneath their shoulder-blades seem to think little of it, and, as a matter of fact, I believe are not much inconvenienced by the process.

THE CHESAPEAK OYSTER INDUSTRY.

The oyster industry is a very important one in Maryland in the neighborhood of the waters of the Chesapeake Bay. Indeed, it has been said that this industry was more fruitful and important than any other, because by it more people were directly or indirectly supported. It is possible that, leaving out agriculture, this may be so, as in the industry more than 30,000 men, women and children are employed. Of these persons about 12,000 men are engaged in catching, while the remaining 18,000 are kept at work shelling, grouping, packing, and so on.

There are two ways of taking oysters, dredging and tonging, and in the season of '92-3 there were over 900 vessels engaged in dredging, and a great many more than this in tonging. The crews of dredging vessels vary with the capacity of the boats, and range from a captain and five men to a captain and twelve men. These men, by-the-way, though they must work hard and are exposed to great hardship and frequently to danger, are not well paid. Therefore a good class of labor is not attracted A Maryland State officer who recently investigated the oystermen of the Chesapeake said that the dredging crews were made up from "the lowest stratum of nearly all nations on earth. The tongers are of a better class, and are usually natives of the Chesapeake counties. The life of the oyster-catcher is hard and thankless, as he can hardly ever hope to earn more than enough to sustain himself meagerly. They are out in the severest winter weather, and not infrequently they are very unsuitably clad for such work. Many of the men so employed go out in the coldest weather with no heavlier body covering than half-worn flannel shirts. Last winter vessels were frozen up out in the bay, while the crews were without either food or water. The officer before alluded to has expressed the opinion that if the tender-heatred among the oyster consumers knew with how much pain and suffering these bivalves were brought from their salt-water homes to the dining-table, they would not eat them in the happy frame of mind necessary to a full appreciation of this finest of all sea-foods.—Harper's Weekly.

HOT MILK CURE.

Those who are afflicted with skin eruptions, especially with the red blotches and hard little lumps known as eczemous acne, will find relief by persevering in the following simple and inexpensive cure:

Do not bathe the affected parts in water; this aggravates cutaneous affections.

Each night before retiring heat about a pint of fresh, sweet milk. Do not let it boil, but let it rise just to the boiling point. Boiled milk loses its healing virtue. Then, with an old linen handkerchief, sop the hot fluid generously on the affected parts. Do not wipe the milk off, but let it dry into the skin.

In the morning bathe the skin in a little hot milk or in a dilution of listerine in hot water, in the proportion of two parts of water to one of listerine. Eat no constipating food. Avoid especially new fine bread, sugar, pastry and all starchy foods. Fruit, lettuce and radishes may be taken with good result. Be careful not to worry. Worriment is often the direct cause of eczema. Exercise actively in the open air, but do not heat the system.

If you will follow these few simple rules, and will persist in the application of the hot milk each night before retiring, the red spots will soon fade away, and the hard lumps will gradually soften and disappear.

Sometimes the disease is obstinate, and will not yield at once to the treatment. But persevere sturdily under all discouragement—you will in the end be rewarded by a complete cure. Cases of acute eczema, that for years have baffled the most patient efforts of skin specialists, have yielded to this treatment within six months. Hot milk is beneficial also to a healthy skin. It preserves its softness and clearness, and seems to act as an invigorating tonic. —New York Herald.

THE FARMER AT THE AUDITORIUM.

A farmer in Chicago last summer met a friend, who was also a farmer, and said to him:

"I say, now, 'John, before you go home, you must go to the Auditorium cafe (pronouncing it calf) and get some beefsteak with onions on it. It's great."

"I can't do it, Jake," the friend replied, "for I'm going home to-morrow. Besides, to-night I'm going to a party and 'twouldn't do to eat onions before going to the party."

"I say now, you go, party or no party, and when you pay your bill it will take your breath away."

The October returns to the Department of Agriculture do not show material changes from the last report in the crop conditions of the country. The outlook is better than it was a year ago.

ALFALFA OR LUCERN.

A Large Portion of the West now Growing it.

IT IS NOW ALMOST A NECESSITY.

Impervious Soil or an Underlying Stratum of Rock Near the Surface Prevents a Thrifty Growth.

Thousands of Western farmers who, two years ago, scarcely knew the difference between alfalfa, and orchard grass, are now seeding large portions of their farms to the beautiful, purple-blooming clover. Into hundreds of neighborhoods alfalfa has made its way swiftly, and as yet there has been no retreat. The alfalfa seeding may have been overdone in some directions—and yet the indications are that the mistake of too extensive seeding can hardly be made. To the average Western farmer, alfalfa is now almost a necessity. West of the Missouri river, tame grass culture is attended by many vicissitudes, and is practically out of any farming into which profit enters as a factor. Red clover thrives over limited areas, and timothy occasionally pays for cutting; but over the larger portion of the Great West no commonly grown forage plant, excepting alfalfa, can be depended upon, even in what are considered the favorable years.

Alfalfa, on the other hand, seems almost absolutely certain to give good results, whatever the season. Only the most protracted drouths affect it in the least, and then only to the extent of the current growth. Frosts have injured it but once in Kansas, there are few insects that do it damage, and a good crop of most excellent hay may be cut two, three and even four times a year, or the field may be pastured from March until Thanksgiving. Alfalfa clover is not, like its near relation, red clover, a biennial plant, but is perennial, and its seeding is for all time if so desired. This is a compensating quality, for thorough seeding is a slow and expensive proceeding, and could scarcely be afforded for one, two or three years' crops. The wonderful capacity of alfalfa for withstanding drouth and yielding profitable returns despite unfavoring weather is consequent upon its permanent character. The yield of alfalfa under favoring conditions is astonishing. Three crops, averaging one and a-half tons of dry hay each, are common, and a recent report of a Saguache county, Colorado, farmer who harvested an aggregate yield of six tons of hay from a single acre last year, brought out many statements from Kansas farmers of much larger crops. Perhaps three or three and a-half tons of hay per acre may be taken as an average crop.

Alfalfa is only moderately good for pasturage. Its habits of growth is not to form a sod, giving weeds an abundant opportunity to gain a foothold when the alfalfa is young, or is kept cosely cropped so that it affords no shade. Then, also, not forming a sod, it allows stock to sink in deeply in wet weather, to the serious injury of the land and of the alfalfa. But it starts early in the spring, bears moderately close cropping well, never ceases growing because of dry weather, and but a small area is required to support an animal. A great drawback to pasturing alfalfa, however, is its tendency when moist to induce hoven or bloat. It is much worse in this respect than red clover. A heavy, impervious subsoil or an underlying stratum of rock within eight or ten feet of the surface most effectually prevents thrifty growth of alfalfa, unless it is irrigated. It is the failure to understand and act properly upon this point that led many Western farmers, particularly in eastern Kansas, to the declaration that alfalfa as a farm crop is worthless—that it will not yield sufficiently to pay the cost of production.

It is useless to attempt to grow alfalfa except where the depth of soil is such as has been suggested, and no one should seed more than a very small patch until he has satisfied himself by actually digging into the ground for ten or twelve feet that there is no statum of rock or impervious subsoil within that depth.

Seed is usually expensive, and for this reason many farmers make the mistake of being too sparing in its use. No more fatal error is possible, for of all undesirable things on a farm, a half stand of alfalfa is the worst. Not less than twenty pounds of seed should be used under any circumstances, and except where conditions for germination are favorable still heavier seeding will be in the interest of economy. Twenty pounds of seed at the usual price will cost about $2, which seems excessive, but it is the most reckless of prodigality to attempt to economize in the line of reducing this cost by lighter seeding. A thin stand can be remedied only by reseeding, which entails a heavy expense and the loss of one or two years' use of the land. It is quite certain that alfalfa is destined to grow in importance as an American farm crop, just as it now is an important European forage plant under the name of lucern. The advantages which its culture offers are so numerous that it cannot fail to make its way into the agriculture of many regions. But there are obstacles to its successful cultivation in many sections of the country which preclude the possibility of its ever taking the place of timothy or clover, or of any other commonly grown forage plant. It is a crop adapted to special conditions, and more valuable than other similar crops only under those special conditions which are not found in all parts of the country. West of the Missouri river it is needed for the semi-arid regions, but it is a crop to be experimented with cautiously, rather than adopted blindly, except where experience has proven it to be successful.—American Agriculturist.

HEAT AND COLD EXTERNALLY.

Heat, applied to the surface of the body has long been in general use to assuage inflammation and soreness. It acts by flushing the part with a fresh supply of the fluids necessary to its life, and by the counter irritation which is set up.

The aciton of heat is instantaneous, and the relief obtained by its use is often immediate and almost miraculous.

Its place as a remedial agent, however, is fast being usurped by what seems at first sight to be exactly the opposite form of treatment, namely, that of cold application.

At the present day, so enthusiastic have some auhtorities become over the virtues of all degrees of cold to allay inflammation, that they proclaim its value and advocate its employment in every form of disease attended by symptoms of swelling, redness and pain.

The reasonableness of an excessive adherence to either of these two modes of treatment is at least open to question. Not only are there undoubted instances where the action of both is the same, but there probably are many cases in which the application of heat will be found of much more benefit than that of cold, and vice versa.

Different persons are constituted differently, so that while on general principles we might reasonably look for a favorable result to follow a given treatment we may find, on the contrary, that it has only aggravated the symptoms. There are many cases on record of persons whose systems have been wrought up to a state of complete revolt by the external use of heat, and other cases where a similar result has followed the external application of cold, while an opposite line of treatment has been followed by immediate relief.

As a general rule, in every case of moderate inflammation or soreness we should consult the feelings of the patient. If, for instance, there is an accompanying sense of feverishness it is more than likely that the slightest reduction of temperature which follows cold applications will be of decided benefit; while, on the other hand, we may reasonably expect the application of heat to prove advantageous if there is an inclination on the part of the patient to a feeling of general chilliness.

In short, the benefit to be derived from subjecting an inflamed part of the body to the action of either heat or cold depends largely on opposing successfully the abnormal condition of the system.—Youth's Companion.

THE USES OF SALT WITH FOOD.

The question is often raised to what extent we should make use of salt with our food.

In all ordinary cases, at least, the matter may be left to the individual appetite. Any light excess of salt is easily cared for by the system, while a craving for a small amount with the food is perfectly normal, and under no circumstances harmful.

Indeed, although we take at all times more salt as seasoning than is absolutely needed in the body, such is the necessity of its presence that food prepared without salt is hard to be considered nutritious.

Common salt—sodium chloride—is, perhaps, on the whole, one of the most important inorganic substances in the body; so important, in fact, that it can be said that there are no tissues or fluids in the body in which it does not occur. The average human body contains from eight to ten ounces

The part which salt plays in the human economy is in dissolving much of the nutrition which is supplied to the body, and facilitating its absorption and distribution to the various tissues.

The connection between the action of salt and that of the various tissues and fluids is so intimate, in other words, the presence of salt is so necessary to the vitality of the various parts of the body, that life would soon come to an end if it were withdrawn entirely.

A substance to which so much influence is ascribed might naturally be supposed to have some virtue as a medicine. Such virtue has at different times been attributed to it by some authorities.

For example, it was supposed, since the acid in the gastric juice was found to be derived from sodium chloride, that the addition of a greater supply of common salt would be of benefit in cases of indigestion due to a weakened state of the gastric juice. But experiment showed that an increased supply of salt taken with the food was eliminated from the system, instead of being used to form the desired digestive acid.

On the whole, then, we may regard salt as an indispensable adjunct to food, but not as a substance possessing any peculiar medicinal properties.—Youth's Companion.

Wife—"The ladies of our club have established such a lovely noon rest for poor working girls, with lunch-rooms, a parlor and a library. It's just exquisite, and I got the daintiest lunch there this noon, and it only cost me twelve cents."

Husband—"How many working girls were there?"

Well, you see there were so many of the club ladies there that there was but little room for the working girls. It is not a very large place."

Saint Anthony's body is reported to have been lately stolen from the shrine of Padua, where it was kept, and was found afterward in a neighboring wood, despoiled of its valuable ornaments.

ELLERSLIE.

The Rural Home of Ex-Vice President Morton,

A VERY ELABORATE COUNTRY SEAT.

A Model Farm that Would Make the Average Farmer Turn Green With Envy. Systematic Dairying.

The recent nomination of ex-Vice-President Levi P. Morton for Governor of the Empire State, makes everything pertaining to him of particular interest just now. There can be no better time than the present for us to visit Ellerslie, the beautiful country seat near Rhinecliff-on-the-Hudson, where the ex-Vice-President finds rest from the tedious routine consequent on his active political life. To reach this quiet retreat, one must leave the station at Rhinecliff and drive about two miles south over a country road. This is lined with occasional farmhouses during the first mile, after which it runs through a wooded solitude, in the depths of which is a wide-open gate, silently welcoming the visitor to Ellerslie. A few moments' drive and the woods are left behind, while we follow the roadway over a level stretch of lawn, with greenhouses and laden grape trellises on either hand.

At the end of a shady lane we come upon another lawn dotted with flower-beds, and across this is the substantial stone and frame mansion that Mr. Morton calls home.

It is a double house with a great, broad hallway, handsomely decorated and sumptuously furnished throughout. Costly bric-a-brac, rich rugs and divans greet the eye on every side. The elaborate design of the stairway is worthy of mention. To the right of the hall are two superb drawing-rooms; to the left, Mr. Morton's library and private study. But there is too little space here for a detailed description of the house.

Some little distance off are several great barn-like structures. These are the farm building, only more substantial and costly than those generally devoted to such use. The Western soil-tiller would doubtles view them with wide-open eyes. The farming here is under the superintendence of H. M. Cotterell, most of whose time is devoted to the dairy and poultry yard. There are over a hundred cows in the dairy, more than half of them belonging to the celebrated Guernsey breed. A small board at the head of each stall bears the pedigree of its occupant. One of these cows, "Bretonne," has a national reputation. She produced six tons of milk last year, five and one-half per cent. of which was butter. In another stall is the Guernsey bull "Decree," a prize-winner at many cattle shows. The herd is carefully tended. Through the drinking trough in each stall runs a constant stream of water, fresh from an artesian well. Three hundred and fifty tons of hay fill the lofts above, and the front of the barn is occupied by machinery used for cutting fodder, grinding corn and conveying the prepared food to the hundred and sixty-five different cattle stalls.

Near by is the creamery, with its improved machinery for bottling milk and making butter. The latter product all goes to the capacious pantry of the Union League Club in New York, while the milk is sold in nearer towns.

The poultry house contains no less than five thousand chickens of all sorts and conditions, divided into flocks of fifty, each flock having a yard of its own. But this is not all, for in the basement are thirteen incubators holding four thousand one hundred and sixty eggs, eighty per cent. of which hatch. The chicks would multiply too fast if they were all kept, and most of them are sent to smart hotels in New York when they have reached the broiling age. There is a separate room for picking and dressing in the poultry house. Two hundred white Pekin ducks are quartered in a branch poultry yard of several acres, through which a pretty creek meanders.

When we return to the house, we find that the rarest treat of all has been reserved for the last. That is an inspection of the conservatories, which are under the care of Thomas Harrison, an English horticulturist. It were useless to attempt to name the almost countless varieties of beauitful plants and flowers, gathered from every corner of the globe. Suffice to say that there is a palm house, a rose house, a carnation house, a violet house, a propagating house, and others. Remember that each is fragrant and beautiful with a profusion of perfect specimens, and you will have some faint idea of the treat that awaits the visitor to Ellerslie—the rare treat that is reserved for the last.—Once a Week.

"But I don't want to buy your baking powder," insisted the lady of the house to the man at the door. "Why, madame," he said, "you are losing the opportunity of your life in the matter of economy alone; this baking powder of mine will make your bread so light you won't have to use any gas in your dining-room."

The "over formal" often impede and sometimes frustrate business by a dilatory, tedious, circuitous and (what in colloquial language is called) fussy way of conducting the simplest transactions. They have been compared to a dog, which cannot lie down till he has made three circuits round the spot.—Whately.

According to the report of the Master in Chancery, the value of the Chicago and Northern Pacific terminals have increased in value from $10,000,000 to $30,000,000.

CAPTURING SONS-IN-LAW.

A fond mother tells how she married off her six daughters.

"I did it," she says, "with the frying pan, a cosy fire and cushioned rocking chair. There, now, you have the whole story," confessed the lady.

"I would have every one of those girls on my hands this minute if I hadn't found them husbands out of my cookery book. Despising an old maid as I do a smoky chimney, when my eldest girl was full grown, I turned right and left for some means of marrying her. Mary was neither very handsome nor very lively, so I knew better than to trust to luck. So I just set to work and determined upon a plan that has never miscarried with any one of them.

"All my life I have made close observations of men's ways, and have heard great stories of the happy results of feeding the sex. So I looked carefully over the field and picked out a pleasant, thriving young fellow, whose habits were good and his heart whole. I began by asking him in a friendly manner to call. Then I led the conversation round to his mother, the way he had been nurtured, and what he most cared to eat in general.

I never missed a word, and after the first visit we got him to drop in to tea on Sunday evening. Then, you may be sure, I did my best; and when the second meal was over I knew the yearnings of that man's appetite better than he did himself.

"My calculations seemed to believe it best to start toward the close of the year. Spring is no good. A man loves all womankind at that season; his appetite is slight. 'In my experience, courtships started in November lead, as a rule, to a wedding in May. Of course, my chief reliance is in tempting food, but I would always advise supporting the liberal table with a big, comfortable crocking chair, drawn facing a cheerful fire. Speak of it as 'his chair,' and you won't make any mistake.

"Another thing, don't be too pressing. A steady eye and a light hand count for more than nagging. I was always careful not to gush, but if I had apple fritters on Tuesday I apologized for their poorness, and begged him to drop in on Thursday and let Mary redeem her mother's reputation with some particularly appetizing dish.

In the evening I had her trained to sit in a low sewing chair, under the big lamp, and either darn socks or hem dusters. When we spoke of her I said I trembled at the awful blow it would be for us if she should marry and go away. This kind of thing wa kept up till February 1, when my gentleman began to feel easy and snug, like one of the family.

"Then came the delicate moment, for just at this point I would introduce some silly dandy that neither I nor Mary would have looked at. But I coddled the youngster, had him to tea on the same night as regular, and waited to see what would happen. The ruse always suceeded. He and Mary would come blushing to ask if they might have each other, and while they made love in the parlor I looked up my cookery book to see my way to another son-in-law."—Pearson's Weekly.

SCIENCE AND PROGRESS.

Electrically heated quilts are the latest.

An electric rocking-chair has been invented.

Salt water has but little effect on aluminum.

A flash of lightning equals 12,000 horse-power.

The eye may be afflicted with forty-eight different diseases.

A substitute for glass is made from collodion wool, and is flexible, not brittle.

A machine making forty-two cigarettes a minute has been invented by a Frenchman.

Aluminum is used as a substitute for leather in building up the heels of boots and shoes.

Ship calking is now done by an automatic machine which makes 10,000 strokes per minute.

The Italians have established a water-power electric plant at Tivoli and will transmit 2,000-horse power eighteen miles across the Campaga to Rome. The streets of Rome will then be lighted by electricity.

Electricity has been adopted for towing the canal boats on the summit level of the Canal de Bourgoyne, which connects the Seine and Soane, crossing in its course the divide between the channel and the Mediterranean.

A unique trolley-car fender is proposed by a Boston inventor. He has taken the large revolving brushes from a street-sweeper and placed them in such a position under the car so that a person who happens to fall in front of the car will be swept from the track.

In Germany all underground wires are stretched in long, narrow iron tubes with open spaces at long intervals, into which inspectors can descend and investigate the lines at any time. After the pipes are laid it takes well-trained cats to string a line through the length and breadth of the city. The wire is attached to a collar or string around the neck of the cat. As soon as the cat is pushed into the narrow tube it finds it impossible to turn its body around and is compelled to either lie still or crawl out at the other end. It has previously been trained in smaller tubes and finally it has learned to crawl through the longest pipes. Sometimes, however, there is trouble. Cats are notional and they will fear danger and remain in some spot of the conduit. Then, to scare it forward, pistols are shot off. In England badger dogs are used for this purpose. These are more willing and smarter, but they are not able to crawl like the cat through the narrowest pipes.

LABOR STATISTICS.

For Comparative Purposes With Previous Years.

MASACHUSETTS MANUFACTURERS.

The Depression in Cotton Manufacturing in 1893 as Compared With 1892—Labor More Favored Than Capital.

The annual statistics of manufactures for 1893 for Massachusetts have just been made public by the Bureau of Statistics of Labor. We can only briefly allude to them at this time, but, for comparative purposes, with previous years, they are highly valuable. For purposes of comparison with the industrial conditions existing in 1892, 4,397 establishments are taken with invested capital to the amount of $439,015,263 in 1892 and $444,480,277 in 1893. This comparative showing does not necessarily indicate the relative prosperity of the several industries, as the capital includes not only cash, but notes and bills receivable, and the value of buildings, machinery and land, also stock on hand or in process of manufacture. But in the manufactures of cotton and woolen goods less capital was invested in 1893 than in 1892. It is observed, however, that the value of stock used in the manufacture of cotton goods was nearly one per cent. more in 1893 than in 1892 notwithstanding the average price of cotton was less in the former than in the latter year, and business was not as good. The depression in cotton manufacturing in 1893, as compared with the condition existing in 1892, is reflected more in the value of the goods made, which was nearly three per cent. less. Labor was more highly favored than capital in the general decline, as it took 61.97 per cent. of the value of the goods made, less the value of the stock, in 1893, to 58.19 per cent. in 1892, while capital suffered in the same proportion as labor gained.

The value of stock used in the manufacture of woolen and worsted goods was about 18 per cent. less in 1893 than in 1892. This about represents the decline in the price of wool. The value of woolens made was also about 18 per cent. less in 1893 than in 1892, but the value of worsteds made was only about 10 per cent. less. The worsted industry thus withstood the depression in trade better than the woolen. Capital, therefore, fared better in the manufacture of worsteds than in that of woolens. As compared with the value of the goods made in 1892 the worsted industry gave 75 per cent. better margin in 1893 for the payment of profit and general expenses, aside from wages.

The year 1893 is the first year compared with the preceding year since 1887 showing for all the manufacturing industries of the State a decrease in the avlue of goods made. The industrial improvement in this respect was particularly marked in 1887 as compared with 1886, and in 1892 as compared with 1891, but in 1893 as compared with 1892 the decline was very considerable.

There were 4.26 per cent. fewer persons employed in all the industries in 1893 than in the same industries in 1892. There was no exception favorable to any particular industry except that engaged in the manufacture of worsted goods. It its interesting to note that in 1892 the greatest number of persons employed in all the industries, considered together, was in November, while in 1893 the greatest number employed was in April. This characterized very generally each particular trade. That is, while the last three months of 1892 gave epmloyment to more persons than at any other period in that year, and thus indicative of the busiest season, in 1893 the busiest preiod, during which the greatest number of persons were employed, was in the spring. The statistical showings confirm two well-known facts, that all industries were well engaged during the latter half of 1892 and the first three to five months of 1893, after which a rapid decline in trade was experienced.

THE BARK OF FRUIT TREES.

As a general thing healthy trees are able to get rid of the old bark without any help from the cultivator, but in many cases they are all the better for having a little help from man. In many species of trees there is an arrangement provided by nature for helping the plant to get rid of its bark. These are called in scientific language "super cells," that is to say, cork cells. These appear at first on the outer bark as small brown spots. From year to year, however, they develop, sometimes eating into the bark in longitudinal lines, and in this way form the cracks which ultimately result in what is known as rough bark. As it is thus the design of nature to get rid of the outer bark, it is good practice to help nature in this work. For this purpose washes of various kinds are found in practice extremely useful. In fruit culture, soapy solutions have been found very effective, and in the unscientific work of sucessful farmers even lime wash has been found beneficial. In some of the interior counties of Pennsylvania a farmer would almost as soon think of never cleaning his horses as letting his orchard trees go without a coating of lime wash once a year. The practical results of this treatment speak for themselves. No healthier trees or more successful fruit crops can be had than result from this practice.—Meehan's Monthly.

INDEPENDENCE, CAL.

FRIDAY, NOV 30 1894

It is one of the curious facts of American politics that the country always feels kindly toward a political party after giving it a sound drubbing. All the disapproval, resentment and bad temper which culminate in a vote of punishment on election day give place immediately after to something very like good will. This habit is of a piece with the bluff manliness which oftentimes makes good friends of men who have fought each other, and it is identical in quality with the sweet penitence of the mother who strains to her heart the child just chastised for its own good. Something of this spirit is manifest just now in the attitude of public sentiment toward the Democratic party. The very men who two weeks ago were denouncing it as the instrument of evil and the author of unnumbered misfortunes, public and private, are now talking in a kinder tone. They are recalling the real service the party has done in times past; they are reviewing the difficulties with which it has contended during the past two years; they are admitting that the coincidence of universal financial depression with its accession to power was "hard lines;" they are admitting further that not all the evils of the times are due to the tariff disturbances, and therefore not fairly chargeable against the Democartic party; they are commending the firmness of Mr. Cleveland in relation to the late New York campaign, and they are admiring the courage within the party which in New York and elsewhere has cast out its devils—the Hills, the Tammanys, the Gormans, the Murphys, the Brices et al. And, as matters recently the subject of furious contention are talked over calmly, there are few so blinded by partisanship or so bitter in temper as really to believe that there is any political organization in this country whose membership is not profoundly and chiefly concerned in the popular welfare and in the national glory. That we must wait until after election for this tolerent spirit is perhaps a fact not wholly credible, but some allowance without prejudice must be made for the infirmities of human nature. There is oftentimes an outcome of practical wisdom from the very weakness of men; and perhaps we are none the less rich in the essence of national force because we fight to win, and wait until the campaign is past to be calmly thoughtful and judicially fair. Not for a year has the Democratic party been in such good character with the country as now. It has apparently reached the length of its offending; it has suffered the penalty of its faults and mistakes; it has purified its councils and now, under strong leadership, it stands face to the future. Its tariff policies are incorporated in the law of the land with the assurance of three years of practical trial. It has three months of power before it in which it may, if it will, commend itself to the country. Its fate in the election two years ahead need in no sense be an echo of the elections just past, for in truth the defeat it has suffered has done it more good than harm. The fortunes of the party in the elections of 1896 rest on the one hand, upon the success or failure of its tariff policy, and, on the other hand, upon its course between now and the fourth day of next March. If the country prospers under the Wilson—Gorman law; if in the remaining months of its power the Democratic Congress shall do something to strike the popular heart or in accord with the public will, it may go into the campaign of 1896 with the fairest hopes. But with respect to the coming few months, to do nothing or to blunder will doom it to defeat.—"Rural Press."

The Republican platform of this State declared in favor of woman suffrage. The party will have control of both branches of the Legislature and if a woman's suffrage bill is not passed it will be because the Republican party does not wish to carry out its election pledges.

The Japanese have captured Port Arthur, China's greatest stronghold.

Although the Republicans will have a majority in the next Senate, it is doubtful whether they will attempt to control the organization of that body. Their majority is so slender that they will beunable to shape legislation without a full attendence on the part of the Republican Senators, at all times. Again, the House majority is so large and so many of the members new at the business that much raw work is anticipated, and theRepublican Senators will try to shirk all the responsibility possible, or, at least, that is the programme outlined by recent dispatches from Washington.

One of the reforms which will be expected at the hands of the legislature this winter is the passage of a primary election law which will provide for the holding of all primary elections on the same day. The Australian ballot should be used and every precaution against illegal voting that now obtains at a general election should be incorporated in the primary election law. This seems to be the only way to limit the power of the bosses ond political strikers to the party of their choice. Under the present law a San Francisco tough votes at all primary elections and is as much at home under Buckley and Rainey as when doing dirty work for Dan Burns.

A HARD TASKMISTRESS.

The Late Rosina Vokes Took Her Art Rather Too Seriously.

The late Mrs. Clay, better known as Rosina Vokes, was a hard taskmistress. She took her art both seriously and rigidly and demanded the same from others. A young American girl during a one time connection with the Vokes company suffered extremely from a felon on her finger. Every movement of the arm gave her pain, and she was at length obliged to evade her required participation in "A Game of Cards," where the players clap hands, the one against the other. "You shirked your part last night, Miss Blank," Mrs. Clay took occasion to observe the following morning.

"I did," acknowledged Miss Blank, "for my finger is in such a condition, as you see, that present use of it is impossible."

"You will not shirk your part tonight, however," remarked Mrs. Clay, with an ominous gleam in her eye. The young American knew only too well that further remonstrance would probably result in her dismissal, so nothing more was said. That night, according to orders, she, with infinite pain, clapped hands briskly. At the first touch the blood gushed from her suffering finger; but, although her partner was Mrs. Clay, neither reference nor apology was made by that exacting star either then or afterward. "Still it was splendid training," said the young actress in later years. But to impartial, unprofessional outsiders such "training" smacks of tyranny.—New York Advertiser.

Speeches From Notes.

It is usually supposed by the lay reader that the greatest speeches made in congress are the result of long preparation and are delivered from voluminous notes. This is not always correct. The preparation may be all right, but in many cases notes do not exist at all. This may be illustrated from a little conversation I had with ex-Congressman John M. Farquhar. He was booked to speak at a reunion of veterans. Half an hour before he was announced to take the platform I approached and said:

"Mr. Farquhar, I shall be glad to get an advance copy of your speech."

"My dear sir," he replied, "I never wrote a speech in my life and never shall. I never spoke from notes but once in my life. That was when I was in congress, and my speech occupied over four hours. My notes consisted of five words scribbled on a piece of paper. I have kept that piece of paper, and when I have joined the majority it may be considered an interesting souvenir to somebody."

I thought so too.—Buffalo News.

Our Future Population.

The territorial area of Japan is about one-twenty-fourth that of the United States, not counting Canada, which is likely some time to come in, and it supports 40,000,000 people. At this rate it is computed that the North American continent would sustain a population of 1,000,000,000. How soon that limit is to be reached may be remitted to the prophets and the statisticians, but it will come some time without doubt, requiring an increasingly wise type of statesman and politician on the way if we are to hold together and carry out the destinies which seem appointed to us.—New York Tribune.

Shell Sounds.

The peculiar murmuring sound, not unlike the ripple of the waves on a still evening, which we hear on placing a shell or other hollow object to the ear is due to the fact that the concave surface concentrates and multiplies all different sounds around us, so as to render them audible. The many sounds always present in the air are augmented by the resonant cavity of the shell.—Science Journal.

LOST AND SPOILED MONEY.

The Bank of England Makes a Big Profit on Her Notes.

Bank notes of the value of thousands of pounds are annually lost or destroyed by accident. In the 40 years between 1792 and 1832 there were outstanding notes of the Bank of England, presumed to have been either lost or destroyed, amounting to £1,330,000 odd, every shilling of which was clear profit to the bank.

In many instances, however, it is possible to recover the amount of the note from the bank in full. Notice has to be given to the bank of the note supposed to be lost or stolen, together with a small fee and a full narrative as to how the loss occurred. The note is then "stopped"—that is, if the document should be presented for payment, the person "stopping" the note is informed when and to whom it is paid. If presented, after having been "stopped," by any suspicious looking person, and not through a banker, one of the detectives always in attendance at the bank would be called to question the person as to how and when the note came into his or her possession. It is quite a mistaken idea that "stopped payment" of a bank note has the effect supposed by very many people. It simply means that the Bank of England carefully keeps a lookout for the note which has been "stopped," and, though it cannot refuse to pay such note immediately on its being presented, a notification would at once be made to the person who stopped it, and the bank would give all the assistance in its power to enable the loser to recover the amount.

In the case of a bank note having been, say, burned by mistake, if the number is known and notice sent to the Bank of England it will pay the amount after an interval of five years from the date of lodging notice of destruction should no one have presented the note for payment in the meantime. The bank in such cases also insists on a guarantee being given by a banker or two householders that it shall be repaid in the event of the document turning up and being again tendered for payment. It is not at all an unusual circumstance for a mutilated note to be presented for payment, burned perhaps half through, with marks of burning on the fringes. Nor is the damage always accidental. The men who indulge in the luxury of lighting their pipes with a bank note are not always, as some may think, millionaires or recognized lunatics of society. The spoiled notes are more often than not presented by workmen or laborers, who confess without hesitation that they have intentionally lighted their pipes with them from mere braggadocio.—Ashton (England) Reporter.

An Anecdote of Perier.

Once during the schooldays of the president of the French republic his professor in geography asked him, "Perier, give us the exact position and indicate the latitude of the Gambier group." Casimir-Perier crossed his arms tightly upon his chest, looking very perplexed. One of his neighbors whispered to him the wrong answer, whereupon the professor gave him the exact position of this little group, which belongs to the more important French establishment of Tahiti, and after a short pause, and with a little point of irony, said: "You ought to know that, Perier, because it is thanks to your grandfather that France acquired the ascendancy in these parts of the world. It was through his efforts and entreaties that the dusky queen of these islands was induced to come to France, and the men of my generation still remember the comical songs which celebrated the event." Perier blushed considerably, but, holding his head still higher, answered the professor with his quick and peculiar diction, "I will most certainly go over this lesson again and try to be more proficient at the next lecture; but, so far as the deeds of my grandfather go, they are so numerous that I am not old enough yet to know them all."—San Francisco Argonaut.

A Parisian Industry.

A Paris correspondent describes one of the oddest industries of that city to be found in a little shop in the Rue des Ecoles, which deals exclusively with the secondhand boots of the men who work in the sewers. These boots are furnished by the state and come half way up the thigh, and each man is allowed a new pair every six months. When new, they cost $9; when sold secondhand, they realize the modest sum of 50 cents, but as at least 6,000 pairs per annum are sent to the Rue des Ecoles it makes quite a booming industry. The leather of these boots is, so to speak, tanned by the alkaline and greasy water in which the sewer cleaners paddle, and they are eagerly sought for by the great Parisian bootmakers, for this leather, being at once tough and light, serves to sustain the curve of the Louis XV heel.

Goldenrod's Peculiarity.

Probably a great many people who travel have failed to notice that the period of blooming of the goldenrod does not begin first in the south and move northward, but apparently in the other direction—from north to south. In some places in northern Vermont and New Hampshire goldenrod of the common field and railroad track variety is in profuse bloom as early as the 10th of July. On the Kennebec river the other day a traveler noted that the goldenrod was much more golden and less tinged with green than it is in Malden or Cambridge, Mass. And the place where the plant is latest of all in yellowing apparently is Cape Cod, where the dwarf seaside variety, most common there, hardly begins to do itself justice before September. It is possible that the northern goldenrod ripens before that farther south for the same reason that Indian corn ripens earlier in Vermont than it does in Virginia—it has got to ripen earlier if it is going to ripen at all.—Lewiston Journal.

An Improvement In Electric Bells.

One of the most objectionable qualities of the electric bell is its uniform noisiness and shrillness. There are many places in which an alarm of a less aggressive and peremptory nature is desirable, and it is surprising that a "quiet" electric bell has not been manufactured for use in offices, hotels or private houses. The bell can be adjusted to make as much or as little noise as may be needed. Its principal feature is that it can be used either as a slow striking bell, a single stroke bell or as an ordinary trembling bell, according to the way it is connected on.—Philadelphia Press.

GODS MADE TO ORDER.

The Chinese Variety Are of Both Sexes and All Sizes and Prices.

Chinese josses come from Amoy and Canton, where there are joss factories which supply Celestials with any shape, design or size desired. Josses are either male or female. If the former, they are fat and ungainly; if the latter, they are possessed of four arms.

The making of these images is simplicity itself, the manufacturers relying upon wooden or metal molds. These are filled with wet clay, which dries, is then touched up, dipped in molten glaze and allowed to cool. An average workman can make a hundred gods in a day. The clay used is kaolin and is shaded from red and gray to white and costs about a cent a pound. A good jossmaker can earn from 20 to 40 cents a day, while an image costs to make on an average about 3 cents. Natives pay 5 cents for them; foreigners, $5. Josses can be made in all colors, opaque, transparent or colorless. The most effective work is made by painting the clay with thick white paint and then dipping it in the glaze. Chinese curio dealers are very fond of antique josses, as they can be planted and dug up to order from the time of Confucius to the present day. The most popular is the "black joss." This is made by painting a kaolin cast with paint made of tar, bitumen, shellac or varnish, wrapping it in paper and then firing it in a furnace. In this way any shade of black can be obtained, and the color burns through, as can be proved by breaking.

The josses carved from wood and covered with gaudy colors are often very ancient. The prices vary from a few cents to $500 or more, according to the size, workmanship and amount of decorations. They range in size from an inch to 10 or 12 feet. In the larger sizes the carving is of a superior quality and the coloring admirable. Josses carved out of stone are rare and expensive. Those made of jade, pale green or light blue, fetch marvelous prices, while white, yellow or brown are almost as expensive. One of these, belonging to Lin, the ex-governor of Formosa, is about 8 inches high and is valued at $10,000. It is said to be 1,500 years old. In Fuchan they make josses out of stealite and selinite of various colors. The stone is so soft that the manufacturer, by rubbing the newly made images with sand, can produce a most deceptive antique appearance.—New York World.

Fledged to Suicide.

"There are five men in Deadwood who once belonged to the same suicide club," said T. R. Wortham. "They constituted the entire membership and don't often speak of it. A solemn compact was made that they should hold monthly meetings, at each one of which the members drew balls, one being black and its holder being obligated by oath to kill himself before the next meeting, the last one to hold a solitary dinner and destroy himself. The meetings, with the exception of the last one, were held, and in each case the victim disappeared, first settling up all of his affairs and leaving a farewell letter to his associates. No bodies were found, however. One day, on the principal street of Deadwood, a crowd collected, and in it were all five of the supposed suicides. They had all gone west and drifted to Deadwood. The story got out some way, and their lives were made miserable by it for a time, but they have succeeded in quieting it down, and are all doing well."—Cincinnati Enquirer.

AFRAID? NOT HE.

He Merely Wanted His Wife to Hold the Light For Him.

At 2 o'clock Tuesday morning, when all the people living on College avenue were fast asleep, there was commotion in one of the beautiful residences along that thoroughfare. It was the home of a merchant, and the commotion broke loose in the sleeping apartment of himself and wife. She started it.

She awakened suddenly and thought she heard some one trying to break in downstairs. She shook her husband, and after some time had elapsed succeeded in making him realize the situation. They both listened. There was some noise, sure enough, and a cold shiver crept down his spinal column and even to his toes.

He determined not to get scared, though his teeth were chattering, so he announced that he would go down and investigate.

"Aren't you afraid, dear?" nervously asked his wife.

He took out his revolver, struck a match, lighted a lamp and then looked at her in disgust.

"Afraid! Well, hardly. I never saw the man yet I was afraid of. Now, don't make any noise, but come on."

The little woman started in astonishment. "Do you want me to go too?"

"Do I want you to go? Why, of course I do. You must go ahead and carry the light so I can see to shoot. Do you think I could hit a burglar in the dark? Hurry up, or he'll be gone."

And that man made the little woman go ahead with the light, while he held the revolver over her shoulder at full cock. They traversed the house from garret to cellar, finally found a stray dog scratching at the back door and came back to bed. He sat up for an hour telling her what he would have done had there been a burglar there.—Indianapolis Sentinel.

His Favorite Color.

Old Mr. Kerr-Muggeon, who agrees with George II in hating "poetry and painting," and who is never agreeable except when he is smoking, was engaged in this favorite amusement on his doorstep when Mrs. Gassecher passed.

"Oh, Mr. Kerr-Muggeon," she said, "I am glad to see you enjoying the beauties of nature!"

"Heh? What d'ye mean?" asked Mr. Kerr-Muggeon.

"Why, weren't you looking at the sunset?"

"The sunset! Well, no, not just exactly. But, now that you mention it, it does look fine, doesn't it? Looks a good deal like a meerschaum pipe just after it's begun to color!"—Youth's Companion.

An old Dutch legend says that Thomas a Becket cursed the Kentishmen of England, who spitefully cut off his horse's tail, and that the entire generation of Kent which followed wore tails like horses.

From a grain of sand barely visible to the naked eye 1,000 miles of quartz thread may be spun.

His Heart Bowed Down.

He accosted me as I came out of the postoffice on Broadway and wanted to know whether the Broadway cable was the only one now at work. I said there was another on One Hundred and Twenty-fifth street, running up to High Bridge, and was about passing on when he grasped me by the arm and said in a whisper:

"Which is the wust?"

"There's no choice," said I shortly, preparing to cross the street.

"Then these New York newspapers are blamed liars, b'gosh, and I don't keer who knows it!" said he.

"What's the matter?" I asked, with interest.

"I've been readin nothin lately 'cept 'bout accidents by the deadly trolley and the bloody cable, and I've been ridin all over Brooklyn without seein a durn accident and spent 35 cents on this line without so much as seein a newsboy hurt. It ain't fair, that's what it ain't." And he shook his head sadly and crossed over and took a Fourth avenue horse car up town.—New York Press.

BORN.

FORBES—At Bishop, Cal., November 22, 1894, to Mr. and Mrs. P. W. Forbes, a son.

Wm. Rowan was in town last Monday.

C. B. Rawson of Bishop, was in town the middle of the week.

Ed. M. Clarke of Bishop is to be Under Sheriff under A. M. Given.

The Indians held their annual Fandango at the Fort the past week.

Owing to the dry season past, the honey crop will be light this year.

It's a boy! If you don't think Pete is happy look at the birth column.

Japan has captured Port Arthur and chinese officials are leaving Pekin.

J. D. Lewis Esq. of Bishop spent several days in this vicinity during the week.

S. G. Sneeden Esq. came down from Bishop last Monday, returning yesterday.

Chas. Summers came down from Bishop on Wednesday, returning yesterday morning.

The platform for the Weather Bureau on the top of the Norman House is about completed.

The social dance last evening was a pronounced success and was continued until a late, or rather, early hour.

Mrs. E. M. Johnson started for Los Angeles last Friday. She had spent the summer at Independence.

James Jones was down from Fish Springs yesterday. Mr. Jones has been suffering very severely from rheumatism.

Miss Mary Mulholland arrived home on Thursday from a visit of over two years with relatives in New Jersey. She came via Mojave by the Santa Fe route.

Last Monday County Clerk Hessian canvassed the vote of the 32nd Senatorial district and declared R. Linder of Tulare duly elected. He had a plurality of 259 over Sims.

The great glory of the chrysanthemum is departing for this year. Perhaps no finer collection could be found in the State than that viewed in the garden of Mrs. T. Webb of this town.

A beautiful collection of flowers was received at this office from the garden of Mrs. C. A. Walter of Camp Independence. Violets, roses, and chrysanthemums at Thanksgiving is enough to make the Easterner open his eyes.

Mrs. Frank Butler departed on Tuesday's train for her home at San Francisco, after a visit of a couple of months with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. John Shepherd, at Georges Creek. Mr. Shepherd has so far improved in health as to be able to visit Independence on Thanksgiving.

Hon. P. Reddy, accompanied by his brother, Captain E. A. Reddy, went south on Wednesday's train on their way to Darwin. Mr. Reddy will come to Independence about the end of next week to prepare for the Hines trial which begins on the 11th.

We have received an invitation to be present at the commencement exerises of the graduating class in the Medical Department of the State University, thanks to the courtesy of Dr. H. E. Wright, who is a member of the class. Miss Nellie McKnight of Bishop also graduates at the same time.

A. L. Conklin started for Bakersfield on Wednesday, going south by the Keeler and Mojave stage. Mrs. A. L. Conklin started for San Francisco yesterday morning. Mr. and Mrs A. L. Conklin will meet in the city and spend about six weeks visiting friends west of the mountains.

In response to the challenge recently published by E. H. Ober to run any man in the State seventy five yards there is now a man here for that purpose with plenty of money to back him. Mr. Riley, his manager, stated this morning that they were ready to run at any time within two weeks. He is now waiting here to meet Ober and make a match.

Grand Jurors.

The followin list of Grand Jurors was drawn on Monday last, to appear in the Superior Court on Tuesday, December 11, 1894, at 10 o'clock a. m.

Robert H. Blake, Big Pine
Horace Bellows, Olancha
John E. Jones, Jr., Round Valley
Edward H. Sterling, Bishop
James Jones, Fish Springs

Stray Items and Personals from Southern Inyo

D. C. Lane, left on Tursday's stage for Los Angeles. The mine is looking better than ever, some beautiful native silver specimens are on exhibition at Keeler.

Hon. P. Reddy and his brother Capt. E. A. Reddy passed through Keeler on their way to Darwin thursday to inspect the mines.

Thomas Boland and J. A. McKenzie have gone to Lone Pine to attend thanksgiving.

Mojave stage arrived Wednesday night with four passangers, among them being Miss Mary Mulholland, homeward bound to Independence after an extended visit in the East.

Wm. Arcularius the teamster left for Bishop and Independence a few days ago, to have some work done on his wagons for the winter teaming.

Duck shooting is all the rage on the lake and river at present, and most duck is got on the market.

J. E. Redd lately of Los Angeles is a new arrival and is employed in Boland's store. Also Mr. Pete Meyers, who is driving stage to Darwin for Boland.

Henry Mettler of Darwin, made a flying business trip to Keeler Wednesday. Henry predicts a boom in Inyo in 1895 without fail.

Ore shipments are light on account of no teams hauling, all being laid up for repairs.

Fred A. Teasland, transfer check clerk for the C&C and V&TRR's at Mound House departed for his home Thursday after enjoying a brief but pleasant visit with agent W. M. Richards at Keeler. His health has been poor but his Inyo County trip has done him quite a deal of good.

Coxey's hat struck the express office here one day this week, adorned with hundreds of express tags containing poetry and autographs. It was forwarded to Independence for further reference.

Finley McIver, accompanied by his wife and Mrs J. V. Skinner, made a short visit to Keeler this week.

The new soda furnace was started last week, and is apparently a success with the exception of some changes and repairs which are being now made and it will be started up again next week.

Three carloads of soda and one car of ore went north on Thursday's train.

News is very scarce. Plenty of turkey and cranberry sauce on hand for Thanksgiving here.

Bon jour. Votre ami,
REPORTER.

What Can Be Done.

Last Sunday we visited the ranch of F. McIver at the Eastside for the first time. This place is interesting as indicating what can be accomplished on that side of the river. Mr. McIver has about 45 acres in alfalfa and this year cut about 250 tons of hay, besides selling a third crop on the ground to sheepmen. A portion of the area was ground that had only been set last year consequently the crop was light. On one tract of five acres, measured by S. P. McKnight C. E. over 10½ tons per acre were cut and stacked. There is but very little alkali anywhere on the 30,000 acre tract covered bp the Inyo Canal. The soil is mostly a light warm sand a few inches in depth over a rich loom several feet deep. It is the ideal country for alfalfa as Mr. McIver's ranch shows, and it is a mystery why the owners do not improve their lands. If the large stream of water now running through the Inyo Canal is not soon put to a useful purpose in reclaiming this large and valuable territory, a serious question as to the value of the company's right will be raised by other appropriators.

A Probably Fatal Accident

On Tuesday a telegram was received at Independence requesting Dr. Woodin to go to Olancha at once, that Gus Walker had been seriously hurt. He went down that evening and found the facts as follows: Walker and Matschka were hauling out hay for cattle when the team became frightened and ran away, throwing them both out. Matschka was badly bruised and Mr. Walker's neck was dislocated. At last account he was in an unconscious condition and serious doubts are entertained for his recovery. Dr. Woodin went down again yesterday with the intention of setting the neck and putting on a plaster cast. Mr. Walker is well along in years and the accident is certainly very serious.

Order of Adjudication of Insolvency.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE County of Inyo, State of California.

Pierre Beyeye and Francois Hagata, Co-partners under the firm name of P. Beyeye & Co., Insolvent Debtors.

Pierre Beyeye and Francois Hagata, Co-partners under the firm name of P. Beyeye & Co., having filed in this Court their petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, from which it appears that they are insolvent debtors, the said Pierre Beyeye and Francois Hagata, Co-partners under the firm name of P. Beyeye & Co., are hereby declared to be insolvent. It is hereby ordered that the Sheriff of the said County of Inyo be, and he is hereby appointed Receiver of the property of said Insolvents and that upon his giving a bond to the people of the State of California, conditioned as required by law, and in such sum as the Court may order, and qualifying, he take charge and possession of all the estate real and personal, of said insolvent debtors, whatsoever and wheresoever situate, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all their deeds, vouchers, books of account and papers; and to keep and care for and dispose of the same until the appointment of an Assignee of their estate. All persons having the same or any part thereof in his or their possession are hereby directed to deliver said property to said Receiver, and all persons owing money to said insolvents, or to any of them, are hereby directed to pay the same to said Receiver, and that said Receiver keep said property or the proceeds thereof, till the further order of this Court. And all persons are hereby forbidden to pay any debts to said insolvents, or to deliver any property belonging to such insolvents, or either of them, to him or them, or any person, firm, corporation or association for their use, and the said debtors are hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered.

It is further ordered, that all the creditors of said debtors be and appear before the Hon. Geo. M. Gill, Judge of the Superior Court of the said County of Inyo, in open court at the court-room of said court in the town of Independence, in said County of Inyo, on the 22nd day of December, 1894, at 10 o'clock a. m. of that day, to prove their debts and choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtors. It is further ordered, that this order be published in the Inyo Independent, a newspaper of general circulation, published in the County of Inyo, as often as the said paper is published before the day set for the meeting of creditors.

And it is further ordered, that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvents be stayed.

Dated November 14th, 1894.
GEO. M. GILL,
Judge of the Superior Court.

AN IDEAL BOY.

The manly, energetic boy is the one who asserts his right to be in the world, and who promises to be of still greater service when maturity has ripened his faculties to their fullness, and strengthened his mental and physical powers. Such a boy is the hope of the future and he justifies that hope. He may not be an immature intellectual marvel, and it is far better that he is not, for these youthful phenomenons are usually a disappointment as they grow older, failing to realize the high anticipations they have aroused, and often, like too early ripening fruit, as quickly and unseasonably going to decay.

There is a place in the world for the good, healthy, industrious boy, who is fond of recreation in its season, and who is helpful, courteous, and obedient at all times. Such a boy enters with as cheery a smile into the performances of the home chores as he does into the boyish games and pastimes, and his bright, cheerful, disposition is like a gleam of sunshine to all who know him. There is a jocund ring in his voice, and an honest sincerity in his face and word. He is a natural, healthy boy, brimful of youthful spirits and enthusiasm, and of the buoyant, sanguine temperament that beco souhis years.

He is not a self-sufficient miniature old man, who knows more than his parents. The latter is not a boy at all, however his years may classify him, for he has developed into a sort of nondescript, neither boy nor man, and a nuisance generally. All honor to the bright, helpful, spirited boy, the joy of the present and the hope of the future! He is the one who is properly fitting himself to take up the serious business of life when comes the time that we have to retire and resign it into his younger and more vigorous hands.

BEAUTIFUL ARMS.

Take a two-gallon pitcher of water in the right hand, raise it over your head and swing it from left to right in a circle for five minutes, then reverse the motion, circling it from left to right, holding the pitcher upright, and avoiding spilling any of the fluid. When this can be accomplished with ease and accuracy take a second two-gallon pitcher filled with water and swing that first from left to right with the left hand, and as facility is acquired reverse the motion from right to left. More practice will be found necessary with the left than the right hand. Both hands and arms being trained, next take a two-gallon pitcher full of water in each hand and make the movement with both simultaneously, being careful that the rapidly-revolving pitchers shall not touch. The vessels must cross each other's orbit at different angles.

This is a most developing exercise to arms, neck and back, and when perfect in the exercise it will be possible to perform the neat little centrifugal experiment of the whirling of an open can of milk rapidly around the head without spilling a drop. Three months of this simple exercise will perfect the arms of even a delicate woman most beautifully and increase her physical strength to a point where she may without effort control her entire household. A husband who sees his wife whirling four gallons around her head with the grace and lightness of a butterfly upon the wing will hesitate about differing with her in mere maters of opinion.—New Orleans Times.

SANTA CRUZ, CAL.

Santa Cruz is one of the garden spots selected by the mission fathers, whose rare discrimination is proverbial in California; for here, in 1794, just one hundred years ago in May, they completed and dedicated their mission church. The town of Santa Cruz is beautifully laid out with broad, well-paved streets and contains a population of about 6,000, whose resources are not only in the tourist travel but in lumber, lime, bituminous rock and fisheries. If Longfellow had first seen Santa Cruz as he once viewed Amalfi on the Tyrrhenian Sea, he might have reserved his praise for his own Continent, and perhaps have sung the fame and grace of the stately redwood trees of Santa Cruz and of the waves and mountains that meet here on our California Coast.—Harper's Weekly.

Is there one whom difficulties dishearten—who bends to the storm? He will do little. Is there one who will conquer? That kind of man never fails.—John Hunter.

DISAGREED.

A Difference In Weight That Aroused Hostilities.

It was in one of the big department stores, and the penny-in-the-slot weighing machine was placed where it could not be overlooked. They were evidently sisters, though one was stouter than she could wish, while the other would have been thankful for the reversion of some of her unnecessary flesh. They passed the machine with a sidelong look; then the stout woman turned back, saying with a shamefaced air:

"There's not a soul here that knows me. I'm going to find out just how much I do weigh. Then she handed her bundles to her sister and stepped on.

"Mercy—189!" she screamed and bounced off.

"Here, wait a minute," the thin woman called. "I want to try too."

"Well, give me your bundles," snapped the other. "I didn't hold mine while I weighed."

"Of course not. You—goodness, only 95!"

"MERCY!"

They walked out in silence and had gone half a block when the stout woman stopped and faced the thin one.

"Those scales were wrong," she remarked firmly.

"Why, of course they were," cried the other one, brightening up. "How foolish of us not to think of it before! All those people weighing every day would be sure to put it out of order."

"Certainly. The hands get loose and take to making you out ever so much heavier"—

"Lighter you mean."

"I don't mean anything of the kind. The idea that I weigh 189 pounds!"

"Yes, the idea—I'm sure it is 200. I know I weigh at least 105."

"How ridiculous! Not more than 85 at the outside."

"Humph!"

"The idea!"

They turned and glared at each other; then walked on in silence, and when the stout woman dropped one of her bundles and walked on unheeding the other one was too angry to tell her of it.—Chicago Tribune.

Why He Was Not Remembered.

"I heard a great deal when I first went on the road," said an actor who was in the city recently, "about the extraordinary ability of some hotel clerks to remember names and faces, and I can readily understand that such an accomplishment would be very desirable in a hotel clerk. Nearly everybody, unless he is traveling under an alias, is vain enough to enjoy a hearty recognition by a hotel clerk, particularly if the hotel is an especially good one. But I had my doubts about the truth of tales I had heard of these wonderful exhibitions of memory, and when I came to Cincinnati I determined to make a test. I did so, but I am still undecided about the matter.

"In 1862, when I was about 2 years old, my mother brought me from the northern part of the state to Kentucky, where my father, an officer in the Union army, was stationed. I had been told that we stopped over night at a certain hotel in Cincinnati. When a company that I was in came here, I went to that hotel. An elderly clerk was behind the desk. I tackled him.

"'Howdy?' I said, trying to look as if I knew him well.

"'How do you do, sir?' he said politely, but without a sign of recognition in his eye.

"'You don't remember me, do you?'

"'N-no,' he said, a little bit reluctantly, as if he didn't like to admit it.

"'Why,' I said, 'I stopped here in 1862.'

"'Spring or fall?' said he, apparently recovering himself.

"'Spring, I think,' said I.

"'Oh,' he answered, and he looked me right in the eye, 'that accounts for my not recalling you, sir. I didn't come here until the fall of 1862.'"—Cincinnati Tribune.

Smoothing the Way.

The educated young man had struck the mountain town for a stay of several weeks, and at the railroad station he was met by the landlord of the tavern which was to be home to him during his visit.

"Got'ny baggage?" asked the old man.

"Two trunks," responded the visitor.

"Whar air they?"

"Those are they," designating by a nod the two which belonged to him.

"Which?" inquired the landlord, stopping suddenly.

"Those," repeated the youth, pointing out the two with his stick, "those are they."

"Yes, yes," said the old man, becoming very fatherly in his manner, "but you hadn't better say it so's anybody kin hear you. Ef you wanter git along with the folks in these parts and live peaceable, I reckon you'd better say, 'Them's them.'"—Detroit Free Press.

Not Safe.

Her lips quivered, and her breath came in labored gasps, but she did not speak.

"Do you not love me?" he anxiously demanded, seizing her shrinking hand.

"I—I don't know," she faltered.

Gently he insinuated his arm about her.

"Darling," he murmured, "would you like to have me ask your mamma first?"

With a sudden cry of terror she grasped his arm.

"No, no, no!" she shrieked convulsively. "She is a widow. I want you myself."

She clung to him until he solemnly promised that he would say nothing to the old lady for the present.—Detroit Tribune.

THE HELPING HEN.

The following is a portion of a paper read by G. W. Tighe of Santa Barbara at a recent Farmers' Institute: Much has been said and written on the business hen in the fruit orchard, and I feel very reticent in preparing a paper to be read before an assembly where many members are better qualified to present the subject than the writer. However, as each breeder or fancier in the course of several years' poultry-raising acquires many ideas that are new, valuable and labor-saving, I will attempt to give you some of my ideas to profitably manage the business hen in the fruit orchard, trusting that the good points may be accepted and acted on, and that you substitute your own ideas where they would seem to show superior merit.

In the first place, taking it for granted the "fruit orchard" is an acquired property, and a newly planted one at that, the question often arises, What is the best use to put this ground to that will give us immediate returns and help pay expenses until the orchard comes into bearing? This is often a very serious question to the owner of a small orchard, whose ready cash has dwindled down very low in making improvements and starting the new home. Many a man has turned to the business hen at this point, and has found a flock of 500 or so to be the means of smoothing down many of the rough places. That fruit-growing and poultry-raising is a success, and one of the best of combinations, is evidenced by the many examples to be found throughout the country.

I am very cautious about advising any one to go into poultry exclusively as a business. The most pleasant and profitable way to make money with hens is in conneciton with some other business or occupation, and in fruit and poultry-raising we have an ideal combination. The man who stakes his every hope on chickens alone and goes into the business on the plan that if he can clear $2 per head on fifty chickens in a year, there is no reason why he cannot do as well with 1,000, is very apt to be wanting to get out of the chicken businses very badly at the end of the year.

A PRETTY CUTE JUSTICE.

It was the law of the village that all showmen, itinerants and organ grinders must get a license before doing business there. One day a fat policeman, who had been on the force six months without doing anything, concluded it was time he arrested somebody. Soon afterward along came an Italian with a performing bear.

"Hev yez got yer license?" asked the policeman.

"No," said the exhibitor of the bear.

"Then yez my prizners," said the policeman, and he triumphantly marched off with them to the village station house, he leading the Italian and the Italian leading the bear.

Arraigned before the police justice the Italian pleaded guilty and the judge officiously gave him a most severe and scorching lecture on the enormity of his offense, ending by fining him $10, the full extent of the law.

The culprit had a lot of small change in his pocket, but being mostly pennies and nickels it only counted up $7.50. For a few moments the judge was in a quandary. He didn't want to send the fellow to jail, nor yet lose the $10. Presently a bright idea struck him—a happy solution of the problem, and he said:

"Here, officer! Take this fellow out to the market-place and let him perform with his bear until he makes up the balance; and when he gets it drive him out of town."—Buffalo News.

WORRY A SOURCE OF INDIGESTION.

Worry is a baneful curse and source of untold evils. It seams the face with lines and furrows and has a most depressing effect upon that hypersensitive organ, the stomach, which at such times becomes a most unwilling and laggard servant. Indeed, it is safe to say that unless encouraged by a cheerful temper and bright, or, at least, hopeful thoughts, the stomach will play truant or sulk and do no work which it can shirk. The physiological explanation of this is the close alliance of the great sympathetic nerves, which are worse than the telegraph for carrying bad news; the worry and anxiety which oppress the brain produce simultaneously a semi-paralysis of the nerves of the stomach, gastric juices will not flow, and presto! there is indigestion. One sign of mental health is serenity of temper and a self-control that enables us to bear with equanimity and unruffled the petty trials and jars of life, especially those arising from contact with scolding, irascible, irritating folks. It is well to remember at such times that these unfortunates are their own worst enemies, and a cultivation of the art of not hearing will help us very much. It is a very useful art all through life and well worth some trouble to acquire.—Demorest's Magazine.

CAKE FOR EVERYBODY.

A proficient cook has an eye to variety and suitability. Even in the matter of cake she is careful to suit all tastes. Thus:

For farmers—hoe-cake, fruit-cake and seed-cake.

For pugilists and carpenters—pound-cake.

For reporters—spice-cake and jumbles.

For messenger-boys—ginger-snaps.

For politicians—election-cake and plum-cake.

For idlers and ne'er-do-wells—loaf-cake and fritters.

For tramps—sponge-cake.

For greedy children—stomach-ache.

"I say, Bill," said one summer philosopher to another as they lay beneath a spreading tree, "did you ever turn yer attention to literatoor any?" "I should say so." "What's the longest sentence you ever come across?" "Ten years," was the unhesitating reply.

Ex-Governor Curtin's body was taken to the Court House at Belefonte, Penn., where thousands of people viewed it. The body was then taken back to the former reidencce of the distinguished dead, where the funeral services were held.

DEEP BREATHING.

It is only lately that much has been said in the public prints regarding the importance of deep breathing, though physicians have for many years been urging their patients to practise it. It seems singular that people should not have discovered for themselves its advantages, for they are very obvious, and follow quickly upon their cause.

The most obtuse person who chooses to attempt alleviation of any one of a dozen common complaints by a series of deep, regular breaths, will be convinced of their efficiency.

As in the case of every other natural remedy, its admirers often claim too much for it, but the most conservative who try it honestly will admit that it can do a great deal.

We all know that fear is a prolific source of disease. A very large proportion of the cases in an epidemic are computed to be caused directly by nervousness. Almost any man, if told that he looks ill, is likely to be seized with whatever malady happens to be most prevalent. The grippe has done much of its deadly work upon those who were too frightened by the thought of it to do anything to resist its approaches. In a state of fear, as is well known, the breath comes faintly and in short catches. When the cause of the terror is removed, one draws a long breath. The mind curists have enriched us by at least one excellent adage. It is: "Do not allow yourself to think that you are ill. Keep on breathing deeply and regularly, and do not give way to fear." After exposure to cold, steady, deep breathing, often holding the lungs full of air for a full minute or more has frequently broken up a chill. In seasickness the same treatment, taken as the ship rises and falls, will often prevent nausea. Sleeplessness may sometimes be overcome by careful breathing.

One prolific cause of malaria is the foul exhalations from the lower lungs, which a too shallow breathing fails to carry off. The breath should penetrate to the remotest labyrinths of these great sewers of the system, in order to cleanse away their poisonous gases. It goes without saying that the looser the clothing the more thoroughly this vital work can be accomplished.

If it be not thoroughly accomplished, there is bound to be trouble sooner or later.

Anæmia, consumption, dyspepsia, some forms of heart disease and many other maladies are especially benefited by deep breathing. One distinguished physician once remarked that he attributed his own excellent health largely to the habit which he had acquired of taking, when coming to a street crossing, a deep breath, and holding it until he gained the other side. In this way he increased his chest measurement four inches in two years. Any one who wishes to increase his chest capacity cannot employ a more efficacious and natural method than this.

The famous placer mines in Arizona, located about a year ago by non-resident English capitalists and held by parties backed by Montana mining capitalists, upon the ground that the mines are held and owned by aliens contrary to the United States mining laws. The English company will not be allowed to work the mines until the case is decided by the courts.

In the Vose court-martial case at Leavenworth, the Court passed upon the charges and sent their findings to Washington. The case of Captain George S. Grimes follows that of Vose.

NEVER TOO LATE OR TOO SOON.

There is more lost in life from putting off from to-day till to-morrow what might be done on the instant than from any other cause. Fortune and fame have been thus wrecked, and in minor things it will not do to delay or trifle. A man hobbling on crutches for the rest of his life, caused by sprain, would have been a well, sound man, out of misery, if he had used St. Jacob's Oil when the mishap occurred. It is never too soon to get it; never too late to use it. The great remedy for pain never tarries; it will do its work in ten minutes if it is allowed to do so. Treat pain as you would a mosquito—knock it out as soon as it bites.

'Tis so, alas, with all mankind;
With monarch and with clerk;
The one who does the least, you'll find,
Talks most of "overwork."

KNOWLEDGE

Brings comfort and improvement and tends to personal enjoyment when rightly used. The many, who live better than others and enjoy life more, with less expenditure, by more promptly adapting the world's best products to the needs of physical being, will attest the value to health of the pure liquid laxative principles embraced in the remedy, Syrup of Figs.

Its excellence is due to its presenting in the form most acceptable and pleasant to the taste, the refreshing and truly beneficial properties of a perfect laxative; effectually cleansing the system, dispelling colds, headaches and fevers and permanently curing constipation. It has given satisfaction to millions and met with the approval of the medical profession, because it acts on the Kidneys, Liver and Bowels without weakening them and it is perfectly free from every objectionable substance.

Syrup of Figs is for sale by all druggists in 50c and $1 bottles, but it is manufactured by the California Fig Syrup Co. only, whose name is printed on every package, also the name, Syrup of Figs, and being well informed, you will not accept any substitute if offered.

When a sentiment is uttered on the stage that is not complimentary to the character of men, all wives look at their husbands triumphantly.

LIFE OR DEATH?

It is of vital importance that it should be understood by persons whose kidneys are inactive, that this condition of things is finally inductive of a state of the organs where life hangs in the balance. Bright's disease, diabetes, albuminuria are all diseases of a very obstinate character in their mature stage, and all have a fatal tendency. They often baffle the most practiced medical skill, and the most approved remedies of materia medica. But opposed at the outset—that is to say, when the kidneys begin to discharge their functions inactively—with Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, the dangerous tendency is checked. Very useful, also, is this household medicine for those ailments of common occurrence—constipation, biliousness, dyspepsia and nervousness. It is a safeguard against malaria and averts chronic rheumatism.

"Do you hate me?" he faltered. "This is so sudden," she rejoined in confusion. And so they were divorced.

DEAFNESS CANNOT BE CURED

by local applications as they cannot reach the diseased portions of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars; free.

A LIFE INSURANCE POLICY.

Every man ought to have one, but a long step towards that is the possession of ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS. It is certain that they prolong life, by relieving the strain that comes from continued suffering.

Many a man can endure a sharp disease better than he can the wear and tear of pains, little in themselves, yet constant in their strain upon the system.

A weak back, stiffness of the joints, soreness of the muscles, seem to many unworthy of special notice. Yet they do not a little to exhaust the powers of physical endurance. ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS relieve them at once, and no wise man will fail to use them on the first sign of pain. It is a very small premium that he has to pay.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS will cure indigestion.

WINCHESTER.

During the War it Changed Hands Often.

INCIDENTS OF THE LATE CIVIL WAR.

A Town that Changed Ownership Over Seventy Times During the "Late Enpleasantness."

As one walks through the quiet streets of quaint and aristocratic Winchester, or looks down from some neighboring hilltop upon the peaceful fields which surround the town, it seems hard to realize that here has ever been the seat of war, and that for years armies had contended so persistently for possession of the town, that it changed ownership over seventy times during the "late unpleasantness"—sometimes three times in a day.

It was said in those days that the lukewarm had to look out each morning to see which flag was flying in order to know how to trim their course.

Such, however, was the case, and many are the tales of those stirring times heard even yet from those who participated in them. In the early part of the war Winchester was taken by the Union forces and occupied for a short time, during which many negroes attached themselves to the officers and soldiers in various capacities. Suddenly there came news of the rapid advance of the Southerners in large numbers and a retreat was ordered in the direction of Harper's Ferry. As the army retired numbers of negro men, women and children went with it to get, as they thought, freedom and wealth at one stroke. The Confederates, however, captured the whole Northern train not many miles beyond the town and brought them all back to Winchester. In order to give the Northerners a chance to live up to their principles of love for the negro and to show chivalry to the weaker sex, as the Southern Commander said, he "requested" in military language that each captured officer should give his arm to one of the "colored ladies" and each soldier should carry a pickaninny. Thus they returned to the city in which they had ruled the day before.

At another time a body of Union cavalry dashed into Winchester and the Southern troops precipitately retired. As the blue coats came riding down one of the streets a soldier's cape slipped off his shoulders and fell just in front of a young girl, standing on the curb. "Pick that up and give it to me," was the command of the horseman.

"Indeed, if you sit there until I do it, you'll be much older than you are now," she replied quickly.

"Well, tell me where those rebels are," he asked.

"Go down the road and find them," she replied, and turning entered her fathers' house.

A few hours afterward, hearing horses' hoofs, the same girl looked out, and seeing her questioner of the morning a prisoner with the rest of his troops she exclaimed from her window, "So you found the rebels; I thought you would."

In Winchester there lived at that time a family of three sisters remarkable for their quickness and wit. One of these for some reason or other wished to be transferred to the Southern lines and went to the Northern General, who was very irascible, to ask for a pass. After a long tirade about who brought on the war—answering himself by saying "you women of the South"——he said, "I suppose you want to go to see some Southern Brigadier."

"No, I don't," was the reply, "but I don't deny I should like to see one amazingly, it is so long since I had the pleasure."

"Well," said he, "you will all soon be gone to the devil."

"You mistake me," said she, "I asked for a pass to go within the Confederate lines."

Throwing himself back he laughed heartily, saying, "Well, you are an independent girl." She did not get her pass, however.

Those same sisters were thorns in the flesh of the Northern officers in many ways, but chiefly in their capacity of postmistresses of the underground postoffice. Many a dispatch they received and sent out. Sometimes their papers would come to them in a bag of flour brought by a farmer too old to fight and just able to ride the nag too sorry to have been swept up by either army. The folds of a cabbage would contain a message of considerable importance, and the hem of the skirt of the dairy woman, when she brought them milk, contained papers which would have been reading interesting beyond measure to Uncle Sams' provost marshal had he known that the milk carrier left the house with one less garment than when she entered.

Many a time was the house searched, but never were the searchers rewarded for their trouble. A favorite hiding-place for these contraband dispatches was under a loose step of the staircase. In this cavity were concealed many little treasures, among which were the photographs of some young soldiers, who in the far-off camp were constantly humming to themselves "The Girl I Left Behind Me." Years afterward these precious pictures were sought, but it was discovered that a family of mice had made their home in the cavity and had dined sumptuously every day on the semblance of Southern chivalry.

After many attempts to lead these ladies into pitfalls by means of spies, decoys, etc., without success, General Sheridan sent them an order one day to be ready to leave the town in two hours to be taken to the Southern lines. They hurriedly packed their trunks, and at the appointed hour departed in an ambulance with an escort of cavalry. Driven about six miles along the road, afterward made famous by General Sheridan, they were left with their trunk by the side of the highway, and with feelings in which joy and sadness were mingled, saw their escort turn and ride back to Winchester. Being within a mile or two of a friend's house they made their way there, and finally got to Lexington, where they remained in exile among friends during the rest of the struggle.

A touch of human sympathy is shown in the following incident: It was necessary at one time during the Federal occupation of Winchester for anyone who wished to obtain medicine or anything but the coarsest of food to take the oath of allegiance to the United States. This a very attractive and high-spirited young woman would not do. She became very ill with fever and her family—as staunch in their principles as herself—could not give her proper nourishment. Her life was despaired of. When this became known through the town, ever morning on the doorstep was found a basket containing dainties and drugs with which the patient was finally nursed back to life and strength. It was learned afterward that the basket was placed there daily just before dawn by a young Northern officer.

Many engagements around Winchester were very severe. There is a small house, surrounded by a peaceful yard with shading trees, about a mile north of the town, which was a temporary hospital during one of the battles. In this peaceful yard stood the amputating tables, and a lady who acted as nurse has said there were piles of arms and legs four feet high; in some cases the boots not even being removed. One unfortunate youth, badly wounded, was carried from this scene into the permanent hospital in the town, and after some days of torture died. The young girl who nursed him attended to the last sad offices and arranged his funeral. In default of other garments his body was wrapped in his India-rubbered coat, and his coffin placed in the burial lot of a prominent family of the place. Years passed on, when there came a request from his family in Richmond that the lady who had so faithfully nursed him would see that his body was disinterred and sent to Richmond to be buried in the same grave with that of his brother who had been killed in one of the battles of the far South. Going with the sexton to the cemetery she pointed out the grave saying, "You will know that you have opened the right grave by seeing that the body has on an India-rubber coat." The body was exhumed, sent to Richmond and buried with military honors in the grave with the other brother. About two weeks' after, the good Samaritan of Winchester was called upon by a man, whom she recognized as a person not at all friendly to her and the brother of the deceased housekeeper of the family in whose lot the first burial had been made.

"I have come to have you arrested," said he.

"Have me arrested; for what?"

"For stealing the body of my sister Sally Smith who was buried in the B——'s lot, and in her best black silk dress, too."

"I did nothing of the sort, I assure you."

"Yes, you did, and if she and her best black silk dress are not brought back soon I will have the law of you. The idea of a lady like you stealing my sister Sally Smith—and her best black silk dress."

To make a long story short, the poor lady was obliged to recover, at much trouble and expense, the body sent to Richmond and have it interred at Winchester, sending the proper one in its place; the mistake having occurred by the sexton thinking Sally Smith's best black silk dress was the India-rubber coat. The worthy old housekeeper had always in life longed to take a trip, which she had never been able to do; but after death she took the journey dressed in her best black silk dress, and had been received in Richmond with military honors. People who have nervous prostration, headaches, the blues, or dyspepsia, who take cold easily, who are subject to irritability, who lead sedentary lives, who need their wits about them all the time, and who are not making the progress they desire, should get addicted to the cold-bath habit. It is not only cleansing, but curative, stimulating, encouraging, and invigorating. It is brain-brightening, nerve-soothing, blood-quickening and the best treatment ever taken for the complexion, digestion and disposition.

The manufacture of xyolith, or wood stone, has been undertaken on an extensive scale by a Dresden firm, and its use as a building material is said to be increasing. It is composed, in due proportions, of magnesia, mixed with sawdust, and saturated with a solution of chloride of calcium, the pasty mass, before the cement sets, spread out into sheets of uniform thickness and subjected to great pressure, then dried.

TOP OF PIKE'S PEAK.

Cheerless Home of the Signal Service Observers.

THE TOUTISTS NOW GO UP BY RAIL.

Much More Comfortable Means of Travel than the Old Mule System—Where Rats Have Full Sway.

Ten years ago I climbed Pikes' peak with the assistance of a mule that I rented of a liveryman at Manitou. It took us all one day to go up, and all the next day to come down. We slept with the signal service observers on the floor and nearly froze to death because there were not enough heavy blankets on the peak to keep our party warm. It was a very hard trip; ride and rest, admire the scenery, walk a while, ride again, cuss the bowlders, then walk and wish we hadn't started, and when we got up where the air was rare and scarce one of the party, who was a New York broker and had sins that lay heavy on his soul, thought he was going to die of heart disease, and gave us messages for his family; but it was only the high altitude and indigestion. He got well, however, after a while, and was able to stand on top of the peak and recite four verses of that fine old hymn of the Cary sisters:

"I am nearer my home in Heaven to-day,
Than ever I've been before."

Then he went back to New York, where he sells and buys stocks and bonds and puts and calls as lively as ever.

Now you can go to the top of the peak and get all the view you want and come back to Manitou again in four and a-half hours, by means of a cog-wheel railway, built by H. S. Cable, the son of the president of the Rock Island railway, Z. G. Simmons of Kenosha, Wis., and other capitalists.

It is an easy and comfortable trip, and not half so dangerous as going up on mule-back. The average grade is 16 per cent. or 845 feet to the mile, but the arrangements for safety are so perfect that the peril of the climb is reduced to a minimum, although nervous people hold their breath when the little train turns some of the sharp curves and looks as if it were going to tip over into a gorge that is 3,000 or 4,000 feet deep. They charge $5 for the round trip, which is fifty per cent. cheaper than the old mule-back route.

When you get to the top you find two low stone houses built so that the wind can't shake them. One contains a little shop for the sale of curiosities and photographs, a lunch room and telegraph office, and the other is occupied by the signal service observers. You can stay all night if you like, and, although the accommodations are primitive and the atmosphere gets pretty cold, the sunset and the sunrise furnish full compensation.

Everybody is furnished with postal cards and stationery bearing a picture of the stone hut, upon which one can write to friends, and you are advised to send telegrams to the loved ones at home "from the highest telegraph office in the world," but that is not true. The highest telegraph office in the world is at the town of Galera, Bolivia, 15,690 feet above the sea, while the summit of Pikes' peak is only 14,147 feet. Galera is a station on the railroad which leads from Mollendo, Peru, to Lake Titicaca, and is the direct and only route between the capital of Bolivia and the Pacific coast. It is a lonely place and there are only three or four old Indians there to keep the telegraph operator company. They go around with their heads wrapped up in blankets, and although they are much nearer to the equator than this place the cold is very much more intense. Another higher telegraph office than Pike's peak is fond at Chiclay, Peru, where the famous Oroya railway, that was built by Henry Meigs, passes over the Cordilleras into the great basin of the Andes. That is a mining town of several thousand inhabitants, although it is also over 15,000 feet above the sea.

It is useless for any man to attempt to describe through a stenographer the panorama that it spread around Pike's Peak. You can see all the great ranges of the Rocky mountains in this longitude, and the other peaks stand up like sentinels watching a sleeping army. The Spanish peaks are 140 miles away, and by following along the crest of that beautiful sierra, which the blasphemous Spaniards named The "Blood of Christ," you come to Ouray, which is perhaps the handsomest peak in all the Rocky mountains. Denver is invisible because the astern foothills conceal it, but you can look eastward almost to the Kansas line and see smoke arising from a dozen towns.

From the crest of Chimborazo, in Ecuador, you can see the Pacific ocean and look eastward over the pass below into the great valley where the Amazon finds its source; and from Popocatapetl, in Mexico, the view is more diversified, perhaps, than that from Pikes' peak, but it is well worth traveling across the continent to see what is spread out before you here.

Along the line of the railway through the gorges log huts and cottages have been erected, which are occupied by artists in summer and others who have a keen sense of the picturesque. A Manitou firm is advertising building lots for sale above the half-way house, but the upper part of the mountain is a government reservation and no one can locate there without the permission of the secretary of the interior. The custodian who is placed here to protect it is to be credited with having prevented the advertising fiend from defacing the landscape, and I am told that any one who writes his name or paints an advertisement no the rocks is sure to spend a long term in jail and pay a heavy fine for the privilege.

There is a salt lick on the side of the mountain, two-thirds of the way to the top, to which the mountain sheep and deer come in large droves every day to promote their digestion. They are tame, because they are never troubled, and the law that protects them is strongly enforced.

Here and there along the way you see a prospect hole which some miner has patiently bored into the mountain, but has been compelled to abandon because he did not strike pay dirt. There has been a good deal of temptation to hunt gold on this side of Pikes' peak, because the first placers found in Colorado were in the foothills below, and the famous mines of Cripple Creek are around on the other side.

The top of the peak is covered for 800 or 1,000 feet with a reddish granite, broken up into small chunks and piled almost regularly. The geologists say that the crags that once formed the crest were crushed in the glacial period and the fragments scattered around as they lie at present.

You will notice when you go down to the timber line, which is something over 11,000 feet, that the branches are all on the southwest side, of the trees, where the northeast winds have blown them.

A few rods from the signal observers' hut a lot of small stones had been piled up to resemble a grave, and a wooden headboard throws a shadow upon them when the western sun is low. The average visitor approaches it with a solemn air, and when he reads the inscription he turns a glance of surprised inquiry upon whoever may be standing by. The inscription represents the grave to be that of a lady who was eaten by rats on the summit of Pike's peak one night in 1876, which, of course, is something that never happened. Along about that time some newspaper fakir published a yarn in the east about the horrible death of a woman who was spending the night on the top of this mountain, and it was generally copied by the press of the country. There was no foundation for it, and it created a great deal of indignation here. When the railroad was first opened the influence of the press was demonstrated by the number of inquires that were made of the weather observers concerning this unfortunate woman, and the signal-service officers, who have very little to occupy them, displayed their humor and spent their spare time in fixing up this grave and painting the inscription on the headstone.

It is a fact, however, that there are lots of rats on the top of Pike's peak, and where they come from and how they live nobody can explain. The man in charge of the restaurant told me they had to set traps every night, and generally caught two or three, but this did not seem to diminish the number. Down on the mountain woodchucks, squirrels, chipmunks and other burrowing game can be found, but the rats that haunt the signal station are a mystery.

The railway trains run daily to the top of Pike's peak four months in the year—from June 1 to the last of September—sometimes a few days longer if there is patronage enough to pay expenses. During the rest of the year, eight months, the signal-service men stay there alone—two of them—and see nothing of the rest of mankind until the snow melts in the spring, although they are in constant communication by telegraph. Sometimes they come down on snowshoes to repair the wires if the storms tear them apart, and in an emergency they have been as far as Manitou or Colorado Springs.

The railway grade has made these journeys much easier than they used to be when there was only the mule trail to follow, but it's a long seven miles and a very steep climb to return to their eyrie. The snow begins to fall early in October; last year the ground was covered six feet deep by October 11, and the stone huts on the mountain top are buried under the drifts until the sun begins to melt them the last of April or the first of May. The men have books and cards and backgammon, and when they need exercise they can shovel the snow from the doorway. But it is a long and dismal imprisonment, and a countryman who went up on the cars with us expressed the universal opinion when, after hearing the story, he exclaimed:

"Gosh! I'd rather spend the winter in a good warm jail."

There is a report that the station is to be abandoned this fall, as its utility to the weather bureau is doubtful, and the observers will not be sorry if it turns out to be true.—William E. Curtis, in Chicago Record.

Everywhere the mania for plowing seems to be on the increase, due no doubt to the low price of cattle. If lands formerly used for pasturing cattle are not now plowed and put to corn, they are put in timothy and the crop sold off the farm as hay. This may be the best thing to do now, but in the near future the plant food thus taken away must be returned in the shape of commercial fertilizers and paid for in cash. The benefits arising from feeding the product of the farm to stock and thus selling the grain on foot are not always visible in the way of immediate returns, but before abandoning live stock entirely the good farmer will consider the questions involved very carefully.

LIVING BURIALS.

The Object in Burying People Alive.

BURDENS TO THEIR RELATIVES.

Obsequies of Live Persons Attended with Much Pomp and Ceremony—Much Done to Smooth the Way.

Referring to the controversy concerning the immuring of nuns, an American journal says it would doubtless surprise the disputants to learn that there is at any rate one country in the world where people are to this day buried alive. What is more, the victim is not only a consenting party to the deed, but even takes part in the funeral as his own chief mourner. The country where this pracitce remains in existence is China; and the people who are thus buried alive are usually those who, either on account of their incorrigible misconduct or incurable maladies, have come to be regarded as burdens to their relatives, and as constituting not only a nuisance, but also a danger to the community to which they belong. These interments of living men and women are generally the result of a decree of a sort of family council composed of all the principal relatives of the victim, and they are so far regarded as legitimate that the local authorities do not hesitate to attend the obsequies. Sometimes, too, the decree is pronounced by a vigilance committee or, "Vehmgericht," an institution that flourishes as extensively in China at the present day as it did in Germany two and three centuries ago. Ordinarily the obsequies of live persons are attended with pomp and ceremony, especially when it is not misconduct, but merely disease or old age, which causes the family and the fellow-citizens of the candidate for funeral honors to desire his departure for another world. Everything that is possible is done to smooth the way and to cheer, if one may be allowed to use the expression, his last moments. Relatives and neighbors combine to purchase the most expensive coffin that they can afford, the prices ranging from 10 to 500 and even 1,000 dollars. At the funeral repast that precedes the interment he is the guest of honor, and as soon as the feasting has been brought to a conclusion the procession to the grave begins. It is led off by the empty coffin, which in form resembles the trunk of a tree, the boards being three or four inches thick, and rounded outside. Immediately following the coffin walks the "moribund," magnificently arrayed, generally in the superbly-embroidered garments of a mandarin, and bearing a fan in one hand, and a prayer written on a piece of paper in the other. Then follow the members of the family, the village or town authorities, and the neighbors. On reaching the border of the grave, the principal actor in this extraordinary performance takes a solemn leave of all those present, arranges his garments in the most convenient and comfortable fashion, takes a last big swallow of opium, and thereupon assumes his place in the coffin. A piece of silver having been placed on his chin, the lid is placed on the casket and is nailed down by his sons and nearest relatives; the casket then being lowered into the grave, the earth is battened down, and all is over.

These statements may seem to be mere travelers' tales, some of those absurd exaggerations—embroideries is, perhaps, the most appropriate term—to which people who have journeyed far are popularly supposed to be addicted. But, says the writer, I have, when in China, frequently heard the matter discussed by people who had actually witnessed ceremonials of this kind; and further confirmation is afforded by duly authenticated instances described in one of the recent numbers of the Austrian "Oriental Review." There can be no doubt as to the absolute authenticity of the cases described, one of which in particular took place only three or four years ago at a place called Tchim Kong. The object in burying people alive in this manner is to get rid of them in a way calculated to free those who have taken part in the affair from all responsibility in this world, and at the same time to save the victim from the odium of suicide in the next world; for, theoretically at any rate, the person interred is a consenting party thereto, and his relatives and neighbors are merely executing his last, and therefore sacred, wishes in nailing down his coffin and burying him. Strictly speaking (that is, from a Chinese point of view) there is no murder, no execution, and no suicide. It is merely a sort of mutual arrangement affair, satisfactory alike to all parties, the occupant of the coffin complying with the desire of his relatives and neighbors for his departure for a better world, and they, on their side, endeavoring by every means in their power to make this departure agreeable. China is the only country where this ancient custom of burying people alive still exists. That it used in olden times to be practiced in many of the countries of Europe is an acknowledged fact, the medieval survivals of the custom taking the form of what may be described as immuration, or the building up in a wall of the victim. And there is a distinguished priest, one of the most famous pulpit orators of France who has placed on record a midnight visit that he paid some thirty years ago to administer the last sacrament to a man of evident education and birth, who was being built up into the wall of the dining-hall of an old mansion in Paris, and to wh ch he had been taken in a carriage bl ndfolded. The priest could give no indication as to where the mansion was, except that it was located on left bank of the Seine, a fact which he ascertained from the carriage driving across a bridge. I am perfectly aware that this oft-told story is regarded by many as a fairy-tale, but its author was a man of too great eminence and piety to admit of any suspicion that he was romancing, and far too clever to allow the supposition that he had been the victim of an hallucination. Of course the secret of the confessional debarred him from telling the sins which the built-in man had on his conscience with a view to establishing his identity; but the reverend father permitted enough to become known to lead to the inference that the man had been guilty of some terrible offence against society, which could not have been punished by the tribunals without bringing disgrace upon an illustrious and time-honored name.

A writer in "Harper's Weekly" says that the upper great lakes were once drained by way of the Illinois river, and that the bed of the Illinois is now but thirty feet higher than the Niagara river. We may soon have aluminum tea kettles, warranted not to rust, and not to crack when hot and suddenly filled with cold water. They are very light, too, and it is asserted that water boils in them in half the time required for it to boil in iron or tin, but that sounds like the partial enthusiasm of an advertiser.

Nickel aluminum is the latest metal. Its color resembles silver, and it is far more ductile than steel. A bar 18 inches long and 113-16 inches by ¼ inch thick had a permanent set of 1 1-8 inches. It took 400 pounds to deflect the metal that much. A similar piece of steel of 66,000 tensile strength took exactly the same load.

Th "Popular Scince Monthly" says: Although the science of electricity is still in its infancy, it is marvelous the progress it has made in the last twenty years. We have in the United States more than 300 mining companies making use of electricity for light and power, and fully one-third of all the copper refined in this country is treated by the electrolytic process.

The "British Medical Journal," states the comparison of figures obtained from various sources leads to the belief that down to the middle of July the mortality from the plague in Canton alone amounted to 40,000 people. In striking contrast stands out the health of the foreign community in Canton, who passed through the epidemic unscathed. This immunity they owe in large measure to the excellent sanitary arrangements that prevail.

The cruel and unnecessary custom of docking horse tails should be prohibited by law in every State in the Union. It is a barbarous practice and the one who indulges in it should be made to suffer a severe penalty. We know of a case where a valuable horse was docked and in a few days died of lock-jaw. The owner only suffered the loss of several hundred dollars for his inhumanity, when some part of the pain he inflicted on a dumb brute ought to have been his reward.

KENTUCKY HEMP.

Manufacturers Forced to Use Cheaper Substitutes.

WORK REQUIRED IN HARVESTING IT.

A Year Said to Intervene Between the Sowing of the Seed and the Selling of the Product.

Mr. James K. Reeve, in the "Country Gentleman," says: In 1882 the crop amounted to about 4,000 tons; it had not varied much from this for a long time. Cheaper fibers were brought in to help meet the demand for lower priced goods, and jute and sisal for awhile nearly drove American hemp from the market. The fall in price has reduced the value from $160 per ton to $100. The Kentucky crop for the present year is estimated at only 3,000 tons, but there is no prospect of an advanced value.

Besides the introduction of cheaper substitutes in the way of fibers, hemp has met disastrous competition from another source. The use of metal in the place of fibers has assumed large proportions. The first step in this direction, and one which largely curtailed the market for hemp, was the use of iron cotton ties—the straps which are used to bind the bales. Then came the introduction of steel wire cordage for standing rigging on ships. In connection with the baling of cotton, bagging made from jute butts was also adopted in place of the former hemp bagging. Thus, while its value is as fully recognized as ever, tne relentless demands of competition have forced manufacturers to use cheaper substitutes until the demand for it has almost ceased. Its principal employment now perhaps is for adulteration of flax, with the single exception of which it is doubtless the best fiber produced.

To help the reader understand the cost of harvesting, and to realize the difficulties that are in the way of producing it more cheaply, a few words of explanation may be necessary.

From the time when the harvesting begins, which is in the latter part of August or by the first of September, a period of five or six months is required for preparing the crop for market. Generally speaking, a year may be said to intervene between the sowing of the seed and the selling of the product. The hemp is cut by hand, a knife set in at right angles to the handle being used. The work is pretty severe, as the stalks must be cut close to the ground, necessitating a constant stooping posture on the part of the workman. Cutting by machine has been tried, but it leaves a couple of inches of the butt of the stalk standing. This is just where the heaviest fiber is produced, and it is estimated that 200 pounds of fiber to the acre is lost by machine cutting. This, at 5 cents per pound, would amount to $10, which is much more than the cost of hand labor. The subsequent handling includes stacking and spreading—which consists in laying the canes out in regular rows upon the ground, to undergo the process of retting. A good crop is calculated as one that when thus spread will fully cover the ground upon which it has grown. It is left thus for some weeks, depending upon the weather, until retting (the word is probably a corruption of roting) has progressed so far that the pith or inner part of the cane will separate readily from the husk or fiber. The separation is then done by means of a brake, a clumsy wooden tool operated by hand, which thrashes the woody portion of the stalk out from the fiber and leaves the latter finally ready for market. All of these precesses are expensive, the breaking alone costing $1 per 100 pounds. The securing of the crop entails so much expense that it is quite common for the grower to secure advances of money for this purpose from dealers and manufacturers. But I am glad to say they are not under such thraldom of crop mortgages and usurious rates of interest as have been too common with another class of fiber producers in the South—the cotton growers. One of the largest buyers of hemp in Lexington told me that he was already advancing money for the payment of harvesting expenses, charging no interest and only requiring that he should be given the opportunity of purchasing the crop at its market value when ready.

After passing through the brake the hemp is twisted into a coil of about 5 pounds weight, which is called a "hand," and in this rough state goes to the dealer. In this warehouse or factory it is hackled or dressed, which is also a hand process, and is then ready for baling and shipment. In hackling, the short fiber is separated from the longer, and makes a second quality. The fine waste product is called tow, and when mixed with tar becomes oakum, which is used in calking ships.

From 800 to 1,400 pounds of hemp is considered an average crop. Even at the present price of $100 per ton, it is a crop that gives a fair money yield per acre, and might still be a profitable one were it not for the extraordinary expense of handling. As it is, farmers are preferring to grow more corn, and to make up the difference in their incomes by letting more land for tobacco.

The difference between genius and talent is that the former is a perpetual, never-failing spring; the latter is merely a cistern that has to be filed up from time to time.

The foremost popular interest in the coming legislative session is the Senatorial election. Since the Republicans have an overwhelming majority, they will of course name the Senator. Before the election three weeks ago the names most prominently urged for the place were those of George C Perkins and M. H. De Young. It has generally been assumed that the chances of the latter were lost in the route of the Burns-Estee crowd to which he belongs, but we see no reason to regard this as an established fact It is unquestionably true that De Young was the first choice of the railroad interest for the last vacancy; and he probably stands now in the same relation. His chances rest, we believe, upon the ability of the railroad interest—in combination with such other political forces as De Young with his newspaper and his "sack" can bring to bear—to control the Legislature. Of course De Young's election would finish the Republican party in California, but neither he nor his backers care anything for parties, excepting as they may be used for personal and mercenary ends. By the common judgment, Mr. Perkins is allowed to have the better chance, but upon what basis his hopes rest, we have no knowledge. The only other candidate who is taken seriously is Irving M. Scott of the Union Iron Works, who, it is supposed will inherit Perkins' strength if it should be found that he cannot make it. All three of the men named are millionaires and all are allied closely with the railroad and other capitalistic interests. Will the time never come when some man of the people can be chosen to represent California in the United States Senate.

It was after the football game. The students of Stanford and the students of the university of California, feeling hilarious and victorious and all that, assembled by a notorious drinking saloon in San Francisco and proceeded to get very drunk; as is the custom of college students the world over. Being drunk they set upon a young man named Alexander Laughborough, whom they buffeted sorely, laughing the while in wanton jollity. Presently Laughborough tired of the joke, and pulling a pistol, shot one of his assailants, wounding him grievously. Then the crowd dispersed, the leaded young man was taken away to be probed, and the shooter gave himself up to the police. All of which points a moral to adorn the tale. It is this: When university students get drunk and disgrace themselves, their families and their alma mater they should beware of the fool and his gun. An effort will undoubtedly be made to palliate this bar-room brawl on behalf of those concerned, and it is not likely that anyone will be expelled from either Stanford or Berkeley, but the regents and trustees of those "temples of learning" should find some means of keeping their Apaches on the reservation—they are too dangerous to be at large, not only to the community, but to themselves.

It begins to look as if Dan Burns might have the effrontery to present himself as a candidate for United States senator. This ambition was absurd enough in the case of M. H. DeYoung, but when Dan Burns stretches his unclean hands to place the toga on his shoulders indignation usurps mirth, and the voice of popular dissent is heard in the land. The election of Dan Burns to represent the sovereign people of California in the United States senate would be a crime.

It would be the supremest irony of fate if Los Angeles should eventually receive the bulk of the benefit accruing from a competing railroad through the San Joaquin; but it would also be the natural result of San Francisco's quarter century of apathy towards her own interests and her supine submission to the tyranny of the Southern Pacific.

Yale is keeping up its record as the leading educational instution of the country—in the quality of the muscle it develops, if in no other line. Its football team has floored that of Harvard.

STRANGELY SAVED FROM DEATH.

A Dramatic Prevention of Assassination In a Gambling House.

A crowd of people witnessed a singular scene here the other night, in which a man's life was saved after as novel a fashion as ever any writer of fiction has evolved. Rafe Shaffer, a well known sporting man, was seated in a gambling saloon talking to a friend, who had only lately come here from the east. Shaffer was telling his companion of a quarrel that he had with another man about town, whom he suspected of being about to make an attempt on his life.

As he was speaking the eastern man suddenly interrupted him with the question, "Say, Shaffer, do you remember your old business as a telegraph operator?"

Shaffer, who, it seems, had followed this trade before going west, looked surprised, but answered that he did.

"Well, you know, it's a very easy thing forgotten. Now, I will bet you can't tell me what I am going to tick out here on this table."

The eastern man then took a pencil from his pocket and began to tick off a message which, as he finished, caused Shaffer to spring hastily from his seat, drawing, as he did so, a revolver from his pocket, which he thrust almost in the face of a man who had been standing in the door of the saloon, and who had just covered him with his pistol. The two men glared at each other, and then Shaffer said calmly:

"Better put up your weapon, Smith, unless you want to shoot it out with me here. I have got the drop on you as much as you on me."

Smith hesitated and then replied that he would put up his pistol if Shaffer would and consented to leave the question between them to the arbitration of mutual friends. Shaffer agreed to the arbitration plan, as it seems both men had their reasons for not letting the cause of the bad blood between them be known to the public. Smith then left, and Shaffer thanked his quick witted friend for the services he had rendered him. The message the eastern man had rapped out was as follows:

"If your enemy is a dark complexioned man, with a hooked nose and a scar on the left cheek, he has just entered the saloon and has his hand on his pistol pocket. If you fear treachery from him, move quickly, or he'll have the drop on you. I am unarmed, so that I cannot draw for you. Draw now, as he has his pistol out, and unless you are as quick as lightning he will have you."

Shaffer's keen ear caught the words, and he acted at once on them, as has been shown. His wheeling so suddenly about on Smith took that gentleman so by surprise that he was compelled to back down.—Hastings (Neb.) Cor. Philadelphia Times.

COST HIM A HAND.

A Philadelphia Man's Invention Blew Up, and He Is Maimed For Life.

For a long time Pierson M. Stackhouse, a conveyancer, has been experimenting with a fire extinguishing chemical. It is probable that he will give up his idea of revolutionizing such compounds, if not altogether, for a time at least, because disaster overtook him with one terrific swoop yesterday afternoon.

Stackhouse believed that he solved the problem he had so long studied over, and yesterday afternoon he started out from his house, 2446 North Tenth street, to make a test. He strapped the cylinder to his back and carried the section of rubber hose in his left hand. His family stood at the door, and a friend, who had aided him in his experiments, walked close beside him. The inventor intended to see how far the chemical would be thrown, and he fearlessly reached up with his right hand to turn on the stopcock at the top of the cylinder in order to set the chemical to work.

At that instant there came a terrific explosion, which scared the wits nearly out of residents of the whole neighborhood. Windows rattled ominously, and crockeryware was demolished in some of the closets of nearby houses. Women and children, with blanched faces, rushed from their homes in terror, thinking that an earthquake or worse had come.

Stackhouse was thrown violently to the sidewalk. The top of the cylinder had blown off, and his right hand hung by a few shreds from his wrist. He lay unconscious on the sidewalk as his wife ran shrieking out to him, and a crowd quickly collected to see what the explosion meant. The inventor was taken to the Episcopal hospital, where it was necessary to amputate the shattered hand at the wrist.—Philadelphia Record.

Piety and Politics.

No one who has visited the south can escape the impression that a deep revolution in opinion is at work there. For several years it has been their habit to hold modest, unheralded meetings, mainly in the rural districts, sometimes weekly, sometimes monthly. They are usually opened with prayer, and it is not unusual after harvest time for the planters to maintain camp meetings a week together. Speaking begins between 9 and 10 in the morning, and the slow declining sun is still a spectator to these intense congregations. There is even a fine illuming vein of religious fervor in it all. The opening prayer, the political song set to church music, the two hour harangue at a stretch, the patriotic cheers, like strains from a new anthem—these are not the committee bought demonstrations of common campaigns. It is a rising of the people, and in due time the newspapers will make a discovery, for they will hear these people sing, and after that the ballot.—Donahoe's Magazine.

Death Stretched Him.

When John Edward Kelly's illness made him take to his bed at his home in Lambertville, N. J., for the last time six weeks ago, the lad was 5 feet in height and very fleshy. When he died on Friday last, he had fallen away to a skeleton, but the undertaker found that his stature was 6 feet 2 inches.

MAN MAY YET FLY.

Wonderful Birdlike Machine Constructed by Professor Lilienthal.

Can a man fly? Learned professors of the sciences of aeronautics agree that he cannot, and a formidable commission of experts appointed by the German government to investigate into the possibilities of aerial navigation have finally and decisively and officially said that it is impossible. Still an ingenious and observant German of the name of Otto Lilienthal, after a long series of experiments and in the face of the decisions of the eminent scientists, has succeeded in proving that a clever man can fly, and fly for considerable distances too.

Professor Lilienthal, like most men who have solved difficult problems, has gone clear away from the principles to which other men have found limitations. When he decided to fly, in other words, he left the possibilities afforded by the balloon entirely out of his calculations. Balloons, said he, are crude affairs, dangerous, not to be depended upon, nondirigible and clumsy. There is nothing in nature built upon the principle of the balloon, yet there are things in nature which can fly, and fly much better than the best balloons. Those things are birds. To the birds, then, I will go for the model of my flying machine. And to the birds he went.

From these same birds it was that Professor Lilienthal learned the true principles of aerial navigation, which principles he has succeeded to a degree in adapting to the uses of man. He first learned that it is the concave shape of a bird's wing that enables it to soar, rising or falling at will without muscular exertion in the teeth of a high wind. Then he learned that a bird's wing bones are constructed similarly to those in a man's arm. Knowing these things, he built his flying machine, or, to be more correct, his soaring machine. He made for himself of light but impervious cotton cloth and split willow wands two immense wings 23 feet from tip to tip, and a practicable if not highly ornamental rudder or tail.

He preserved in their construction as nearly as possible the form of a bird's wings and tail, increasing the parabolic curve of the bird's wings to the exact proportionate degree for his larger ones. These wings and the tail, weighing in all only 25 pounds, are so constructed as to fold up like the wings of a bat. Having completed them, the professor adjusted them to his arms, took a run along a hilltop and calmly and confidently jumped over the side, spreading his wings as he did so. He soared some distance and alighted in safety and comfort. He repeated his experiment many, many times, learning how to control his apparatus, how to change direction, how to rise or descend at will. He improved his wings and tail and kept on practicing until now he can soar for several hundred yards, rise to a much greater height than he started from and fulfill most of the functions of a big bird, save only that of propelling himself in still air and starting his flight from level ground. These two things a man is not strong enough to do, the bird possessing much greater strength for its size and weight than the most muscular man. But what Professor Lilienthal lacks in strength he has made up in ingenuity, for he has now constructed a little motor, operated by carbonic acid gas, which, while it adds scarcely anything to the weight of his flying apparatus, is capable of developing continuously two horsepower, or more than enough energy to work the wings. Indeed in the first trial the little motor developed too much strength and broke the wings, putting a stop to further experiments for the time.

If Professor Lilienthal succeeds in perfecting the great invention, the practicability of which he has already demonstrated, and in making aerial navigation on the simple principles favored by the birds safe for mankind, he will have achieved a notable triumph over the wonderful forces of nature as well as the world's greatest scientists. And he seems very likely to succeed, unless he should grow careless in handling his experimental wings and perchance fall victim to the awful fate which overtook the lamented and legendary Icarus, the first man who attempted to fly.—Chicago Times.

THE BALLOON CYCLE.

The Latest French Army Means of Carrying War Dispatches.

There floated over the hamlet of Villeneuve la Garenne the other afternoon in midair a balloon. Suddenly it appeared to burst and fell rapidly toward the earth. Fearing that a disaster had occurred, the terrified folk ran to the spot at which they expected the aerostat would reach the ground, when to their amazement they saw a parachute detach itself from the car and descend gently. Immediately the earth was touched one of the passengers jumped upon a small bicycle which he had brought with him from the aerial regions, and he disappeared in the direction of Levallois, in the neighborhood of Paris, as rapidly as the machine could carry him.

The explanation of this singular occurrence is simple. The balloon was the Caliban, and the ascent was made from Levallois by Captain Capazza and M. Hervieu, the latter being the cyclist. Their object was to test the possibility of a balloon being used for carrying war dispatches, and they assumed that an enemy succeeded in destroying it. Yet they proved that by means of the parachute they would be able to make good their escape and to outdistance their pursuers with the aid of the portable bicycle.—London Telegraph.

He Was Too Slow.

He reached out as if he would catch hold of her, but she eluded his grasp. Again he made an equally feeble attempt, and again she eluded him. Once more he made a feeble attempt, and she had no difficulty in escaping. This time she became indignant, almost angry.

"What do you mean, sir," she exclaimed, "by thus trying to kiss me?"

"I—I—I presume," he hesitated, "that I meant to kiss you."

She drew herself up proudly, then stepped near him and gazed down on him defiantly.

"Well," she said emphatically, "why in heaven's name don't you do it?"—Detroit Free Press.

Overheard on the River.

"You are nothing but a big bluff," remarked the river to the bank.

"Is that so?" retorted the bank. "If I take a notion to come down on you, your name will be mud."—Indianapolis Journal.

A SHATTERED IDOL.

Each week I saw him take an X
And put it in a letter
And mail it, and for that I own
I liked him all the better.

I thought of some dear country home,
A patient mother bearing
A burden lightened by the thought
That he for her was caring.

His surly ways and hardened face
I easily forgave him,
Because of this, his weekly gift,
One virtue that could save him.

But oh, alas! One fateful day
In asking for a loan he,
With awful oaths, declared he must
Send on that alimony.

THE POWER OF THE PRESS.

How It Might Be the Highest Terrestrial Illustration of Omnipotence.

Colonel Pat Donan, the celebrated correspondent, speaking on the subject of editors of newspapers to a Philadelphia News man, said:

We speak of England, France, Germany, Russia and the United States as "the great powers," but among all the powers of earth the press stands easily first and greatest. If every journalist fully appreciated his power and his responsibility and every journal were known to be absolutely truthful, honest, fearless and incorruptible beyond the reach of wheeding, bribery or intimidation; wearing the dog collar of no party, section, sect or faction; patriotic and not partisan, always for the right and against the wrong, a union of all the newspapers would be the highest terrestrial illustration of omniscience and omnipotence. Such a combination could overturn any principality, throne or dominion under heaven, as a herd of Texas steers might upset a child's array of tin soldiers. It could establish and maintain any system, cause, creed or institution the editors chose to support.

Civilization culminates in the power press, and the bounds of civilization are limited by the circulation of the daily papers. There is no civilized speech or language where their voice is not heard or their influence is not felt. A few weeds soaked in bilge water, or a little calomel rolled in sweetened dough, with plenty of printers' ink, will make a millionaire of any pauperistic quack in five years, whether it is the brains, hearts, livers, lungs, kidneys or gizzards of newspaper reading gudgeons his humbug panacea claims to regenerate. A few thousand acres of iron, coal or timber, a fair flatboat harbor or two or three intersecting railroads, with reasonable circumjacent possibilities, and abundant advertising, will build a city out of nothingness anywhere in a decade. There is no enterprise or business, benefaction or villainy that cannot be pushed into triumph or driven to failure by the newspapers. Great reputations are created by them out of nothing and wrecked by them for amusement. In this country governors, senators and even presidents are made by them—often out of material intended for tinkers and peddlers, baseball players, gamblers, shysters, pickpockets and thugs.

His Heart Bowed Down.

He accosted me as I came out of the postoffice on Broadway and wanted to know whether the Broadway cable was the only one now at work. I said there was another on One Hundred and Twenty-fifth street, running up to High Bridge, and was about passing on when he grasped me by the arm and said in a whisper:

"Which is the wust?"

"There's no choice," said I shortly, preparing to cross the street.

"Then these New York newspapers are blamed liars, b'gosh, and I don't keer who knows it!" said he.

"What's the matter?" I asked, with interest.

"I've been readin nothin lately 'cept 'bout accidents by the deadly trolley and the bloody cable, and I've been ridin all over Brooklyn without seein a durn accident and spent 35 cents on this line without so much as seein a newsboy hurt. It ain't fair, that's what it ain't." And he shook his head sadly and crossed over and took a Fourth avenue horse car up town.—New York Press.

He Was Too Slow.

He reached out as if he would catch hold of her, but she eluded his grasp. Again he made an equally feeble attempt, and again she eluded him. Once more he made a feeble attempt, and she had no difficulty in escaping. This time she became indignant, almost angry.

"What do you mean, sir," she exclaimed, "by thus trying to kiss me?"

"I—I—I presume," he hesitated, "that I meant to kiss you."

She drew herself up proudly, then stepped near him and gazed down on him defiantly.

"Well," she said emphatically, "why in heaven's name don't you do it?"—Detroit Free Press.

An Eye Cleaner.

In traveling you can easily guard against the dread of getting cinders in your eye by carrying with you a tiny box of flaxseed. The instant you feel a foreign substance in the eye throw back your head and drop three or four flaxseed on the ball of the eye; then lift the upper lid and draw it down over them so as to hold them in. The relief will come immediately, and soon the seeds will begin to work out and bring the offending particle with them.—Philadelphia Ledger.

Dog Reputations.

Uncle George—Your dog isn't so smart as Tommy's, is he?

Little Johnny—Yes, he's just as smart, but I isn't so good a liar as Tommy.—Good News.

Boat Propelled by a Turbine Wheel.

Several trials have been made on the Elbe with a boat propelled not by the ordinary screw, which replaced the paddle wheel, but by means of a turbine wheel. The inventor, Herr Zenner, states that a much greater speed can be obtained than with the screw, because the friction is much less. Three boats have already been constructed on this pattern.—Westminster Gazette.

An Honest Quaker.

A sheriff was once asked to execute a writ against a Quaker. On arriving at his house he saw the Quaker's wife, who, in reply to the inquiry whether her husband was at home, said he was, at the same time requesting him to be seated, and her husband would speedily see him. The officer waited patiently for some time, when, the fair Quakeress coming into the room, he reminded her of her promise that he might see her husband. "Nay, friend, I promised that he would see thee. He has seen thee. He did not like thy looks. Therefore he avoided thee and hath departed from the house by another path."—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

A Great Recommendation.

Miss Dukane—I want to have some photographs taken. Where would you go?

Miss Humly—I'd go to Mr. Snapshot if I were you. He made some perfectly lovely pictures of me.

Miss Dukane—Did he really? Well, if he is such a clever artist as that, I'll go there too.—Pittsburg Chronicle-Telegraph.

DIED

BROWN—At Bishop, December 5, 1894. Jonathan Brown, a native of Illinois, aged 58 years.

—Mr. Brown had been in poor health for many years, and the news of his death, while it shocked and grieved the community, was not a surprise. He had lived in this vicinity for about fifteen years, and though a reserved and quiet man, had many friends. To his bereaved widow we extend our sincere sympathy.

A. P. Smith was down from Big Pine on Tuesday.

J. J. Stewart of Lone Pine was in town yesterday.

The Storm.

On Tuesday night the first heavy storm of the season began and continued without cessation for forty-eight hours. The total rainfall amounted to .33 of an inch. Last night the storm broke and this morning was bright and clear. There was a heavy fall of snow on the Sierras and the indications are favorable for still more. Within the recollections of the oldest settlers the mountains had never been so bare as just preceeding this storm and are in order to make a good water season certain for next year a much greater quantity of snow must yet fall. The highest velocity of wind recorded in the local Weather Bureau station was forty miles per hour at 12:30 yesterday.

A Crack Race.

Last Thursday morning Tom Morris of Santa Ana, accompanied by his trainer Ed Riley, arrived at Independence for the purpose of accepting Ed Ober's challenge to run any man in the State seventy five yards. Ober came down from Big Pine on Wednesday and a match has been arranged to come off on New Years Day. Morris is popularly believed to be the fastest man in the world for that distance, though he has been beaten twice this summer at one hundred yards. He is also handled by a skilful and experienced trainer. Ober has had a number of races and has an unbeaten record. He has never yet met a "crack" sprinter, consequently should he win this race he can confidently feel able to beat any man alive. It will be the fest race of the young man's life, and his future depends upon the outcome of it.

The President's Message

The message sent to Congress last Monday by President Cleveland is a business letter in every particular and is almost devoid of politics. In the matter of the foreign politics of the nation he reiterates the principles of the Monroe doctrine. He holds the country responsible for Germanys prohibition of American cattle and says that country is merely retaliating on our discriminating duties on sugars from foreign lands and recommends the repeal of the statute that imposes the duty. He suggests the reorganization of the Union Pacific railway company on a basis equitable as regards all private interests and as favorable to the Government as existing conditions will permit. On the tariff Mr. Cleveland is explicit. He says the Act passed at the last session needs amending. He wants the interests of American shipping furthered, the duty taken off sugar imported from countries that pay an export tax on it; he is not pleased with the financial laws, but fears the consequences of a silver standard. Then he closes the paper with the statement that in whatever is good for the country that Congress may do, whether it is done on his suggestion or not, he will heartily co operate.

Junior Lay In Berkeley.

The class of '95 of the University of California held its Junior Day celebration to-day. In the morning a very clever farce in three acts, dubbed "An Allapodoida" written by Raimond J. Reiss, was presented in Shattuck Hall, and in the evening the Junior hop was given in the gymnasium. After a bright address by Class President Thompson the farce was put on with the following cast of characters;

Hubie Trafton, an innocent freshman .....Prentiss Selby Jr.
Douglas Bonshaw, a senior and a representative of Hi Phi .....Willard D. Thompson
Willie Russell, a sophomore and a representative of Phi Gama Hu .....Roy T. Guppy
Fred Brown, a junior and a representative of Zeta Theta Pi .....Charles F. Eckart
A Student .....Herbert Fishbeck
Marie Mavick, a Stanford co-ed .....Miss Jessie Anderson
Mrs. Trefton, a modern mother .....Miss Emily Rhine
Gladys Trafton, her daughter .....Miss Eulah Mitchell
Violet Hogan, a French maid with a Parisian accent .....George Noble

The acting of all the students was better than ordinary work of amateurs. Power Hutchins was to have acted the part of Violet Hogan, the maid, but he was ill, and his place was taken by George Noble. Miss Emily Rhine as Mrs. Trafton, and Prentiss Selby as the freshman distinguished themselves especially. Throughout the farce there were numerous local college "hits" and references to the recent football games, which elicited considerable applause. The University Glee Club rendered several selections during the last act, which were well received. In the evening the gymnasium was crowned with students and their friends who came to attend the hop, which was one of the most successful ever given.
Examiner.

The new time table on the C. & C. went into effect last Monday. Under the present arrangement the train arrives at Independence Station at 5:35 p. m., and the north bound train arrives at 7:25 a. m. The train now runs through to Hawthorne instead of remaining overnight at Belleville as formerly. Owing to the fact that the train remains but a very short time at the station all shippers are notified to be on hand with their freight at least half an hour before train time.

Hon. P. Reddy will arive at Independence to-mrrow morning from Darwin, where he has been been for the past week inspecting the Defiance mine. Mr. Reddy will probably be in town about two weeks conducting the Hines case, which begins in the Superior Court next Tuesday.

Charles M. Pilgrim of Los Angeles has located a tract of land north of the Sanger ranch at Alvord and with others will make extensive improvements in that section. Mr. Pilgrim went to Los Angeles on Wednesday and expects to return about two weeks hence with his brother.

On Wednesday there were eight inches of snow in Round Valley and about four inches at Bishop. There has been none of the beautiful in the valley south of Fish Springs, but there has been quite a rainfall, with a heavy fall of snow in the Sierras.

Among the arrivals from the upper end of the valley during the past week were: E. H. Ober, Ad Smith, and Fred Hilbert of Big Pine.

UNITED STATES LAND OFFICE,
INDEPENDENCE, CAL.,
November 28 1894.

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN:

Notice is hereby given that the Southern Pacific R. R. Co. (Main Line) has filed in this office a list of land situated in the townships described below and has applied for a patent for said lands; that the list is open to the public for inspection, and a copy thereof, by descriptive subdivisions, has been posted in a convenient place in this office for the inspection of all persons interested and the public generally.

Within the next sixty days following the date of this notice, protests or contests against the claim of the company to any tract or subdivision described in the list, on the ground that the same is more valuable for mineral than agricultural purposes, will be received and noted for report to the General Land Office at Washington, D. Order of Adjudication of Insolvency.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE County of Inyo, State of California.

Pierre Beyeye and Francois Hagata, Co-partners under the firm name of P. Beyeye & Co. Insolvent Debtors.

Pierre Beyeye and Francois Hagata, Co-partners under the firm name of P. Beyeye & Co., having filed in this Court their petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, from which it appears that they are insolvent debtors, the said Pierre Beyeye and Francois Hagata, Co-partners under the firm name of P. Beyeye & Co., are hereby declared to be insolvent, it is hereby ordered that the Sheriff of the said County of Inyo be, and he is hereby appointed Receiver of the property of said insolvents and that upon his giving a bond to the people of the State of California, conditioned as required by law, and in such sum as the Court may order, and qualifying, he take charge and possession of all the estate real and personal, of said insolvent debtors, whatsoever and wheresoever situate, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all their deeds, vouchers, books of account and papers; and to keep and care for and dispose of the same until the appointment of an Assignee of their estate. All persons having the same or any part thereof in his or their possession are hereby directed to deliver said property to said Receiver, and all persons owing money to said insolvents, or either of them, are hereby directed to pay the same to said Receiver, and that said Receiver keep said property or the proceeds thereof, till the further order of the Court. And all persons are hereby forbidden to pay any debts to said insolvents, or to deliver any property belonging to such insolvents, or either of them, to them or them, or any person for their use, and the said debtors are hereby forbidden to transfer or convey any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered.

It is further ordered, that all the creditors of said debtors be and appear before the Hon. Geo. M. Gill, Judge of the Superior Court of the said County of Inyo, in open Court at the court room of said court in the town of Independence, in said County of Inyo, on the 22nd day of December, 1894, at 10 o'clock a. m. of that day, to prove their debts and choose one or more assignees of the estates of said debtors. It is further ordered, that this order be published in the Inyo Independent, a newspaper of general circulation, published in the County of Inyo, as often as the said paper is published before the day set for the meeting of creditors.

And it is further ordered, that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvents be stayed.

Dated November 14th, 1894.

The World's Fair Tests

showed no baking powder so pure or so great in leavening power as the Royal.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., 106 WALL ST., NEW-YORK.

A FAIR REPORT.

Not long ago a resident of one of the small towns near New York came to the city to consult an eminent oculist, whose fee for a consultation is never less than ten dollars. He was rather green in appearance, so the doctor, who is something of a wag, and who was in particularly fine spirits that morning, thought he saw an opportunity to have a little fun at the expense of his rural visitor.

In the course of the examination a prism was placed before the eye of the patient in order to test the muscles.

"Why, doctor," he exclaimed, "I see two candles!"

"Indeed!" replied the doctor. "You are very fortunate."

"How so?"

"Why, just think what an advantage you have over the rest of us! You see everything double, and beautiful pictures, charming landscapes, and lovely faces are all repeated to you, and you must get just so much more pleasure out of them."

When the examination was concluded, and the prescription for the proper glasses written, the man, without a smile, laid a five-dollar bill on the table, with the remark, "There, doctor—there's ten dollars for you," and was gone in a moment, leaving the astonished physician to figure up the cost of his little pleasantry.

THE HIGHEST AWARD.

Royal Baking Powder in Strength and Value 20 per cent. above its Nearest Competitor.

The Royal Baking Powder has the enviable record of having received the highest award for articles of its class—greatest strength, purest ingredients most perfectly combined—wherever exhibited in competition with others. In the exhibitions of former years, at the Centennial, at Paris, Vienna, and at the various State and Industrial fairs, where it has been exhibited, judges have invariably awarded the Royal Baking Powder the highest honors.

At the recent World's Fair the examination for the baking powder awards were made by the experts of the chemical division of the Agricultural Department of Washington. The official report of the tests of the baking powders which were made by this department for the specific purpose of ascertaining which was the best, and which has been made public, shows the leavening strength of the Royal to be 160 cubic inches of carbonic gas per ounce of powder. Of the cream of tartar baking powders exhibited at the Fair, the next highest in strength thus tested contained but 133 cubic inches of leavening gas. The other powders gave an average of 111. The Royal, therefore, was found of 20 per cent. greater leavening strength than its nearest competitor, and 44 per cent. above the average of all the other tests. Its superiority in other respects, however, in the quality of food it makes as to fineness, delicacy and wholesomeness, could not be measured by figures.

It is these high qualities, known and appreciated by the women of the country for so many years, that have caused the sales of the Royal Baking Powder as shown by statistics, to exceed the sales of all other baking powders combined.

DIAMOND MINING.

Sometimes They Are Found in Perfect Crystals.

SOMETIMES IN VOLCANIC MATTER.

Negroes Are Very Acute and Wonderfully Alert in Discovering the Presence of the Much-Sought-For Gems.

Kimberley, in Griqualand, is the center of the diamond traffic of South Africa. Mr. A. G. Phillips, of Johannisberg, South Africa, recently called upon us and showed us some gravel and clay taken directly from the mines of Zelsers, at Delpots Hope, not far from Kimberley. The clay contains specimens of quartz, chalcedony, onyx, and other varieties of stones and conglomerates, and the small diamond crystals are found embedded in the deposits, which are apparently alluvial deposits carried down in past ages by the feeders of the Orange River. In the separating of the clays from the pebbles the latter wash out very smooth and round and show evidences of having been carried long distances before being deposited in their present localities. The diamonds themselves further verify this hypothesis, as in some cases they are found as perfect crystals, but more often as fragments. They are not alone found, however, in alluvial deposits, as in many cases the matrix in which they are embedded is volcanic matter that has been forced up in channels or pipes from inferior deposits.

The method of separation is very simple and primitive, and it would seem that great economy could be effected by the introduction of mechanical washers, but the negro labor is so cheap that up to the present time there has been little advance over the original methods first introduced. It would seem that the dishonesty of the negroes would, however, force the mine-owners to introduce any methods that would lessen their opportunities for stealing. The clay as it is taken from the mines is simply washed in a series of gauze trays, which permit the water and mud to flow away, but retain all substances of any considerable size. These screens are made of different capacity or grades, and the pebbles are therefore separated according to their sizes and collected in trays, where they are carefully examined. The negroes are very acute, and are wonderfully alert in discovering the presence of the much-sought-for gems. One negro under the present system only washes on an average about sixteen cubic feet of earth a day. All the cunning of their nature is called out in their endeavors to elude their master and to smuggle gems out of the mines without being detected. Every workman as he leaves the mines is subjected to the most rigid examination. All his clothes are removed and the inspectors make a most thorough examination of his person. Their ears, mouth, nose, toes, and toe and finger nails are carefully investigated, and severe punishment is meted out to any one found attempting to steal.

They are never permitted to pass out of sight of the mine police, and in case they have procured permission to leave the precinct of the mines and to visit the neighboring towns, they are kept in confinement, and their whole system is subjected to a thorough cleansing with purgatives for a period of ten days before they are released. In spite of every precaution that can be taken, the stealing cannot be stopped, and it is claimed that nearly 25 per cent. of the South African diamonds sold in the market are illicit or stolen property. This is so in spite of a police system more perfect than is to be found anywhere outside of Russia. A complete record is kept of every stone mined, and the red tape that has to be gone through in the purchase of a diamond is very striking. An intending purchaser in any of the well known markets has to make application of the authorities to purchase certain stones. Written permission is then granted him and the transfer then made, then the purchaser has to procure a license to carry about with him and take out of the country the diamonds in question. The license states the number and weight of the stones, their color and general appearanance, where they were mined, whom they were bought from, the purchase price, and every detail of the transaction that would tend to identify them. It is expedient for any one carrying a gem on his person to have his license with him, as he is liable to be stopped at any time by a detective or policeman, and if he is suspected of being an illicit dealer, his person is searched and he is required to establish the identity of any stones found on his person. His license, of course, will accomplish this, but in case he cannot produce it, or cannot refer to the public registration, which is always made when the license is issued, he is thrown into prison and tried as an I. D. B., as the illegal diamond buyers are called. There are a large number of I. D. B.'s, both whites and blacks, now working out long sentences at the government penitentiary. The sentences are very severe, as the colonial government is doing all in its power to wipe out the illegal traffic. Many of the diamond thieves escape into the neighboring provinces, where they cannot be reached by the laws in the colonies. The Orange Free State, which is very near the diamond district of Griqualand, is a favorite refuge for smugglers, and fugitives from justice find this the same haven of rest that Canada is to fugitives from this country.

It is no wonder that the blacks try to steal, although, as a rule, their compensation is very meager. It is said that the king of one of the leading tribes has a half bushel basket full of diamonds that he has exacted from the natives of his tribe upon their return to their native land.

He rents out the services of his subjects, and one condition of his permission to leave the country is that upon their return they must present their chief with a diamond or its equivalent in gold.

The I. D. B.'s, however, are not all so desirous of fleeing the colony, and many of them carry on their trade in a manner so cunning and so secret that they feel secure from justice, and in some cases, although their nefarious traffic may be an open secret, they have emassed fortunes which they are permitted to enjoy, owing to the fact that there is no legal proof that can be brought against them. One notable instance of this is the case of a Jew, who came to Griqualand some twelve or fifteen years ago, and who, in some mysterious way, has massed a fortune of nearly a million pounds, upon which he is now living in great magnificence. He is known to be an I. D. B., but he has covered up his transactions with such cleverness that the accusations against him are only whispered. He has been elected a member of Parliament, and no doubt now intends to become a respectable member of society.

SEEDS AND SHEAVES.

There is only one thing in the world easier to make than a good reputation; that is to make a bad one.

We have noticed that the man who always speaks well of his neighbor has a pretty good reptuation at home.

"Ram's Horn" says society is what people do when watched. We pity the moral condition of the man who wrote that item.

The man who loves flowers and reads good books and papers, is one who can be trusted. Anarchists do not wear button-hole bouquets.

Putting the largest apples at the top of the barrel pays for a time no doubt, but after a while even the big ones in view are not considered in making the price.

Farming combines both art and science. A farmer without an education is as badly off as the man who bets on a horse race; he may win, but there are a good many chances against him.

We know a farmer who told us the other day that the bicycle he bought for his boy had more than paid for itself. That boy thinks farming is not such a bad kind of a life, after all. The bicycle had something to do with this opinion.

In 1893 the United States consumed 16.08 gallons of malt liquors for every man, woman and child in its borders. Multiply this by 65,000,000 to find how many gallons it makes, and then try to imagine how much of want and hunger and sorrow for women and children it means.

Harvesters, riding plows and sulky cultivators may be found on every farm, but the washboard is about the same kind of a one that our grandmothers used. A good washing machine costs from five to eight dollars, but a washboard can be bought for twenty-five cents. This kind of economy gives a good many men a chance to look for a second wife.—American Farmer.

AN ILL WIND.

The truth of the old saw "It is an ill wind that blows no one good," was strikingly demonstrated in the lamentable death of President Carnot of France. While the world at large was horrified by the brutal assassination the florests and growers of cut flowers reaped a rich harvest. Never, perhaps, in the history of commercial floriculture has the demand for flowers been so great as it was in Paris for the unfortunate President's funeral. As soon as the news of the assassination reached the French capital it was almost impossible to secure flowers at any price. The leading florists bought at once whole beds of pansies, marigolds, marguerites, etc., and the entire product of rose-borders and houses filled with flowering orchids, paying any price that was asked. Common roses which were selling at a franc a dozen the day before, advanced at once to three francs, and blooms of La France roses, which sold before at six francs per dozen, at once brought a franc each; and other flowers rose in proportion owing to the immence orders received from all directions. Wreaths were made from all kinds of flowers, anything being used that could be secured. The leading florist in the Rue Royale received an order from the Emperior of Russia, through his Ambassador, for a wreath costing 8,000 francs, but could not undertake the order, having received more commissions than could be executed. Finally a florist was found who could furnish a wreath for 5,000 francs.

Two young men named James and George Lipp, aged nineteen and seventeen years respectively, were horribly mutilated by the explosion of a box of giant powder caps, near Mokelumne Hill, one day recently. The left hand of James was torn to shreds, necessitating amputation at the wrist, his eyesight was destroyed, his head, face and upper part of his body filled with fragments of metals from cap shells and the tin box in which the shells were contained; while the brother, George, was mangled about the head, losing one eye, and probably both. The first and second fingers and thumb of the left hand of James were found near the place, still holding a half-burnt cigarette.

POOR, BUT RICH.

Once, in New England, says a writer in the "Outlook," I was driving with an old farmer, and some of the men of the neighborhood came under criticism. Speaking of a prominent man of the village I asked, "He is a man of means?"

"Well, sir,' the farmer replied, "he aint got much money, but he's mighty rich.

"He has a great deal of land, then? I asked.

"No, sir, he aint got much land, neither, but still he is mighty rich.

The old farmer with a pleased smile, observed my puzzled look for a moment and then explained:

"You see, he aint got much land, but still he is rich, because he never went to bed owing any man a cent in all his life. He lives as well as he wants to live, and he pays as he goes; he doesn't owe anything, and he ain't afraid of anybody; he tells every man the truth, and does his duty by himself, his family, and his neighbors, his word is as good as a bond, and every man, woman and child in the town looks up to him and respects him. No, sir, he aint got much money, and he ain't got much land, but still he is a mighty rich man, because he's got all he needs and all he wants.

I assented to the old farmer's deductions, for I thought them entirely correct. When a man has all he needs and all he wants he is certainly rich, and when he lacks these things he is certainly poor.

The compiler of the most curious statistical table of the century shows that the average life of a physician in the sixteenth century was 36.5 years; in the Seventeenth century, 45.8; in the Eighteenth century, 49.8 and at the present time is 56.7.

Tarring and feathering was once a legal punishment of theft. It is to be found in the statutes of both England and France about the time of the Crusades.

HARD TIMES.

It is not merely the fact that a million men are said to be out of work with consequent loss of time, place and money, that makes the times seem so tough, but there are other aggravations superadded, growing out of the willful neglect of so many, that make the times seem hard, indeed. If better times were at hand and good places open to all that are now idle, there are thousands who would be totally unfit to go to work by reason of the neglect of some infirmity which totally unfits them to accept a proffered chance. What better opportunity could there be to get their physical condition in good shape than the enforced idleness gives them. To do so is making profit out of misfortune; not to do so is making hard times so much harder. It is poor logic to make anything bad grow worse, and it is no economy at all to save expense by sacrificing health. A man wants brawn, muscle and brain in as nearly a perfect condition as is possible, to gain a victory in the battle of life. It is mostly from a beginning in little things that the greater ones accumulate and finally overwhelm us. There is hardly one man who labors with his muscles from the skilled mechanic down to those who work with pick and shovel, but has some bodily ailment neglected. What costly trifling it is, looked at from results. For example: the bones, joints, ligaments, tendons and muscles are all under constant strain from the nature and demands of their work. Aches and pains must ensue. These, neglected, soon reach the chronic stage of stiffened limbs from contracted muscles. How many old mechanics have bent backs and back-aches we know. This is simply a condition of neglected lumbago, which had it been treated in time could have been cured in ten minutes by St. Jacob's Oil. This is also true of all the minor aches and pains. So certain a cure ought certainly to be in every workingman's house to make hard times lighter.

HOW TO WIN A PRIZE.

Augest Heidleck, Once a Laborer, Now Rich.

Invests a Dollar in the Honduras National Lottery and Wins a Capital Prize.

Barely over a year in Chicago and when he arrived without a cent in his pocket, August Heidleck left to-day with $1,000 and an exalted opinion of his good luck.

Heidleck is a native of Canada and was brought up on a farm on the St. Clair river, above Port Huron. There he toiled with his father until of age, when he came to this country to earn his living. That was fifteen years ago, and when he started out he was a common laborer. In Detroit he was married and a wife and two children will welcome him in their humble home at 284 Orleans street to-morrow.

In April of 1893 Heidleck left his family in Detroit and came to Chicago in search of work. His first permanent position was secured with Reeve & Company, liverymen, at 278 Chicago avenue. There he acted in the capacity of hostler and washed wagons. Occasionally he was allowed to drive, but his salary remained less than $1 a day, and it was hard work supporting himself and family on such a small allowance.

One day last month Heidleck decided to invest a dollar with the Honduras National Lottery Company. He secured a one-fifth ticket and then built air castles and told his friends what he would do if he only won. The day of the drawing found Heidleck promptly on hand to scan over the list. His heart almost leaped from his throat when he discovered that his number drew the second capital prize of $20,000. The ticket was at once sent to Paul Conrad for collection and to-day the express company gave Heidleck a crisp check for $1,000. He could hardly realize his luck when the bank exchanged a roll of bills for the check.

When seen by a reporter for The Dispatch Mr. Heidleck said: "The first dollar of my new fortune went for another ticket and I am now anxious to win the capital prize in the Honduras Company. The balance of my money will be used to purchase a farm up in Michigan. I will move my family up there and we will now be fixed for life. It was indeed a lucky dollar for me and I am too pleased to discuss my future. This is the first ticket I ever bought, but I felt sure I would win a prize. A friend of mine also drew $200 this month.

Mr. Heidleck seems to be a very sensible kind of a man, and with his luck should some day become a millionaire.—Chicago (Ill.) Dispatch, Oct. 10.

HAUNTED!

A haunted house in these practical and unromantic days is something of a rarity, but an individual haunted with the idea that his ailment is incurable is a personage frequently met with. Disbelief in the ability of medicine to cure is only a mild form of monomania, although in some cases repeated failures to obtain relief from many different sources would almost seem to justify the doubt. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters has demonstrated its ability to overcome dyspepsia, constipation, liver and kidney trouble, malarial complaints and nervousness, and its recorded achievements in the curative line ought at least to warrant its trial by any one troubled with either of the above ailments, even although his previous efforts to obtain remedial aid have been fruitless. Used with persistance, the Bitters will conquer the most obstinate cases.

The unequalled success of ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS as an external remedy has induced unscrupulous parties to offer imitations, which they endeavor to sell on the reputation of ALLCOCK'S. DEAFNESS CANNOT BE CURED

by local applications as they cannot reach the diseased portions of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

THE NAVAL BATTLE.

Encounter of Japanese and Chinese Fleets.

DAMAGE TO THE JAPANESE VESSELS

Stopping Torpedoes by a Rain of Shot and Shell—The Sinking of Three Big War-Ships.

Long before the rejoicings over the capture of Ping-Yang had begun to subside, Japan was excited to fresh enthusiasm by the news of a naval victory of even greater significance in the northeastern inlet of the Yellow Sea. On the 16th of September Admiral Ito, commanding the squadron stationed at the mouth of the Taitong, or Daido river, was notified that a large Chinese fleet had arrived at the Yalu river in charge of transports conveying reinforcements to the army on the frontier. He set sail the following morning with all the men-of-war that could be immediately summoned, namely: The Matsukushima, Yoshino, Takachiho, Akitsushima, Naniwa, Chiyoda, Fuso, Akagi and Hiyeik. Accompanying these eleven was the Saikio, a merchant steamer taken into the national service since the war began, of no strength and not intended for heavy work in action. She would not have joined the expedition but for the desire of Admiral Viscount Kabayama, the naval chief of the staff, who being on a visit of inspection at the north could not resist the temptation to witness the expected engagement.

Between 12 and 1 o'clock fourteen Chinese ships and six torpedo boats were discovered a little south of a harbor called Taikosan in Japanese pronunciation, and east of Kalyoto Island.

The ships were the Ting Yuen, flag; Chen Yuen, Lai Yuen, King Yuen, Ching Yuen, Chih Yuen, Ping Yuen, Chao Yuen, Yang Wei, Kwang-kak, Wei Yuen, Kwang Ping and two others whose names are still unknown. Of these the first two carried Krupp guns of thirty centimeter and fifteen centimeter. The next four carried twenty-one centimeter and fifteen centimeter Krupps, and the next two had twenty-five-ton Armstrongs. Contrary to anticipation they advanced unhesitatingly and commenced fire when 4,000 meters distant from the Japanese, who reserved their first discharge until another 1,000 meters had been covered. The serious fighting began between the vessels of the Chinese right and the Japanese left, the flagships on either side leading the onset. By 1 o'clock the contest was general. Both lines maintained their position steadily for an hour, when the Chinese showed signs of wavering. Three of their ships, either by accident or design, had for some time been made special objects of attack, and though they contended vigorously to the last, they were sunk, one after another, the crews climbing into the rigging as each descended, signaling wildly for help to both their companions and assailants. These were the Lai Yuen, Chih Yuen and Chao Yuen.

As soon as they were disposed of, the foremost Japanese ships directed their assault against the immense German-built vessels at the head of the Chinese column, but for a long time without effect upon the heavy steel plating which protected them. At last, however, a lucky shell struck the Ting Yuen a little above the water, and seemed to the Japanese observers to pierce the armor through and through. Their belief that this feat had been achieved was increased when a thick body of smoke was seen rising from the flagship, and, though no diminution of activity on board was perceptible, they were convinced that she had been set on fire and remained burning up to the hour of her hasty departure. What ever her condition, she succeeded in inflicting heavy punishment upon her chief adversary. The Matsushima was struck by two 12-inch shells, the first of which upset and battered out of shape one of her large guns, while the second exploded an ammunition box, dealing dreadful havoc among the crew, and starting a fire which was subdued only with great difficulty. In consequence of these mishaps, the Matsushima withdrew from the scene and moved toward the Taitong, Admiral Ito transferring his flag to the Hashidate.

Meanwhile three other Japanese vessels had undergone extremely rough treatment. The Saikio, which Viscount Kabayama persisted in keeping in the thick of the fight, notwithstanding her obvious unsuitability for such duty, lost control of her rudder, and found herself in much closer proximity than was desirable to the Ting Yuen and Chen Yuen. As she could not avoid them, she made directly for them, misleading them, it is supposed, into the belief that she was about to ram them. The Japanese are of the opinion that it was under this illusion that the two huge ships separated, allowing the Saikio a passage about forty fathoms wide through which to escape. Torpedoes were discharged at her as she went by, but without avail.

The Hiyel, having been unable by reason of her slowness to keep pace with the rest of the fleet, became a conspicuous object to the Chinese, and was so deluged with missiles that she was set on fire before the afternoon was half over. Her small crew was greatly reduced, and as the surgeon was among the wounded, the sufferers could not be properly cared for. When she had lost twenty killed and thirty-four wounded, she fell out of line and turned toward the Taitong; but meeting a transport on the way, she obtained assistance in quenching the flames, handed over the wounded, and returned with all the speed she could make, not waiting for a doctor, to take up her work where she had left off. In this hope she was disappointed, for the enemy had flown and the battle was over. It is recorded that when steaming away in flames she was thrice in great danger from torpedoes, but skillfully escaped by employing a device described in a recent magazine account of an imaginary naval fight in South America. To most readers of that sketch the expedient of stopping a projectile by turning upon it a converging fire of shot and shell seemed purely fictitious; yet this is precisely what the Hiyei is said to have done in at least one instance.

The Akagi, a small gunboat, was badly overmatched from the outset, accident having brought her under the fire of no less than six of the enemy at once. Her commander was struck down and killed while she was thus hotly engaged, yet she would still have kept up a determined resistance but for the loss of a mast, which rendered her unmanageable. She also found it necessary to retire to the Taitong.

About the time when Admiral Ito left the Matsushima the disorder in the Chinese fleet plainly indicated that the contest could not be prolonged on their side. Three ships had been sunk and a fourth, the Yang Wei, had been half destroyed and abandoned. Besides the Ting Yuen two others were on fire, and the entire force was thoroughly demoralized. A little after 5 o'clock the flagship took the lead in retreat toward the home stations. Four fast-steaming Japansee cruisers were detailed to follow, and if possible to cut off their escape. But the torpedoes had to be reckoned with, and the possibility of being struck by one of them in the night made it imperative that the Japanese should exercise caution. Morning found them at the mouth of the Gulf of Pechili, with no ship of the enemy in sight. They steamed back to Kaiyoto Island, keeping a keen lookout on the way, but the Chinese had evidently reached a safe place of refuge. The greater part of the Japanese squadron had reconvened near Taikosan Harbor, on the chance of getting another fight, bringing this time some torpedo boats to co-operate. The need of them was so greatly felt on the previous day that it is safe to say no large body of Japanese ships will ever again sail without these essential adjuncts. One of them was now put to a practical if somewhat inglorious use in breaking up the Yang Wei, deserted and unfit for further service.

Examination shows that none of the Japanese vessels received damages that cannot be repaired with slight cost or labor. All but the four referred to were so free from injury that they could have gone into action afresh the following day.

The loss of life was largest on the Matsushima. Her complement was 335. Four officers and thirty-three men were killed, and seventy officers and men wounded. The total losses were ten officers and sixty-nine men killed and 160 officers and men wounded.

General Count Ovama, Minister of War, has been relieved from the duties of his office and appointed commander-in-chief of the second army organized for serivce against China.

A notification has been issued by the Minister of War, calling attention to the principles of the Geneva Convention, to which Japan became a party in 1886, and admonishing the army that "however cruel and vindictive the enemy may show himself, he must nevertheless be treated in accordance with the acknowledged rules of civilization; his disabled succored, and his captured kindly and considerately protected." Also that "Gentle treatment is due to those who offer no resistance to our arms," and that "even the body of a dead foe should receive respect." Although China has not subscribed to the convention, and her soldiers may therefore behave inhumanly, no Japanese must retaliate, but "bear in mind the gracious benevolence of their august sovereign, and display charity as well as courage."

Prince Komatsu, just returned from America, will at once take active service as a Lieutenant in the Navy. Prince Kanni, another member of the Imperial family, is attached to the staff of General Yamagata in Corea.

Subscriptions to the war alone aggregated on September 25th 77,000,000 yen, 10,000 being applied for at a rate above par. The call was for only 30,000,000.

NOT UP IN THEOLOGY.

A very dear friend of the Saunterer has a most delightful way of sending him an occasional bit of pleasantry from far California, and as so many miles intervene between this end of the world and that, the latest arrival may have the semblance of newness.

Two little girls, one nine and the other six years of age, the daughters of a farmer, were amusing themselves with their books one Sabbath morning. The elder had taken her Bible and, turning to the New Testament, began to read aloud. When, after a few verses she came to something about the Pharisees, her smaller sister looked up and asked: "Say, Molly, what is Phariseeds, anyway?"

This was a puzzler, but Molly was equal to it. "Oh, they don't amount to much," she replied. "They're religious people, like Methodists and Presbyterians."

"Papa ain't one, is he? He ain't religious."

"No I heard mamma say he wasn't zackly a piller of the church. I don't know what he is."

Little Miss Six-year-old lost herself in thought for a moment. Suddenly her blue eyes brightened and she exclaimed, "I do."

"What is he?"

"Why, he's a hayseed. Tommy Toddles said so."—Boston Budget.

UNDER FOUR DECKS.

The Stokehole of a Large Ocean Steamship.

IN ALMOST SUFFOCATING HEAT.

Lower Regions of the Normannia Explored by a Woman—A German Correspondent's Daring Feat.

Down in the boiler room of a large ocean steamer, twenty-five feet under the water line, and ninety feet below the captain's bridge!

The great majority of the passengers, leisurely lounging or comfortably seated on deck watching the vast marine panorama all around them, have no conception of the scenes enacted deep down in the hold of the vessel, below the four decks. On no descendants of Adam has the curse of sin, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread," fallen more literally and severely in these latter days of science and progress than on the men who labor in the fire and engine-rooms of a modern steamer.

Ladies cannot easily be induced to undertake a tour of inspection of these infernally hot apartments of torture. Frau Helene Pichler, correspondent of "Zur Guten Stunde," partly out of curiosity and partly in order to save her readers the trouble of a personal examination, induced the second engineer of the Normannia on her last trip to guide her down the four steep hatchways into the very bottom of the ship. Following is her graphic description:

It is now two days ten hours and forty minutes since this wonderful exponent of modern naval architecture was set in motion, and we are cutting the blue waves of the Atlantic at a speed of twenty knots per hour. On the different decks of the steamer (there are four of them—the promenade, the upper, the main, and the lower deck) the most interesting and international life imaginable has developed itself.

Princes of finance and commerce, statesmen of note, celebrated artists and scholars, besides a whole army from the middle class of polyglot variety, keep things lively in the gorgeous saloons of the first cabin and on the two upper decks. There is but little difference between the first and second cabins; perhaps the rooms are a little more spacious and better furnished. And in the steerage everybody seems more than contented, for our proletarians do not usually enjoy such wholesome food and comfortable sleeping quarters on terra firma.

The Normannia is crowded with crew and passengers to her utmost capacity—300 in the first cabin, 200 in the second, 700 in the steerage, and 300 in the crew, in all 1,500 souls aboard.

It was a revelation to me to learn what an enormous amount of human and machine power is required to afford such a speedy and comfortable voyage.

Below deck! How do things look there? What forces are there at work? How do the men live who manipulate the machinery?

The engine? Our first inquiry of Enigneer Ackermann already betrays our ignorance. The noun of our interrogative should have been decidedly in the plural. There are not less than fifty-six engines in the prodigious hold of this ocean palace, which can work independently of one another. Of course there are only two main engines, on which the ship depends for propulsion. Only their great polished helms can be seen through the glass covering from the upper deck. Opening a small door and entering in the room immediately under the glass roof an almost unbearable heat overwhelms us. Looking down a hole, not more than a meter square, we are greeted by ear-deafening sounds of rattling chains and clattering iron, of brain-stunning thunders and shrieks, crashes and jerks.

If we would explore this magic domain we must descend through this hole down the steep hatchways. Engineer Ackermann counsels my husband to pull off his coat and roll up his pantaloons.

At me he looks with doubtful mien. "No lady has ever ventured below," he says. Besides, modern feminine attire would prove a bad impediment.

But I must, I will go along! How else would I be able to give a faihtful description to my readers? I lay aside my hat, remove my dress, and allow the stewardess to equip me "en deshabille."

Now for the infernal regions! We are each of us provided with two sweat cloths, the use of which we soon learn to appreciate. With one in each hand we cling to the iron bars of the steep stairs, which we find almost glowing hot through the cloths.

We are in the midst of a fearful noisy whirl. Arrived on the bridge between the large engines I am compelled to close my eyes, overwhelmed as I am by the rapid motion of the labyrinthian machinery. Lieutenant J. D. Kelly calls this region of the ship, "a twilight island of mysteries, a laboratory where grimy alchemists practice black magic and white." In his excellent depiction of the engine-room and stoke hole he says eloquently.

At first all seems confusion, but when the brain has co-ordinated certain factors, harmony is wooed from discord and order emerges from chaos. It is in the beginning all noise and tangled motion, and shining steel and noisome smells; then succeeds a vague sense of bars moving up and down and down and up with pitiless regularity; of jiggering levers, keeping time rythmically to any stray patter you may fit to their champing; and at last, the interdependence of rod grasping rod, of shooting straight lines seizing curved arms, of links limping backward and wriggling forward upon queer pivots, dawns upon you, and in the end you marvel at the nicety with which lever, weight, and fulcrum work, opening and closing hidden mechanisms, and functioning with in exactness, that dignifies the fraction of a second into an appreciable quantity. Cranks whirl and whirl and whirl incessantly, holding in marvelous grip the long shafting turning the churning screws; pumps pulsate and throb with muffled beat; gauge-arms vibrate jerkingly about narrow arcs, setting their standard of performance; and everywhere, if your ear be trained to this mechanical music, to this symphony in steam and steel, you see the officers and greasers conducting harmoniously the smoothly moving parts, as soothed with oil and caressed with waste they work without jar or friction, despite the gales and tossing the ship like a jolly-boat on the angry ocean. One may well wonder at the genius which, piling precedent upon precedent, chains these forces and makes them labor, even on an unstable platform, as their masters do.

The Normannia averages twenty knots per hour. For this speed the screw must make eighty-six revolutions per minute, or 5,160 revolutions per hour. Every revolution pushes this marine giant twenty-eight feet forward. The ship makes 2,408 feet per minute.

On the bridge between the two engines we are standing on the most interesting spot of the whole ship. From here the enignes are guided and regulated. Yonder pale individual, standing at the lever, and who has just greeted us without taking his eyes from his engine, has in reality the whole ship, with its town full of human life, under his control. He could therefore be held responsible for every soul aboard, were he not a sort of a machine himself. He dares not make a move without an order "from on high," namely, from the captain's bridge above, whose commands are telegraphically imparted on a large white dial near the engine, to which the attention of the engineer is called by a gong in the room.

The responsibility of this position is nevertheless great. At our question, whether it requires great strength to handle the lever, the enigneer smiles benignantly and allows me to press it down to a certian mark. I can move it without a muscular effort. At once the movement is slower, and we go at a rate of ten knots per hour. Another pressure of my hand and we regain our former speed at once.

But now we must descend furtber down into the suffocating rooms, no matter if we drown in perspiration and it becomes almost too hot to breathe. On all sides we espy in the demoniacal gloom dirt-wrapped figures in scanty attire, whose features are positively unrecognizable under the coal dust and machine grime.

Back of the two main engines is a large electric plant, which furnishes 1,000 arc light aboard and eight immense reflectors for night work. Before we inspect these we are asked to leave our watches behind, as a contact with the electric fluid would spoil them for the rest of our voyage. Then there are the numerous smaller engines for ventilating the rooms, pumping water—drinking and boiled water—for 1,500 persons, etc., it would be impossible to even enumerate all the engines in this brief sketch.

Now, down in the stoke-hole, down another hatchway. Heavens, how infernally hot it is here! A gloomy darkness all around us! A small flame here and there to mark out the way. We are really below the great boilers, and were it not for the fiery eyes that constantly open and close, we would be in total darkness. They are the furnace doors, opened and closed by the firemen. We are as far down as we can penetrate, and if the roaring fire and great engines would be silent, we would be able to hear the water rush beneath our feet. Of the stoke-hole the writer above quoted remarks:

Under the splintering silver of the electric lamps cones of light illuminate great spaces garishly and leave others in unbroken masses of shadow. Through bulkhead doors the red and gold of the furnaces checker the reeking floor, and the tremulous roar of the caged fires dominates the sibilant splutter of the stream. Cyclopic figures nearly naked, gritty and black with coal and ashes, and soaked with sweat come and go in the blazing light and in the half gloom and seem like nightmares from fantastic tales of demonology.

Whew! I am glad to hear my husband propose to return to the upper deck. Oh, for an elevator, instead of having to climb these steep hatchways; a light task for a fireman, but not for a woman.

On my way up I am shown the bunks of the men, and watch some of them at their ablutions in the forecastle, after four hours of the hardest labor in the world.

They cannot endure longer hours, and then live a short life.

I never appreciated the fresh ocean breeze and ice-cold glass of ale so much in all my life, as when we had emerged from those suffocating dungeons.—Chicago Inter-Ocean.

Alva Johnson was arrestsed again at Los Angeles the other night and lodged in jail on a charge of being one of the men who ditched and robbed the overland train at Roscoe, on the Southern Pacific Road, on the night of February 16th. Charles Etzler, who was arrested in Arizona, and who is supposed to have given his accomplices away is believed to have faked the whole story.

Little Frank had long importuned his father to buy him a pony. At last papa said: "If I were to get you a pony, Frank, you wouldn't know what to feed him." "O, yes I would, papa, replied the boy. "I'd feed him on horseradish."—Pittsburg Chronicle.

FEMALE PORTERS.

The Native African Women Carry Huge Loads.

PHYSICAL VIGOR AND STAMINA.

Woman Deterioate More Rapidly Than Man in a State of High Civilization. The Law of Nature.

In numerous savage countries the greater portion of the hard work is performed by women, and travelers assure us that, in some parts of Africa at least, the women are quite as well developed and as strong in body as the men. Works of foreign travel often picture native African women carrying huge loads upon their heads and shoulders. To the student of anthropometry or physical culture, the figures of these athletic women are an interesting study, indicating, as they do, a degree of physical vigor and stamina which is rarely met with among their sisters of civilized lands. The great disparity in strength which exists between men and women in civilized countries, amounting to a difference of several inches in height and to more than fifty per cent. in strength, has given rise to the belief that woman is naturally much inferior to man in strength and endurance—a belief which has come to be so universally accepted that the term "weaker vessel" is not infrequently used as a synonym for woman.

That this is really an unnatural state, resulting from the artificial conditions of our modern civilization, is clearly demonstrated by the vigorous development of the natives of Central Africa and many other portions of the savage world. Stanley tells us that he found the two hundred women who served him as porters on one of his expeditions in Africa the best porters he ever employed, and numerous other travelers have borne a like testimony. Woman deteriorates more rapidly than man in a state of high civilization, for the reason that upon her, more heavily than upon man, fall the degenerating influences imposed by the conditions of civilized life. The highly cultivated civilized woman, surrounded by all the conveniences and luxuries which wealth can supply, finds little occasion for muscular exertion. In consequence, that inexorable law of nature which punishes idleness with death, visits upon her the penalty for her neglect of active muscular exercise in placing upon her the stamp of physical inferiority.

That civilized women are capable of acquiring vigorous muscular development is evidenced by the occasional instances in which women born in civilization have from early childhood accustomed themselves to muscular pursuits. A conspicuous example of this sort is now before the public in the person of Miss Beckwith, of London, who, a few years ago, executed the daring feat of swimming across the English Channel in competition with two male champion swimmers, one of whom was Captain Webb. She came out second best in the contest, arriving only a few minutes behind Captain Webb, but a head of her other competitor, having accomplished the arduous task in fourteen hours and a few minutes. Although so long in the water, she was not seriously exhausted, and suffered no injury whatever from her exploit.

Numerous other examples might be cited. Civilized woman is weak simply because she neglects to develop her muscles. This is especially true of American women, who are, as a class, probably the weakest women in the world. A national reform is needed. The public school is a good place for such a reform to begin. A gymnasium for girls ought to be attached to every public school and to every young ladies' seminary in the United States. Under the care of skilled trainers, the girls and women of the present generation might easily make such an advance in development as to become physically far superior to their mothers or grandmothers, notwithstanding the fact that the average young woman of the present day has much less endurance than the average woman of the generation which is just passing away. But to become strong, women must shake off the trammels of conventionalism in dress, and must set themselves to disprove those traditions which have come down from the sentimental chivalry of mediaeval times, which stamp woman as the weaker vessel, and must give to the building up of their bodies a large part of the effort which is now bestowed upon accomplishments.—Good Health.

A SAD EXPERIENCE.

It was during the progress of the picnic given in Jurnigan's Grove by the Methodist Sabbath school, of Hawville, Oklahoma. Alkali Ike, who sings bass in the choir, and Miss Lillie Cusack, the soprano, had wandered a short distance from the scene of festivities and seated themselves on a moss-covered log which lay at the foot of a tall tree.

The gallant's arm had strayed around the maidens' slender waist and lingered there, apparently to the profound satisfaction of both persons, and Isaac had asked, for the sixteenth time:

"Does oo love me, Lillie?"

"Course I do!" replied the maid, snuggling closer to him. I love you gooder than any—Oh, mercy! I do believe there is some kind of a horrid animal up in this tree!"

"We'll soon see!" remarked Ike, grimly, at the same time drawing his revolver and firing a few shots into the foilage above. "I'll stir the varmint up a little, anyhow."

At that instant, a reproachful voice was heard proceeding from the canopy of leaves above their heads:

"How long, oh Lord? How long?"

"What the dev—. That is, who are you?" demanded Ike.

"All that remains of Hercules P. Smith," was the reply. "I was in swimming before the picknickers came, and a cow ate up most of my clothes before I noticed her. I chased her through a blackberry tangle and then a stray dog, that appeared to be mad, chased me back again. Then the coming of the Sabbath-school drove me up this tree, and here I have been ever since, with a hornet's nest on one bough and a snake on another. And now you are trying to finish the job by assassinating me."

"Why didn't you come down before?"

"Well, you see, I happen to be engaged myself to Miss Cusack, whom you are hugging."—Life.

THE RICE-PAPER TREE.

The rice-paper tree, one of the most interesting of the entire flora of China, has recently been successfully experimented with in Florida, where it now flourishes with other subtropical and oriental species of trees and shrubs. When first transplanted in American soil the experimenters expressed doubts of its hardiness, fearing that it would be unable to stand the winters. All these fears have vanished, however, and it is now the universal opinion that it is as well adapted to the climate of this country as to that of the famed flowery kingdom.

It is a small tree, growing to a height of less than fifteen feet, and with a trunk or stem from three to five inches in diameter. Its canes, which vary in color according to season, are large, soft and downy—the form somewhat resembling that noticed in those of the castor-bean plant.

The celebrated rice-paper, the product of this queer tree, is formed of thin slices of the pith, which is taken from the body of the tree in beautiful cylinders, several inches in length.

The Chinese workmen apply the blade of a sharp, straight knife to these cylinders, and turning them around either by rude machinery or by hand (in which latter operation they display much skill and dexterity), pare the pith from circumference to center. This operation makes a roll of extra quality paper, the scroll being of equal thickness throughout. After a cylinder has thus been pared it is unrolled and weights placed upon it until the surface is rendered uniformly smooth throughout its entire length. It is altogether probable that if rice-paper making becomes an industry in the United States, these primitive modes of manufacture will all be done way with.

RROTECTION OF FRUIT IN TRANSIT.

A bulletin which has just been sent out by Professor Mark W. Harrington, Chief of the Weather Bureau, gives the opinions gathered from many shippers of perishable products throughout the country in relation to the proper protection of fruits and vegetables by heat and cold during transportation. These men generally concur in the statement that the danger in transportation from freezing has been eliminated by modern methods. The so-called lined car, which has a partition of tongued and grooved boards at the sides and ends, placed so as to leave an air space of about four inches, answers for spring and autumn and during most winter weather, while the Eastman heating car in extreme weather has proved a perfect protection. Perishable goods can be shipped with safety in ordinary freight cars when the outside temperature is twenty degrees Fahrenheit, and in refrigerator cars when it is ten degrees. Fruit wrapped in heavy brown paper will endure fifteen degrees more cold than if it is not so wrapped. Dampness is very injurious, and products which are shipped in a dry condition can endure a much lower degree of temperature without injury than under moist conditions. It should always be remembered that the kind of packing which keeps out the cold will keep in the heat, so that there is often more danger from heating by process of decomposition than from injury by the cold. When a north wind is blowing on the prairie, cars which contain fruit are often covered with canvas on the north side. Oranges that have been frozen may be thawed without injury by putting them in cold water or in tight barrels immediately after arriving, allowing them to thaw out gradually. These are some of the points picked almost at random from what is altogether a most instructive circular.

TREES IN A COAL VEIN.

A short time ago, it is stated in an English exchange, pieces of resin and wood were found in the coal vein at Newcastle, 2,000 feet under ground, and now the miners are at work getting out a tree, for there is a perfectly-formed fir log lying embedded in rock and coal over one-third of a mile under the surface of the earth. The bark is probably six or seven inches thick, and the peculiar characteristic marks of fir bark show very plainly. The specimens of the wood are even more clearly marked by the annual layers and wood fibers, and though of solid rock, look so natural that they appear as if they would readily yield to a pin stuck against them. In the coal crevasses near by are found great quantities of resin, as beautifully clear and amber-colored as if it had been picked from a standing tree. There is no telling how long that log of rock is, but its diameter shows that it must have been twenty-four inches through the wood, and must, therefore, have been originally one hundred and fifty feet in height. It is probable that a piece not larger than a ton or two will be raised to the suace, but the miners are at work getting out as large a piece as possible. The log in places is coated with a white incrustation of limetsone.

OLD BABYLON.

Progress of Exploration Under Dr. Peters' Direction.

BABYLONIAN EXPORATION FUND.

Conditions Surrounding Our Race 4,000 Years B. C.—What was Found Sixty Feet Below the Surface.

United States Minister Terrell, at Constantinople, has made a report to the State Department giving the results of the scientific explorations of the ruins of Niffer, near ancient Babylon, which were begun and which are being continued under the direction of American scientists. The expenses have been defrayed by the "Babylonian Exploration fund," which was formed by gentlemen in Philadelphia in 1888. The work of excavating began in 1887, and, except at occasional intervals, has been actively continued. Dr. Peters and Professor Hilpricht of the University of Pennsylvania supervised the work in the begining.

It is now being conducted under the direction of Dr. Peters, a citizen of the United States. The extent of the work has been such that from 150 to 250 Arabs are continuously employed. Dr. Hilpricht, the distinguished Assyrian scholar of the University of Pennsylvania, is remaining at the Museum of Contsantinople at the request of the Turkish Government to translate inscriptions and arrange the tablets, inscribed bowls and vases, used from 1,000 to 4,000 years before the birth of Christ. Many tons of tablets, vases, inscribed brick, sarcophagi and the like have already arrived at that museum.

Mr. Terrell says that this enterprise has revealed an antiquity of the human race nearly ten centuries older than science had knowledge of before.

"The religion, government, habits of life and, to a great extent, the customs of men who lived 4,000 years before Christ," says Mr. Terrell, "are revealed by the inscriptions which are now being translated here (Constantinople) and arranged by Professor Hilpricht. The worship of one god Bel), who was vested with sensual and revolting attributes, is more clearly known, and the extent and arrangement of his immense temple are now revealed.

"Thus far 20,000 inscribed tablets of clay and of stone have been discovered. On these are inscribed promises to pay debts, deeds, contracts and a record of all important public and private events. These are more than all the museums of the world possessed before. They have also found hundreds of Babylonian seal cylinders, many gold and silver ornaments worn thousands of years ago by the inhabitants of the region between the Tigris and Euphrates. Instruments and household implements in iron, bronze and clay were discovered, which illustrates the conditions surrounding our race 4,000 B. C.

"The temple of Bel, I am informed, is now being dug around and laid bare, and when finished will be the first temple of Bel ever systematically excavated. With over 200 Arabs, its colossal walls, containing 130 rooms, have been laid bare. Its slaughter-house, altars, tablets, archives in stone and treasure-house have also been revealed. The excavation extended down forty-two feet below the surface to the foundation of the immense temple. Nine sarcophagi have been exhumed and transplanted entire to the museum in Constantinople. Very many crumbled when first exposed to atmospheric influence.

"It is estimated that it will require sixty volumes to contain all the valuable cuniform texts and their translations, with philological, archaeological and historical essays, with a description of Niffer, the customs of its people, their religion and their social and political life.

"I am assured by American professors here that the scientific world now owes its oldest Semitic texts to this expedition, and that they found, over sixty feet below the surface of the earth, evidences that Niffer was 1,000 years older than scientists had believed formerly. I am also informed that of the 125 Babylonian kings, whose names and era are known, eighty were found described on tablets excavated by this American enterprise.

"The use of glass made in Niffer to imitate lapis lazuli existed 1400 B. C. The list of Babylonian rulers from 2300 B. C. to the fall of Babylon (538 B. C.) has been made known by this expedition, and now we are able, for the first time, to lay a solid foundation for determining the age of undated tablets from paleography. I feel that the enterprise and intelligence of our scholars and public-spirited citizens in so distant a field as Niffer and the valuable discoveries made of the earliest history of our race deserve more than a passing notice."—Washington Star.

A mysterious plague has suddenly broken out and about Wardner, in the Cœur d'Alene mining country, and within the last few days several hundred people have been stricken, most of whom are miners. The resident physicians are baffled as to the origin or nature of the epidemic and physicians have been called to Wardner from Spokane for consultation. No one has died from the strange disease.

A little Buffalo girl was not feeling well and her parents suggested she might be about to have the chicken-pox, then prevalent. She went to bed laughing at the idea; but early next morning she went into her parents room, looking very serious, and said: "Yes, it is chicken-pox, papa; I found a feather in the bed.

Arthur McEwen said in a recent issue of his Letter: "The disscussion of the single tax by the press must be reached ere long. It is sound in theory and whatever is sound in thoery is sure, sooner or later, to receive respectful consideration. The single tax goes far deeper than either the financial or the rail-road question, for it attacks the social problem at its root."

It look now as if young Campbell has got the state university where the hair is short. The gentle savages of that institution shaved one side of the Campbell "think tank" and Campbell complemented the joke by shaving the other side, after which he "had his picture taken" and inscribed: "This is the result of the highest education attainable in the curriculum of California's boasted institution of learning." The "heft" of the ridicule appears to be on the academic aborigines.

It was not anticipated that the bankers would agree with President Cleveland's financial opinions as enunciated in his message. Pawnbroker's do not generally favor laws restricting the usury of their trade. Particularly obnoxious, it appears, is Mr. Cleveland's suggestion that national bank bonds be abolished, and that each bank deposit with the government 30 per cent of circulation as a protection to the gold reserve. Such an arrangement is altogether too popular in its effects to be popular with the money lenders.

With few exceptions, the press of the State and coast upholds and endorses the action and sentiments of the recent California Miners' Convention. A few of the valley papers which are opposition to the efforts of the many to promote the general prosperity of the State argue against the proposed aid to build restraining dams, but the great heart of the public beats in sympathy with any and all effort to produce greater yields of that which benefits all alike, when, too, the effort is with careful regard to the rights of all.

Prices of products still continue to fall and so does the price of silver, yet the monometallists persist in asserting that this concurrent downward movement is merely a coincidence, and not a case of cause and effect. A coincidence which persists in manifesting itself during a period of twenty-one years, almost without interruption, must be regarded as something extraordinary, but the goldbugs declare that there is nothing remarkeble about it—that is, not remarkable enough to warrant the legislative powers of the world attempting to put an end to the decline complained of.

It is with pleasurable emotion that the friends of George C. Perkins learn that Collis P. Huntington, of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, is opposed to that gentleman's election to the United States senate. The relations between Senator Perkins and Uncle Collis have never been intimate and only their commercial affiliations might have acted favorably to the "magnate's" schemes in influencing the senator. Now it is authoritatively announced that Senator Perkins is in no way tainted by the "support" of Huntington, and his prospects of succeeding himself are resolving into a certainty.

Although nine-tenths of the silver bullion annually put upon the market is produced in the United States the price of bar silver, which controls the world's market is fixed in London. The nations which buy silver largely are India, China and Japan. They make their purchases in London. A syndicate has been formed in this country which will attempt to dispose of the silver produced in the United States and Mexico through a central committee in New York. It is thought that Eastern buyers can be induced to make their purchases in New York instead of London, and that the ruling price of silver throughout the world will hereafter be fixed by the New York market. A member of the syndicate believes the new arrangement will cause a slight advance in the price of silver. The experiment will be watched with great interest.

ROYALTY AND THE LAW.

The Queen of England and Her Son as Candidates For the Criminal Dock.

The bazaar in aid of the fund for rebuilding the Crathie church, near Balmoral, was held under the patronage of the queen, who also gave two plaited straw baskets made by her own royal hands. These precious presents were naturally made much of, and with the queen's approval were disposed of by a raffle, although the gaming laws distinctly specify raffling as illegal. The question arises, Has her majesty, by aiding and abetting it, made herself liable to prosecution before a magistrate? Lawyers have no doubt about it, but it does not follow that the law will be set in motion. The British constitution would scarcely survive the shock of the spectacle of the empress-queen in a criminal dock and possibly fined 40 shillings or a month at hard labor.

But while nobody is disposed to take action against the queen for conniving at a mild form of gambling plenty of people would not be sorry to see her son, lieutenant general, his royal highness the Duke of Connaught, tried by court martial for risking the lives of the men under his command. The duke is commander in chief of the Aldershot district. On Wednesday he and his wife went to the military balloon ground in order to christen a new balloon to be named after the duchess. The weather had been threatening thunderstorms, and the atmosphere was heavily charged with electricity. Nevertheless it would never do to disappoint the duchess. So, just as the storm was about to break, the balloon was sent up 300 feet and anchored by a steel rope held by three sappers. The result, as might have been expected, was that the lightning struck the balloon, rushed down the steel conductor and horribly mangled the unfortunate sappers. The question every one asked is why the ceremony was not postponed, seeing that danger was palpable to the meanest understanding. The demand for a court martial is very general and will probably be acceded to, but it may be safely predicted that the prisoner will not be the general commanding, but some inferior officer.—London Cor. BLASTING THE PALISADES.

Contractors Destroying Their Beauty to Get Out Granite Blocks.

Until comparatively recently the Palisades escaped the ruthless hands of contractors and quarrymen, despite the fact that there are few spots in the country where richer deposits of granite are to be found. A few quarries within the last five years have sprung up at Fort Lee, but they have all been located away back from the Palisades, and the front of these beautiful hills have been unmolested. Now, however, a firm of contractors, by exploding dynamite, 3,000 pounds at a time, is gradually making huge excavations in front of the Palisades, which will in the course of a very few months transform the historic Palisades from things of beauty to ordinary stone quarries.

Nothing that the lovers of natural scenery can do will in any way stop the destructive work from going on. The Palisades are private property, and that part of them which is at present being torn open by high explosives has been leased by the owners to contractors, whose love of the beautiful pales into insignificance beside their business instinct.

Aside from the destruction of the Palisades, the work going on in the quarries at Fort Lee is of moment on account of the enormous amount of dynamite which is being exploded there. People marveled at the explosion of 500 pounds of dynamite in a projectile thrown by a pneumatic gun at Sandy Hook some weeks ago. Six times that much was exploded at Fort Lee on Thursday at noon and again on Friday at the same hour, and although it was not thrown from a gun neither did it explode in the water, but in a solid bed of granite. The terrific force of these two explosions cannot be imagined by anybody who was not in Fort Lee to hear them, or who has not since visited the quarries to see their effect. The little village of Fort Lee shook as though an earthquake had visited it, and strangers in the place who were unaware that blasting was going on in the vicinity were firmly convinced that some convulsion of nature had occurred.—New York Sun.

The Fires Will Make Work For Many.

"What is the probable loss from the fire on pine stumpage throughout the state?" was asked of a leading logger.

"The loss is in one sense nominal," replied he. "You understand, fire does not burn the body of a pine tree. It only burns off the bark and foliage. The trunk of the burned tree is as good as ever it was, with this exception—the tree, after it is burned, must be cut the succeeding winter, else it will become worm eaten and worthless.

"This fire is a blessing in disguise to labor. Every owner of burned pine stumpage must go to work this coming winter and cut every foot of it, and many of these owners are forced to cut perhaps hundreds of millions of feet of stumpage they would not otherwise have cut for years to come. They are, you see, forced to employ immense crews of men they would not otherwise have had use for."—St. Paul Globe.

The Gracious Czar.

The czar has just issued his approval of the institution of dueling in the army. The commander in chief at Kiev, in issuing the new dueling code, says: "The czar has conferred upon us a new mark of his imperial grace in granting us the right to defend with arms in our hands that which is most precious to all of us—our honor. This gracious act on the part of his majesty makes it our duty, still more than heretofore, so to regulate our conduct and manners alike in official and social intercourse as to obviate all inimical misunderstandings and frivolous quarrels."—Moscow Letter.

ME'S A FIGHTER FROM WAY BACK.

To Land the Mackinaw Trout There Must Be Stout Tackle and No Slack Line.

"If the Mackinaw trout could be fished for with a light rod and tackle, as salmon are," said a New Yorker who has tried those game Lake Michigan fish, "the title of the salmon as king of game fish would fall at once. The Mackinaw trout is stronger than the salmon of greater average weight, equally taciful and as fierce a fighter as that Goliath of fresh water fish, the muskellunge. A bout with one of the trout at the end of a hundred feet of line on a supple split bamboo rod would give the sturdiest salmon fisherman enough of hard and exciting work to satisfy him for the day. Eighteen, 20 and even 25 pounders are by no means uncommon, and 30 pounders excite no more than ordinary comment.

"But the Mackinaw trout, like the salmon trout of the New York lakes, isn't built for fine tackle, and if you want him you must work the oars of a boat faithfully and trail your whirling troll at the end of 200 or 300 feet of heavy line in from 50 to 100 feet of water. Sometimes the fisherman ties his line to his leg as he rows his boat, but the usual style is to hold it in his mouth—that is, if he is fishing for trout anywhere on the lake but Traverse bay.

"From time out of mind Mackinaw trout have been fished for in Lake Michigan with a slender, minnow shaped troll, so made that it will whirl rapidly when drawn through the water and fastened to a staring white line as big around as a lead pencil. A good many fishermen had held for years that this trolling line was a detriment to fishing, as it acted as a menace to the trout, which are shy and wary, and that with a line less in evidence in the clear waters of the lake greater success would attend the sport of Mackinaw trout fishing. But no one seemed courageous enough to try any other kind of a line until a few years ago, when a citizen of Traverse City, who was not a fisherman, made up his mind that he knew how more and bigger trout could be caught, and he went fishing one day with a fine copper wire for his line instead of the staring white twine of the fathers. This wire was absolutely invisible in the water, and when let out with the troll carried no suspicion to the Mackinaw trout's watchful eye. The result was that this citizen came ashore with a boatload of the biggest Mackinaw trout any one had ever seen in one lot from Traverse bay. Since then the fishermen in that part have adopted the copper wire for a trolling line, but elsewhere on the lake the hidebound old sportsmen stick to tradition and white twine.

"There is no mistaking the strike of a Mackinaw trout on the troll, and the instant he makes it all other business must be subordinated to that of getting him safe into the boat. In the expressive and comprehensive parlance of the Lake Michigan fishermen, 'You've got to keep a Mackinaw trout a-goin.' It is no easy matter to keep a 15 or 20 pound Mackinaw trout going, and the inexperienced angler will find that the first thing he knows the trout will be 'keepin him a-goin.' If the big fish gets the least bit of slack line, he will turn and dash away, sometimes actually pulling the boat around, if not towing it. Once headed away from the fisherman, this game and lusty fish rarely fails to break the hold of the hook. The angler who can keep his trout going as he hauls in the line hand over hand may get his prize alongside or within spearing or shooting distance in the course of 15 or 20 minutes.

"The Mackinaw trout fishermen never take the risk even of gaffing a big trout. Indeed some carry revolvers of large caliber, and when the trout is hauled alongside the boat or within safe range they shoot it in the head and put the fight beyond all question. Others spear their catches with long handed, sharp tined gigs."—New York Sun.

Whittier and His Mother.

The poet Whittier was a grave Quaker and a tender hearted man, but he told this amusing story of his mother's voyage by steamer to Portland:

"My mother," he said, "was not used to traveling by water, and she had a new Quaker bonnet made to go on her journey. When we were well out at sea, she became very uncomfortable and took off her new bonnet and placed it on a chair beside her.

"Her discomfort increased. She changed her position and sat down on the new bonnet. Thee knows Quaker bonnets won't bear sitting on. This was too much for the good woman, and she said:

"'John, I want thee to take me right home.'

"'But, mother, we are way out to sea. I can't take thee home.'

"'Can't thee get the boat to turn round? I feel very sick, and my new bunnit will never do to wear to Friend Smith's in Portland.'

"'No, mother; thee'll have to make the best of it now.'

"'Oh, John, thee must never take me again on the water. I do' know as I shall live to get home.'"—Youth's Companion.

Odd Receptacle For Gold.

One of the most interesting curios in the collection of valuables at the mint is a queerly contrived bamboo tube that once contained a small consignment of gold from far off Madagascar. "The gold was mined and smelted and done up for shipment by natives," said Registrar of Deposits J. Robley Dunglison, "and was the brightest gold ever received at the mint. They took a piece of bamboo about 6 inches long and 2 inches in diameter and polished the outside till it was smooth as glass. Then they put a wooden cork in one end and poured in the melted gold and corked up the other end. In this queer receptacle the precious metal was safely brought all the way to America and finally found its way into the mint."—Philadelphia Record.

The Record Price For Pictures.

Eleven thousand guineas (something over $55,000) is now the record price paid in an auction room in London for a picture. This amount was realized at Christie's for Sir Joshua Reynolds' portrait of Lady Betty Delmse, sister of the Earl of Carlisle, with her children, a picture which is well known through engravings. It was put up at 5,000 guineas and was secured by Charles Wertheimer, a dealer, for 11,000 guineas.—London Standard.

Order of Adjudication of Insolvency.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE County of Inyo, State of California.

Pierre Beyeye and Francois Hagata, Co-partners under the firm name of P. Beyeye & Co., Insolvent Debtors.

Pierre Beyeye and Francois Hagata, Copartners under the firm name of P. Beyeye & Co., having filed in this Court their petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, from which it appears that they are insolvent debtors, the said Pierre Beyeye and Francois Hagata, Co-partners under the firm name of P. Beyeye & Co., are hereby declared to be insolvent. It is hereby ordered that the Sheriff of the said County of Inyo be, and he is hereby appointed Receiver of the property of said insolvents and that upon his giving a bond to the people of the State of California, conditioned as required by law, and in such sum as the Court may order, and qualifying, he take charge and possession of all the estate, real and personal, of said insolvent debtors, whatsoever and wheresoever situate, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all their deeds, vouchers, books of account and papers; and to keep and care for and dispose of the same until the appointment of an Assignee of their estate. All persons having the same or any part thereof in his or their possession are hereby directed to deliver said property to said Receiver, and all persons owing money to said insolvents, or either of them, are hereby directed to pay the same to said Receiver, and that said Receiver keep said property, or the proceeds thereof, till the further order of this Court. And all persons are hereby forbidden to pay any debts to said insolvents, or to deliver any property belonging to such insolvents, or either of them, to him or them, or any person, firm, corporation or association for their use, and the said debtors are hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered.

It is further ordered, that all the creditors of said debtors be and appear before the Hon. Geo. M. Gill, Judge of the Superior Court of the said County of Inyo, in open court at the court room of said court in the town of Independence, in said County of Inyo, on the 22nd day of December, 1894, at 10 o'clock a. m. of that day, to prove their debts and choose one or more assignees of the estates of said debtors. It is further ordered, that this order be published in the Inyo Independent, a newspaper of general circulation, published in the County of Inyo, as often as the said paper is published before the day set for the meeting of creditors.

And it is further ordered, that in the mean time all proceedings against the said debtors be stayed.

Dated November 14th, 1894.

GEO. M. GILL,
Judge of the Superior Court.

The Hines case was called at 10 o'clock a. m. and Volney P. Goodale was sworn and examined for the prosecution. Upon motion of the District Attorney it was ordered that the County Surveyor present a map of the ground on which the affray occurred. Witness Goodale was cross examined by the defense This consumed the entire day and the case was continued until this morning.

This morning the examination of Volney Goodale was resumed and occupied all the morning, his testimony being concluded at noon.

The Boundary Line

The S. F. Examiner of the 30th ult. says that the party engaged in surveying the boundary line between California and Nevada during the past season has arrived in San Francisco and reports satisfactory progress, considering the shortness of the time allowed for work. There were 12 persons in the party. So far as the line has been run, some 115 miles, the result is that California and Nevada have both equally gained and lost territory in that distance, but if the line continues to run as at present California will be the sufferer, but there is nothing so uncertain as surveying, and W. B. Fairfield, who has charge of the corps, will not hazard a guess as to what the future may bring forth. The point the survey has reached is in the desert, and the next seasons work will be accompanied by more hardships than that which has just been finished. It will be necessary to go into the Amargosa desert, touch Death Valley and traverse regions where water cannot be found. So far, this new survey has not benefited Mono county, but, on the contrary, it has lost some of its territory, but Alpine county has gained a little territory, but neither State has gained enough to pay for the running of the new boundary line.

After a steady storm for eleven days, during which a vast amount of snow has piled up in the mountains, the weather cleared off delightfully this morning. The prospects are good for beautiful weather during the holidays.

UNITED STATES LAND OFFICE,
INDEPENDENCE, CAL.,
November 28, 1894.

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN:

Notice is hereby given that the Southern Pacific R. R. Co. (Main Line) has filed in this office a list of land situated in the townships described below and has applied for a patent for said lands; that the list is open to the public for inspection, and a copy thereof, by descriptive subdivisions, has been posted in a convenient place in this office for the inspection of all persons interested and the public generally.

Within the next sixty days following the date of this notice, protests or contests against the claim of the company to any tract or subdivision described in the list, on the ground that the same is more valuable for mineral than agricultural purposes, will be received and noted for report to the General Land Office at Washington, D. Splendid Tribute

THE SAN FRANCISCO BOARD OF HEALTH

URGES THE USE OF THE Royal Baking Powder.

The magnificent tribute of the San Francisco Board of Health to the great purity and wholesomeness of the Royal Baking Powder greatly disturbs the manufacturers of the lower grade powders. Their envious publications, however, cannot break the force of this unsolicited and unbiassed high medical endorsement. Attached is a certified copy of their original report, with the signatures of the members of the Board in fac-simile:

We, the members of The Board of Health of the City and County of San Francisco, cordially approve and recommend the Royal Baking Powder. It is absolutely pure and healthful, composed of the best ingredients of the highest strength and character.

In our judgment it is impossible to make a purer or stronger Baking Powder than the "Royal."

She Knew What to Do.

Mrs. Swisshelm, writing of her experience as a nurse in army hospitals, tells this story:

I was passing through one of the wards when I came upon a young Philadelphia zouave in a perfect paroxysm of anguish. Three nurses stood around him, and to my inquiry, "What is the matter?" they replied by dumb show that coming death was the matter, and that all would soon be over, while in words they told me that he had not slept for forty-eight hours.

I had one of them place a chair for me, sat down, and with my long, thin hands grasped the thigh stump, which was making all the trouble, drew and pressed the muscles into a natural, easy position, cooed and talked and comforted the sufferer as I should have done a sick baby, and in ten minutes he was asleep.

Then I whispered to the nurses to bring cotton and oakum and little cushions, made them put the cotton and oakum in small tufts to my index finger, and while I crooned my directions in a sing song, lullaby air, I worked in this support, gradually and imperceptibly withdrawing my hands until I could substitute the little cushions for the force by which I had been holding the muscles in proper position. This done, my boy soldier slept as sweetly as he ever had done in his crib.

The next morning a nurse came running for me to hurry to him. He had slept for six hours, waked, had his breakfast and had his wound dressed, and now the pain was back as bad as ever. I went, fixed the mangled muscle with reference to his change of position, made a half mold to hold it there, and before I had finished he began an eight hour sleep.

Ten days afterward he was sent home to his mother, and I heard of him no more.

False Hair in Elizabeth's Time.

Queen Elizabeth had eighty wigs in her collection, and her cousin, Mary Queen of Scots, had "as many as a hundred," and among the incongruous presents made her while confined a prisoner in gloomy Lochleven, previous to her being beheaded, wigs were numerous! Gentlemen who particularly wished to please their lady friends presented them with wigs of the latest shade of hair and newest style of coiffuring. Fancy a gentleman of today presenting his sweetheart the newest thing in ventilated bangs or the last idea in back hair.

Good Connections.

Patchem—I hear that the executed man was quite well connected.

Slashem—Quite right. The electric circuit was very complete.

The official reports show that no baking powder received an award over the Royal at the Chicago World's Fair.

The judge of awards on baking powder, Dr. H. W. Wiley, writes that the claim of another copmany to having received the highest award is false; that no such award was given to it.

The Royal Baking Powder is the purest and strongest baking powder made, and has received the highest award at every fair, wherever exhibited in competition with others.

WOMEN MORE TACTFUL THAN MEN.

At Least That Was the Consensus of Opinion at a Brooklyn Reception.

"Do women lack tact?" Mrs. Frank Leslie-Wilde was asked by a Brooklyn woman while visiting at the latter's house in Washington park recently.

"Why, my dear, what a foolish question," replied Mrs. Wilde. "That is, I do not mean you are foolish to ask the question, but such an admission is a reflection on the sex as a whole. As you know I have just returned from abroad. While at Trouville I met a young American and his wife. I knew the wife quite well. In fact she had been a seamstress for me, and the man she married was one of Philadelphia's Hundred and Fifty. Being a clever and a pretty woman, and having met her husband in the regular way, she had caught him, although he was was unaware of her social position. I met them on the promenade, and could hardly disguise my surprise when the girl was introduced by the Philadelphian as his wife. Perhaps had the girl not been so clever I might have made a blunder.

"Here is what she said to me even before I had a chance to catch my breath: 'Dear, dear Mrs. Leslie, I am so glad to see you. We need no introduction. What a delightful time I had at your house in New York the last time you were so good as to entertain me! Pray tell me how are ——?' mentioning the names of friends of mine in New York, and then without giving me time to reply said, 'We would like to stay and talk with you ever so much, but have a pressing engagement,' and with this my friend's pretty wife grasped her husband's arm and pulled him away. While the whole proceeding may be looked upon as one in which assurance played a prominent part, the wife displayed a tact that to me was charming. I do not mean to infer that she was not good enough for her husband. She was fearful that in an unguarded moment I might say something that would give him an idea into the true state of affairs."

There were other women in the party, one the wife of a well known general who had this story to tell: "I know one of the most charming and beautiful of women. She has not been married long, but has one great fault—a lack of civility to her husband's friends. In fact she has been so uncivil to a dozen or more of them that now the poor fellow has to go out to find them, whereas formerly they visited him and often spent the evening at home. In this way the wife is deprived of her husband's society as well as that of his jolly companions. She is also careful that her husband shall not meet any of her women friends, and perhaps in this she is right. Tact is more valuable to a woman than to a man, bnt nowhere is it more indispensable than in the home."

And so the talk passed around the circle with the consensus of opinion that women are the superiors of men in point of tact.—Brooklyn Eagle.

Assuming Husbands' Names.

The practice of the wife assuming the husband's name at marriage, according to Dr. Brower, originated from a Roman custom and became the common custom after the Roman occupation. Thus Julia and Octavia, married to Pompey and Cicero, were called by the Romans Julia of Pompey, Octavia of Cicero, and in latter times married women in most European countries signed their names in the same manner, but omitted the "of." Against this view may be mentioned that during the Sixteenth and even at the beginning of the Seventeenth century the usage seems doubtful, since we find Catharine Parr so signing herself after she had been twice married, and we always hear of Lady Jane Gray (not Dudley), Arabella Stuart (not Seymour), etc.

Some persons think that the custom originated from the Scriptural teaching that husband and wife are one.

This was the rule of law so far back as Bracton (died 1268), and it was decided in the case of Bon versus Smith, in the reign of Elizabeth, that a woman by marriage loses her former name and legally receives the name of her husband. Altogether, the custom is involved in much obscurity.

NO DEMOCRACY IN SOCIAL LIFE.

Are We All Aristocratic in Our Methods of Social Intercourse?

The time may come when the politician who sells one by one to the highest bidder all the offices in his grasp will not be considered more base in his code of morals, more hardened in his practice, than the woman who constantly invites to her receptions those alone who bring her an equal social return, who shares her beautiful surroundings only with those who minister to a liking she has for successful social events.

In doing this she is just as unmindful of the common weal, as unscrupulous in her use of power as is any city "boss" who consults only the interests of the "ring." In politics "bossism" arouses a scandal. It goes on in society constantly and is only beginning to be challenged. Our consciences are becoming tender in regard to the lack of democracy in social affairs.

The social organism has broken down through large districts of our great cities. Many of the people living there are very poor, the majority of them without leisure or energy for anything but the gain of subsistence. They move often from one wretched lodging to another. They live for the moment side by side, many of them without knowledge of each other, without fellowship, without local tradition or public spirit, without social organization of any kind.

Practically nothing is done to remedy this. The people who might do it, who have the social tact and training, the large houses and the traditions of custom and hospitality, live in other parts of the city. The clubhouses, libraries, galleries and semipublic conveniences for social life are also blocks away.

We find workingmen organized into armies of producers because men of executive ability and business sagacity have found it to their interests thus to organize them. But these workingmen are not organized socially; although living in crowded tenement houses, they are living without a corresponding social contact. The chaos is as great as it would be were they working in huge factories without foreman or superintendent.

Their ideas and resources are cramped. The desire for higher social pleasure is extinct. They have no share in the traditions and social energy which make for progress. Too often their only place of meeting is a saloon, their only host a bartender; a local demagogue forms their public opinion. Men of ability and refinement, of social power and university cultivation, stay away from them.

Personally I believe the men who lose most are those who thus stay away. But the paradox is here: When cultivated people do stay away from a certain portion of the population, when all social advantages are persistently withheld, it may be for years, the result itself is pointed at as a reason, is used as an argument, for the continued withholding. —Jane Addams in Forum.

An Experience in Paris.

A young woman recounting some European experiences the other evening told, among other things, of an episode in the French capital.

"While in Paris," she said, "I went into a shop one day to buy gloves. As I don't understand French I selected one that bore a sign in the window, 'English spoken here.' I found, however, that, as he usually is, the 'Inglese man ees out,' but I managed with much interchange of dumb show to make my purchase. I had about finished when a dapper Frenchman whom I took to be an official corresponding to our floor walker approached, and with great suavity rattled off a long speech in rapid French, of whose signification I could gather no hint. Not, however, to be outdone in courtesy, when he had finished I began, with much smiling intonation and gesture and equal impressment of manner with him, the children's lingo, 'Eeny meeny, mony mi, basalony bony si, etc.,' following it without an instant's intermission with 'Intra, mintra, cutra, corn,' and ending in a fluent and elegant delivery of 'Theophilus Thistle, the successful thistle sifter.'

"As the last sibilant rolled from my tongue I turned with a sweep of condescending grace and walked out of the store, leaving the clerks and the official transfixed in open mouthed wonder at my jargon. To this day I believe they have not decided whether I was a Choctaw, a Parsee or an escaped lunatic."—New York Times.

Oaths and Bible Kisses in Parliament.

A correspondent writes: "When will some legislative reformer with a just appreciation of the value of promissory oaths and a due sense of the importance of the public time help us to dispense with the meaningless and wholly unnecessary ceremony to which the new house of commons has been giving up its precious days? To see the solemn array of five New Testaments on a table to which ever and anon come five members to kiss the covers in response to some mumbled words understood to be an oath of allegiance certainly would not give a stranger among us a favorable idea of the practical good sense of the English people.

"Does any one really suppose that these 670 gentlemen will be a bit more firm in their allegiance to the occupant of the throne of this realm because they have been compelled to make this mechanical demonstration of loyalty? In numerous other departments of the state unnecessary oaths have long since disappeared in face of Bentham's convincing logic. Why should the house of commons in these days be the stronghold of the practice of swearing in this wholesale fashion?"—London News.

A Quick and Easy Way.

Even the poor beggars who get a few cents for passing out "dodgers" to the unwilling passersby have their ways for "beating the boss." One of the forlorn ones was seen in a cross seat in an L car last night distributing his bundle of "dodgers" in blocks of five every thirty seconds—out of the window. If his employer should grow suspicious he could take him up the west side of Third avenue and show him his circulars lining the curb—where of course they had been dropped by the passersby after reading. —New York Times.

The Strength of Walls.

In building walls it is of great importance not to overload them. The weight limit of safety per superficial foot is estimated as follows: Rubble masonry, 2 tons; lime concrete foundations, 2½ tons; brickwork in cement, 3 tons; sandstone piers, 15 tons; limestone piers, 25 tons; granite piers, 40 tons.—New York Ledger.

Jogged His Memory.

The nine lives of a cat are often a difficult subject to deal with. Uncle John Townsend had a number of cats as his only companions in the little farmhouse, and finally decided that one of them must be disposed of. His brother, who lived on the adjoining farm, offered to kill it for him.

"Well, now, Abner, I calculate I'll have you kill that black cat. He ain't no good except to eat. He won't hunt, and I won't have nothin 'round that can't earn its own livin; so you jest take him off."

So said Uncle John on the morning that Abner came to fulfill his promise.

"Kind of a likely lookin cat," ventured Abner.

"'Tain't any memory fer rats," replied Uncle John; "you jest take him off."

Abner departed with the cat and a shotgun. At night he came over again.

"Killed the old cat, did ye?" asked his brother.

"I reckon I did," replied Abner; "he won't be troubled about rat huntin after this."

Uncle John made no reply, but pointed toward the hearthstone, where sat old Blackie, as well apparently as ever.

"Well!" ejaculated Abner in surprise. Then, after a moment's silence, he turned toward his brother and said: "That's a likely cat. Kinder forgetful, maybe, but I reckon he'll hunt all right now. I didn't kill him, but I sort of jogged his memory."—Youth's Companion.

No Use for a Circulation Liar.

A London insurance man said yesterday: "We have in London one of the most unique newspapers in the world; for, while it is published every day in the year except Sundays, a copy of it is never sold or circulated. The Evening Telegraph of London is issued each afternoon from the office of The Daily Telegraph, which paper is a morning daily issued six times a week, and has the largest circulation of any paper in England, and with one exception, the largest in the world.

"The proprietors of The Daily Telegraph, in printing the evening edition, which is copyrighted, do so merely in order to protect themselves in the right to the use of the name in case they ever care to issue an evening edition, and also to prevent any one else from starting such a sheet and gaining the great advantage which the use of the title, Evening Telegraph, would give."—Philadelphia Record.

Living In Italy.

One great advantage of living in Italy lies in the fact that there is far less work in the kitchen on account of charcoal being used instead of coal. These fires brighten up in a moment, causing neither dust nor smoke, and as they are lighted just when they are required for cooking and then allowed to go out this arrangement obviates the necessity of keeping up a roaring fire all day long. Three francs a week is sufficient to spend on charcoal. The dustman comes every day to remove the refuse, and it is customary to give him 2 or 3 pence at the end of the week. It is a golden rule when housekeeping in Italy to keep as few servants as possible; otherwise gossip instead of work is the order of the day, and as their voices are all pitched in a high key the noise is considerable. With regard to washing, it is generally sent out unless a number of servants are kept. The ironing, however, is always done in the house.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

FAITH CURISTS.

These very confident people are strangely self-satisfied until danger to life looms up, as when the chronic pains of many years endurance attack the heart, like rheumatism very often does, then they turn to a better faith. This better faith, held to by many thousands, is simple and certain. It is faith founded on experience that St. Jacob's oil will cure, because it has cured all these painful ailments permanently. It is a faith founded on reason. We know what can be done by what has been done a thousand times. Every physician knows that those who have belief in treatment are the more easily cured; those who have not set up a resistance to the progress of cure.

Some men in Belgium have three votes at each election. Some Americans can beat that.

TRAVELING RISKS.

With the increased facilities for travel and the great number of travelers, there has been naturally a great increase in the risks of accidents.

Everyone, who for any reason is compelled to incur these risks, should keep by him a supply of ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS, for they are a wonderful specific in strains of the back or limbs, such as are almost inevitable in case of accident.

Any one starting on a long journey should have one as a part of his equipment. Commuters on suburban trains should keep them both at home and in the office.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS have repeatedly proved their great value in time of need.

HAUNTED!

A haunted house in these practical and unromantic days is something of a rarity, but an individual haunted with the idea that his ailment is incurable is a personage frequently met with. Disbelief in the ability of medicine to cure is only a mild form of monomania, although in some cases repeated failures to obtain relief from many different sources would almost seem to justify the doubt. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters has demonstrated its ability to overcome dyspepsia, constipation, liver and kidney trouble, malarial complaints and nervousness, and its recorded achievements in the curative line ought at least to warrant its trial by any one troubled with either of the above ailments, even although his previous efforts to obtain remedial aid have been fruitless. Used with persistance, the Bitters will conquer the most obstinate cases.

KNOWLEDGE

Brings comfort and improvement and tends to personal enjoyment when rightly used. The many, who live better than others and enjoy life more, with less expenditure, by more promptly adapting the world's best products to the needs of physical being, will attest the value to health of the pure liquid laxative principles embraced in the remedy, Syrup of Figs.

Its excellence is due to its presenting in the form most acceptable and pleasant to the taste, the refreshing and truly beneficial properties of a perfect laxative; effectually cleansing the system, dispelling colds, headaches and fevers and permanently curing constipation. It has given satisfaction to millions and met with the approval of the medical profession, because it acts on the Kidneys, Liver and Bowels without weakening them and it is perfectly free from every objectionable substance.

Syrup of Figs is for sale by all druggists in 50c and $1 bottles, but it is manufactured by the California Fig Syrup Co. only, whose name is printed on every package, also the name, Syrup of Figs, and being well informed, you will not accept any substitute if offered.

THE HARVEST MOON.

The Time of the Autumnal Equinox

IS AWAITED BY THE HUSBANDMEN.

Why it Rises for Several Evenings at Nearly the Same Hour—The Phenomenon in Northern Europe.

Near the time of the autumnal equinox in September the moon, at her "full," rises shortly after sunset for several evenings in succession, which cicrumstance gives rise to a series of brilliant moonlight nights, and the moon, being above the horizon until late in the morning, presents a charming appearance besides prolonging the light which is so beneficial to the husbandman at this season of the year. The full moon that occurs nearest to September 22 has long been known as the "harvest moon," on account of the peculiar advantages derived from moonlight during the time of harvest in England, and its yearly return is always celebrated as a festival among the peasantry.

The beautiful appearance of the harvest moon has from time immemorial attracted the attention of the poets, many of whom have made it the subjcet of their song, and Henry Kirke White wrote these beautiful lines:

Moon of harvest, herald mild
Of plenty, rustic labor's child,
Hail, O hail! I greet thy beam,
As soft it trembles o'er the stream
And gilds the straw-thatch'd hamlet wide,
Where innocence and peace reside,
'Tis thou that glad'st with joy the rustic throng,
Promptest the tripping dance, th' exhilerating song.

The circumstance of this moon rising for several nights in succession at nearly the same hour, immediately after sunset, has given it an importance in the estimation of farmers, but it is not the less remarkable for its singular and splendid beauty, as no other moon during the year can compare with it in brilliancy and magnificence. At its rising it has a character so peculiarly its own that the more a person is accustomed to expect and to observe it, the more it strikes him with astonishment. We should advise every one who can go out into the country away from the city lights, to make a practice of watching for its rising. The warmth and dryness of the earth, the clearness and balmy serenity of the atmosphere at this season, the sounds of voices borne from distant fields, the freshness which comes from the evening, combine to make the twilight walk delicious; and scarcely has the sun departed in the west when the moon in the east rises from behind some solitary hill, over a broad lake, or from behind the dark rich foliage of trees, and sails up into the still and transparent air in the full magnificence of a world. It appears not as in common, a fair but flat disk on the face of the sky, but we behold it suspended in the crystal air in all its greatness and rotundity; we perceive the distance beyond it as sensibly as that before it; and its apparent size is surprising to us as it rises above the horizon.

The annual appearance of the harvest moon was noticed and anxiously awaited by the husbandmen long before they could interpret the phenomenon, from the fact that it enabled them to lengthen the day's work during the haste of gathering the autumnal crops, as the moonlight evenings continued for an unusually long time. The moon travels toward the east, and therefore comes to the meridian about fifty-one minutes later each succeeding night, and if the interval between her rising and her arriving to the south were always the same she would rise fifty-one minutes later each evening on the average. As the solar day lengthens fastest at spring, when the sun crosses the equator from south to north, so the time the moon is above the horizon lengthens day by day when the moon is crossing the equator from south to north as she does in Sextember every year.

We have at and near the time of full moon in September the singular spectacle of the moon rising not far from 6 o'clock in the evening, and the operations of harvesting in England, can thus be continued throughout the entire night. A moon nearly full, afterward quite full, and then for a day or two still nearly full, rising night after night at nearly the same hour, remaining also longer above the horizon each night, obviously serves us for the time being in the most convenient way possible. At this time, moreover, when the moon rises night after night at nearly the same time, the nights are lengthening fastest while the time the moon is above the horizon is lengthening still more, and, therefore, in every respect the moon is then doing her best, so to speak, to illuminate the nocturnal heavens. The full moon that occurs in October, which exhibits in almost the same degree the curious phenomena we have described, is sometimes called the "hunter's moon," and it is about equally beautiful and attractive in its appearance.

The harvest moon is not generally understood by the public, but the true cause has long been known to astronomers and can be very easily explained. It arises from the fact that the ecliptic, or the sun's apparent path through the heavens, is variously inclined to the horizon at different seasons of the year. The celestial equator is always at the same angle with the horizon, and hence equal portions come above the horizon in equal periods of time. If the moon moved in the celestial equator she would rise and set directly in the east and west points of the horizon respectively, and she would rise later each night by a nearly constant interval. But the moon moves in a path which is constantly inclined to the ecliptic at an angle of about five degrees, though for the present explanation she may be regarded as moving in the ecliptic; and as the ecliptic is inclined to the celestial equator at an angle of 23½ degrees the moon, in all parts of her orbit, does not rise at equal intervals on each succeeding night. When the constellation Pisces is in the eastern horizon the ecliptic rises with the least angle. Now, in September, at the autumnal equinox, the sun being in the constellation Vrigo, the moon at her "full," when opposite to the sun, is in Pisces and rises at sunset. On the following night, though the moon has advanced in her orbit about 13 degrees, yet, her path being very oblique to the horizon, she will be but little below her position at the same time on the preceding night. She rises, therefore, only a little later, and for several evenings appears in the East at nearly the same hour after sunset, claiming our admiration as the "harvest moon."

Though the differences in the times of the moon's rising are always greater when she is in or near the constellation Virgo, and small when she is in or near Pisces—that is, every month—yet we never notice these variations except in autmun. In fact, we seldom observe the moon's rising at all unless it be when she rises near sunset, or in the early evening. We usually give more attention to the full moon, and the moon can be full in or near Pisces, where the difference in the times of her rising is least, only when the sun is in or near Virgo, which cannot occur except in September at the time of the autumnal equinox. In March the conditions are reversed, and the moon at her "full" rises on successive evenings later than at any other time of the year.

In our latitude the difference between the hours at which the full moon rises on succeeding evenings in September amounts, on the average, to rather more than twenty minutes, or about half an hour less than the mean interval, while in March the average difference is about one hour and twenty minutes, the least possible variation in the time of her rising being ten minutes, and the greatest one hour and thirty minutes. Those parts of the ecliptic which rise with the smallest angle, set with the greatest, and those which rise with the greatest set with the least, so that, while in September the full moon rises at nearly the same hour on successive evenings, the time of the setting varies considerably, owing to the larger angle of the ecliptic with the western horizon.

The phenomenon of the "harvest moon" is much more striking in Northern Europe and in Canada than in the United States; and in very high latitudes the moon, when it has its greatest possible declination, becomes circumpolar for a certain time each month, and remains visible without setting at all (like the "midnight sun") for a greater or less number of days, according to the latitude of the observer.

The late Professor Proctor, in a very instructive essay on the subject, says: "The reader must not fall into the mistake of supposing, as I have seen sometimes stated in textbooks of astronomy, that we are more favored in this respect than the inhabitants of the Southern Hemisphere. It is quite true that the same full moon shines on us as on our friends in New Zealand, Australia and Cape Colony, and also that our autumn is their spring, and their spring our autumn. But the full moon we have in autumn behaves in the southern hemisphere not as with us, but as our spring full moon behaves; and the full moon of our spring, which is their autumn, behaves with them as our autumn moon behaves with us. It is, therefore, for them a harvest moon if it occur before the equinox. A very little consideration will show why this is. In fact, if, in the explanation given above, the words north and south be interchanged, and March 21-22 written for September 22-23, the explanation will be precisely that which I should have given respecting the harvest (or March) moon of the southern hemisphere, if I had been writing for southern readers."

The moon's nodes are those points in her orbit at which she crosses the earth's orbit or ecliptic. The place where she passes the ecliptic in moving north is called her ascending node, while the opposite point, or the place where she intersects the ecliptic in moving south, is termed her descending node. These nodes do not remain stationary, but move backward on the ecliptic from east to west, completing an entire revolution in about 18 6-10 years. When the moon's ascending node is in or near the constellation Pisces, the interval between successive risings will be yet more shortened, and the harvest moons are then most beneficial to us, but if her descending node is situated in or near Pisces, the effects are diminished and the phenomena are least beneficial to us. In October next the ascending node of the moon's orbit passes through the vernal equinox for the first time in nearly nineteen years, so that our satellite this fall ranges north and south of the equator to the greatest possible extent, and the harvest moon in September will be especially noticeable and interesting, the present favorable conditions for the event not occurring again until after another nineteen-yearly revolution of the moon's nodes.

The moon will reach her "full" on the evening of September 14 at 10.21 o'clock, central standard time, and if those interested will take pains to look into the east just at sunset, it will be noticed (if there are no clouds), that the full round orb of the moon appears in the horizon almost as soon as the sun sinks in the west; and for several evenings in succession, the moon rises shortly after sunset, with only a small variation in time.—Arthur K. Bartlett.

STORAGE OF WATER.

Reservoirs of the Spring Valley Water Company.

WATER SUPPLY OF SAN FRANCISCO.

The Joint Capacity of the Seven City Reservoirs is in the Neighborhood of 80,000,000 Gallons.

The growth of a city is most accurately estimated by the demands upon its water supply. Pure water is of the utmost importance to the health of towns and cities.

While the eastern and central portions of the United States are blest with summer rains and a grand system of rivers and lakes from which to draw a supply for their cities and towns, the Pacific Coast has only winter rains, which last for an average of about five months in the year—from about the middle of October to the end of March—being followed by an absolutely dry summer, lasting from six to seven months. In order, therefore, to make a success of a water supply, it becomes necessary to store the winter waters when there is an abundance flowing to waste into the sea.

The Spring Valley Water Company is the corporation which furnishes San Francisco with its waters from reservoirs situate in the southern portion of the peninsula. The Pilarcitos Reservoir is in the mountains of San Mateo county, and has an elevation of nearly 700 feet above the tide-level. This was constructed in 1864, when the population of the city was fully 100,000 inhabitants. This reservoir was formed by the building of a substantial earth dam across the Pilarcitos Valley, which dam is now 90 feet high, and which makes the storage capacity of the reservoir 1,000,000,000 gallons. A 30-inch iron pipe, sixteen miles in length, conveys the water of Pilarcitos to Lake Honda, a distributing reservoir in the suburbs of the city, at an elevation of 368 feet, and with a capacity of 33,000,000 gallons.

The population of San Francisco still growing, and the water consumption keeping pace with its growth, it became necessary to construct the San Andreas dam, forming a lake with a storage capacity of about 6,200,000,000 gallons, and with an elevation of 450 feet above tide. Both the Pilarcitos and the San Andreas reservoirs have a substantial waste-weir built of brick, laid in cement, and mounted with large iron brass-faced waste-gates, strong enough to control any flood. A conduit was constructed from the San Andreas waste-weir into San Francisco, consisting of 3000 feet of tunnel lined with brick-work, and sixteen miles of 30-inch wrought iron pipe.

When the San Andreas works were completed, about 1870, the population had increased to some 150,000, and the daily consumption to about 6,000,000 gallons. About this time the company began to acquire lands and water rights in the Crystal Springs Valley, which is located about southeasterly from the Pilarcitos and San Andreas reservoirs, and which, with a proper dam, would produce a magnificent storage reservoir of a capacity of 30,000,000,000 gallons.

Mr. Herman Schussler, the company's head engineer, strongly urged the building of a concrete dam at the mouth of the Crystal Springs Valley, and Charles Webb Howard, the president of the company, and the manager of its financial affairs since its formation, heartily coincided with Mr. Schussler. This was in 1887, when the daily consumption had grown to fully 19,000,000 gallons. In the summer of that year the company began to lay the foundation of their magnificent concrete dam, which now forms the great Crystal Springs Reservoir. In the following year this dam was raised to a height of 115 feet above its base, and a pipe was laid across the bay of San Francisco at its narrowest point.

In the winter of 1889 and '90, the rainfall was excessive, and the reservoir, though of large dimensions, soon filled up to the brim and ran over. In order to prevent such waste in the future, the Spring Valley Water Works concluded to raise the dam another 30 feet, which was accomplished during the summer of 1890, making it then 145 feet above its base, and increasing its capaicty to about 19,000,000 gallons.

The dam, built of concrete, has a thickness at its base of 176 feet, and a top width of 25 feet when finished to its full height of 170 feet. The slope on the water front is one foot horizontally to four feet vertically, while the slope on the back, while it starts at one vertically to one horizontally, ends on top about two feet vertically to one horizontally. The length of the top of the dam will be 700 feet, and it is curved with a radius of 637 feet, the convex side being up stream.

Concrete dams of smaller size have been constructed in other parts of the world, but in many cases, when they had been treated as a monolith, some trouble has been experienced in the large masses, owing to their shrinking and cracking. In order to avoid this danger, Mr. Schussler devised a plan of building this dam of large blocks in place. These blocks were of various sizes, averaging about thirty feet in width and forty feet in length, and having a thickness of about eight feet. Two of these blocks were built each day separate from each other, but in order not to allow their setting during the noon recess, half the force of men were kept on the work ramming, while the other half had their lunch. Thus a constant system of ramming and filling was kept up to quitting time in the evening, and to whatever height the block had been finished, that remained its height for the next ten or fourteen days, until it had set and hardened by itself. The vertical sides of the blocks were indented by placing wooden boxes inside of the tight board fences that surrounded each block.

In this manner the entire surface of the dam was studded with these large concrete blocks, each one consuming about 450 barrels of English Portland cement, making a total daily average consumption of 900 barrels of this cement. The only rock to be obtained was so shattered and broken that no building stone greater than the size of an ordinary cobble-stone could be found in the quarry, so the engineer concluded to break up the stone to the size of between a hen's egg and a walnut, and go on and build the dam of concrete instead of rubble-stone. Eight large crushers were erected, in which this stone was broken. Thereafter it was passed through six automatic steel washers, in which the broken rock was tumbled and cleansed of all impurity. From these washers it fell into two cars, which jointly contained twenty-two cubic feet of broken rock, which, together with two barrels of sand and one of cement, was dumped into a cubical Ransome steel mixer, the axis of which was set diagonally from corner to corner, and through the hollow axle of which the necessary amount of water for the mixing of the concrete was admitted. After revolving this mixture from fifteen to twenty times, and thoroughly tumbling and mixing all the above materials, the mixer was stopped, and its contents dropped out and conveyed in steel cars on a high trestle-work to a place close to the dam, where it was dumped on to a platform erected on the respective level that the dam happened to be at the time. From this platform it was conveyed in wheelbarrows to whatever blocks were then being formed, dumped into the same, and spread in thin two-inch layers, and quickly rammed by a large force of men, each with a fifteen-pound rammer, so as to perfectly consolidate it with the previous layers.

The above process was kept up constantly, without cessation, from the hour of beginning in the morning till the hour of quitting in the evening, thus finishing two of the above-mentioned blocks, forming in the neighborhood of 20,000 cubic feet of concrete daily, having a weight of 140 pounds per cubic foot. This represents a total daily weight of the concrete so manufactured of 2,800,000 pounds.

The storage capacity of the company's reservoirs together now is 29,000,000,000 gallons, and they contain an average of 25,000,000,000 gallons.

The company has other properties in view where an additional supply of water may be stored. With the reservoirs built eventually as proposed, its storage capacity, which is now 29,000,000,000 gallons, will be increased to 72,000,000,000 gallons, and their daily supply capacity, which at present is nearly 30,000,000 gallons, the city consuming 20,000,000 gallons, will be increased to nearly 100,000,000 gallons daily, which would permit an abundant supply for from one to one and a half million people. Thus San Francisco, in proportion to its population, is abundantly supplied with water, not only at present, but for many years ahead.

The joint capacity of the seven city reservoirs is in the neighborhood of 80,000,000 gallons, and their respective elevations range from 168 feet to 375 feet above tide. The distributing-pipe system of San Francisco, from four inches up to thrity-seven and one-half inches, has a total length of 285 miles, and although the surface of the city is broken up by many hills and dales, the average pressure maintained through out the city varies from fifty to seventy-five pounds to the square inch, which is of large assistance to its very efficient fire department.

The reservoirs of the Spring Valley Water Works are all plentifully stocked with fish, and angling in these lakes, for which permission is freely given to all reputable people, is one of the principal recreations of the San Franciscans. The Spring Valley Company is regarded, and justly so, as one of the most progressive and most ably-managed institutions of the United States, and it not only keeps pace with, but leads in the imporvements and growth of the Pacific Coast metropolis.—Daniel O'Connell in Harper's Weekly.

THE BIGGEST FIND.

The largest diamond in the world, the Excelsior, was discovered on June 30, 1893, in the mines of Jagerstein, Cape Colony, by Edward Jorgansen, inspector. It is a stone of the first water, valued at about $5,000,000. It was carried to the Cape under the special convoy of a squadron of lancers, and shipped on a gunboat to London, where it was deposited in the Bank of England. It weighs 971¾ carats, or 2,051 grammes.

Valley Forge, the famous winter headquarters of Washington during the Revoltuion, will probably soon become a State park. Only $3000 stand between the State of Pennsylvania and the owners of the land, and there is a spirit of compromise manifest on each side of the proposed bargain.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

Women who Earn Substantial Salaries in Washington.

MEMORIAL TO GENERAL SPINNER.

A Movement Among the Women Department Clerks at the National Capital to Erect a Monument.

I have been asked what I have found in Washington that interests me most, and I have answered with a mind made up, "those of my own sex in the civil service and their movement toward a memorial to General Spinner, the one to whom every mother's daughter of them owes this means of honest money-getting today." Particularly do the women of the Treasury interest me, first, because of the surprising number of talented women, and women of both birth and breeding I have found there, and because this was the pioneer department of woman's work for the government, and for which privilege they are indirectly indebted to General Spinner's own daughter, who, so the pleasing story goes, clerked for the father when he was a banker, before he was Treasurer of the United States. While serving in the bank she showed her father she could trim bank notes faster and neater than any of his clerks or than he could himself, a fact he did not fail to remember when he became United States Treasurer.

It was in the summer of 1862 that the experiment of women clerks was made. The first legal tender United States notes had just been issued, and men were employed to clip them at $1200 a year, and their clumsiness with the shears doubtless recalled to General Spinner's mind the deft fingers and accurate eye of his daughter, when in the bank. Anyway, he suggested to his assistant that they "allow women to try their hands at the work," to which the assistant agreed; some say because a gun was a more suitable instrument than a pair of shears to be found in a man's hands at that war time, and others say it was purely an economical move, a desire to get more work done for less money. But let us not quarrel with the motive if the women were appointed, and two of the first seven, after thirty-two years of unremitting service, are still to be found in the Treasury Department, receiving now equal pay with their brother-workers for the same service rendered.

The first woman employed was paid $600 per annum, or just half as much as the men, but as they proved their efficiency their salaries were proportionally increased until now we learn from the statistics shown by the Civil Service Commission, that there are now seven women receiving $1800, about fifty receiving $1600, 225 at $1400, over 650 receiving $1200, 450 at $1,000 and over, but less than $1,200, while there are 700 receiving 900. And it is the voice of the commissioners that women in the public service have on the whole had a beneficial effect upon that service and measurably increased its efficiency; that no one familiar with the conditions that prevailed in the departments twenty-five years ago, and equally familiar with the conditions prevailing today, can doubt the correctness of this opinion.

In defense of the much-heralded civil service, I am told, both by the commissioners and women in the departments, that it has raised the standard of those obtaining positions, both mentally and morally, as nothing else could have done; that while civil service has tended to decrease the number of women appointees, since it is their own ability and not political "pull" that now puts them through; yet there are under it more women promoted than heretofore, when there was no such thing as competitive tests, which certainly shows that when given a fair and even chance with men, they win their full share of the responsible and lucrative positions. It is offered as proof of this that the present auditor of the Post Office Department has promoted more women already in the few months he has been in power, than his Republican predecessor did during his whole administration, and yet the present auditor has a reputation for discipline equal to that enforced at West Point. Efficiency and merit are the watchwords under which civil service—while influence—well "influence," to quote from Coyne Fletcher's "Me and Chummy," "is the galled and spavined mare of politics, broken-winded, cockle jointed, sprung in the knees, heaves and away back, foundered." And yet old "Influence" is every year trotted out on the government's track when departmental positions are the stakes; but unless all signs are false and all mouths lie, the jade is commonly outrun by the thorough-bred colt Civil Service, who runs with "the bit in his teeth," and, to quote again, "is clean-limbed, muscles of iron, wind free and steady, has beaten all records, and in time shall run all political favorites clear off the track."

Mr. Charles Lyman, of the commission, has assured me there is absolutely no department of the government where personal ability and worth do not receive recognition, and that the time is here when what a woman is and what she does is the standard of her position and salary, rather than the power of her political friends; and that civil service has, above all things, proven that the woman who secured appointments by Congressional favor alone were not always the most fitted.

Apropos of the slanderous legend of the immorality of departmental women, kept going by the disgruntled and believed only by the unthinking, I want to quote on the subject from no less an authority on such statistics than Carrol D. Wright, Commissioner of Labor, who says vice is not more prevalent in communities where the sexes are employed together than among the same number of each not so situated. In other words, that a good woman will be good, whether employed in a place with other women only or where both sexes work side by side, and it follows conversely that the good and the bad of both sexes will follow their natural inclinations for evil, no matter how or where employed, and that as many good women are to be found in the departments here, proportionately, as can be found among women either in society or earning their own way in the world along any other line. Let us all stop a moment to think how reasonable is this statement of Mr. Wright, and let us on the strength of it do tardy justice to the women of the departments. There is many an unwritten heroine there, many a patient worker whose life of self-sacrifice for dependent loved ones, whose devotion to duty if known would command the love and admiration of the most prejudiced. It would be well if we could remember at all times that "vice has no friend like the prejudice which claims to be virtue."

But the culture, the progressiveness and the real womanliness of the women of the Treasury has been more of a revelation than anything else. I find I must have been thinking of them more as machines than as women; that knowing their work they did it mechanically with no higher aspirations. How ashamed I am of the thought since I find them by the scores hurrying from this, the government's workshop, to a music lesson or drawing lesson, many working the entire evening at the Corcoran Art Gallery; others are studying medicine, not a few attending the Howard University, this year the only college here kind enough to leave its doors open to them. I find many householders among these women, the property purchased by their own earnings; indeed, statistics show more women have so invested or otherwise saved more money than do the men employed in the departments. Several right young girls have been pointed out to me, who look too frail to be over a desk at all, and yet they were supporting invalid fathers, or mothers, younger sisters or brothers, or a dead sister's children.

It is a very busy and picturesque life here, and peopled with attractive characters and full of events, the reverse of the monotonous and unsocial. Of course there is the same amount of jealousy and woman's inhumanity to woman to be found among women as elsewhere, but no more, and a corresponding number of good and generous souls that have no room for narrow or mean grudges. There are women still in active service who are grandmothers several times over, grown gray in the service; but not grown old. I have found no old women here, though I suspect some are touching close to the three score and ten limit. It perhaps goes without telling these are the most interesting of Uncle Sam's daughters, since so prolific of delightful reminiscences of the people, customs and doings of a former generation. Many a sly bit of scandal I know they could dish up about the former days of men and women whose present day greatness has won our reverence.

Talents of the highest order and blood as blue as the bluest have the women of the Treasury brought to the work, and so changed are the conditions that she no longer comes veiled, ashamed to be seen earning her bread in Uncle Sam's service on account of strange and shady fellow-workers, as I am told was actually the case under the rule of old "Influence." In those pioneer days a Treasury girl was a something suggestive, a somebody that would bear watching; she was an apology. Her work a cloak intended to conceal what everybody saw and knew, so I have been told by people of that day. Appointees valuing their reputations at that price above rubies, crept in through the side doors, and veiled at that, obliged to suffer what they then tought the shame of it in order to get the crumbs that want demanded for the child of a patriotic sire.

But now all those humiliating conditions have been changed, thanks to civil service, which shows no favoritism except to brains, but which demanded that the human barnacles of political influence should take the examinations for promotions along with the rest and hereafter stand upon their merits alone. In consequence of all this the women we find in departmental service today represent the survival of the fittest and not the favorites of corrupt politicians, as too many suppose.—Meg. in Philadelphia Times.

A FAMOUS ORGAN.

It Seems to Have a Soul of Its Own.

SKETCH OF LIFE IN SWITZERLAND.

Music that Thrills One's Very Soul—Characteristic Types of European Architecture.

The great organ at Fribourg, Switzerland, is so famous that many travelers stop over in this otherwise dull and uninteresting town expressly to hear it, and concerts are given twice a day throughout the summer. This organ is not quite as large as the one at Ulm, but is much more brilliant and satisfcatory. The cathedral is about half the size of the one at Ulm, and a much better building for sound. Most of the European cathedrals have immense echoing arches, which are destructive to musical effects. Besides, the Fribourg organ is played by a man with a soul—not as one would saw wood—and when a noble instrument like this is touched by such a man, it seems to have a soul of its own. Like the violin, it can express every mood, every emotion, every aspiration. Fortunate indeed are those who can hear the Fribourg organ respond to a player so sympathetic and so full of musical sensibility.

For many years the show piece at these concerts has been "A Storm in the Alps." It is called for at every performance. While this sort of thing is usually trivial and unworthy of the organ, the Fribourg storm is really remarkable. The story is told by the music more clearly than any artist could paint it. You see the deepening twilight. You hear the chapel bell as it calls the mountaineers to their evening worship. You alomst see the lights stream through the chapel windows. The choir sings its evening hymn, but before it has finished there are mutterings of a storm, which gradually come nearer and nearer. Does it seem absurd to say that you can see the flash of the lightning? The reader will say so, but this is certainly suggested by the music, while the thunder crashes and echoes from peak to peak in the narrow Alpine gorges. Some of these effects are actually startling, and although I know something about the organ, I confess that I don't understand just how they were produced. Gradually the storm dies away, the mutterings cease, you hear again the sweet evening hymn and the music ends as peacefully as it began.

The American kicker is still en route. The thing that troubles him constantly is the fact that a great many little things are not done here precisely as they are in America. He has not thought far enough to see that it is these differences which afford zest and piquancy to travel. Why should one travel at all, if everybody and everything are exactly the same as at home?

And so long as they are not, why should one make himself constantly uncomfortable by growling about what he cannot remedy? The philosophical traveler, and the one who gets benefit and enjoyment out of traveling, is the one who readily adapts himself to his surroundings. As a French friend of mine remarked the other day, "When you are in Wome, do as the Womans do." The remark was amusing if not original, and it is pretty good advice.

The thing which worries American travelers most is the European breakfast. This always consists of tea, coffee or chocolate, cold rolls, sometimes as hard as a rock, unsalted butter and honey or marmalade—only this and nothing more. To the man who is accustomed to begin the day with fruit, oatmeal, a chop or porterhouse steak and a liberal supply of fried potatoes, hot muffins and griddle cakes, this seems an unsubstantial breakfast.

It is not the meal that a man would want who is going to spend the forenoon in the hay field or hoeing corn or digging potatoes, but all Europe manages to subsist upon it, and after several months' experience I must admit that I like it. The second breakfast, or lunch, comes at midday, and is a tolerably hearty meal, but not more than half as hearty as the dinner, which comes at 7 o'clock, after the work of the day is over.

It seems odd that steep Gothic roofs should prevail in England, where there is so little snow, and flattish ones in Switzerland, where the snow falls are often heavy. The reason, so far as the Swiss are concerned, is that there are high winds throughout the mountain districts and heavy stones are placed all over the roofs of the Swiss chalets to hold them down. Many of the characteristic types of European architecture have been copied in our own country, but I saw some mediaeval roofs in Berne and Thun, which seem to have escaped the architect's notice, but which are as delightfully quaint as Holland itself.

The iron-bound bucket has a counterpart at Fribourg, in an iron-bound tree in one of the public squares. It was planted in commemoration of a Swiss victory 600 years ago, and is preserved with scrupulous and loving care. The old tree is not able to stand alone and a handsome stone framework has been constructed to hold up its aged limbs, but its leaves are yet green and every summer day some of the people of quaint old Fribourg sit under the shade of its branches.—Edward H. Phelps.

In answer to a letter from Frank M. Lewis, of Sanger, requesting information with regard to prospecting for mines and title to mining property in the Sierra forest reservation, Commissioner S. W. Lamoreux, of the United States Land Office, at Washington, D. C., says in substance that "all mining claims duly located and held according to the laws of the United States and the rules and regulations not in conflict therewith" at the date of the President's proclamation (February 14, 1893), are exempt from the operation of that order of reservation. All mining claims not so held on February 14, 1893, are included in the terms of that proclamation. It will, therefore, be seen that any mining claim located after the date named is not only of no value to the locator, but that he is, in fact, a trespasser and subject to the penalties prescribed in the proclamation, etc., therefore, it is important that our miners at once know and understand the situation. It is said some have already gone and others are going to work on quartz and placer claims inside the limits of the reservation, which are not protected by the terms of the proclamation. Their filings are worthless, nor can they get any title nor do they have any claim as against any other person for any ledge discovered. Therefore, the information should be circulated miners and prospectors, advising them to keep off the Reservation unless they had claims duly filed and recorded in compliance with the United States mining laws and rules and regtations before February 14, 1893, in order that they may not waste time and get into trouble besides.

According to the Political Record of San Francisco Democrats will be rather lonely in the next legislature, but there are enough for seed. There will be but fourteen in the Senate—just enough to prevent a bill being passed over Governor Budd's veto on party measures. In the Assembly there will be sixty-five Republicans, twelve Democrats, one Independent Republican, one Fusion Republican Populist and one lone Populist. This will enable the Populists to vote as a unit at this session, and thereby avoid such wrangles as occured between Kerns and Bretz last session. In the Senate members from the oddnumbered districts held over. Of the other twenty but six were re-elected—five Republicans and one Democrat. The Assembly will be composed of new men with the exception of six—all Republicans. From Sacramento river to San Diego there will be but three Democratic members of Assembly—Baker of Santa Barbara, Robinson of Tulare and Bachman of Fresno.

Representative Maguire's arguments in opposition to the Pacific railroads funding bill are irrefutable. He shows that although the bonds are about to mature and although the government will have to meet them the necessity is not so alarming in the face of the fact that the people have been paying interest on the bonds for years, until the amount has reached the astounding figure of $50,000,000, while the principle only amounts to $37,000,000. In view of this condition he thinks it will be better if congress makes no adjustment, in which event the Pacific roads will lapse into government control. It is the intention of Mr Maguire to contest the measure on the floor of the house if Chirman Rilly insists on having a time fixed for consideration before the holidays.

"SASSIETY" AND VICE.

The Right and the Wrong Way of Keeping Scandals Out of the Newspapers.

It would be hard indeed if we could not get a laugh out of all these horrid scandals that sear society's face, and it has come at last—broad, hearty and irrepressible.

The good people of Newport—not the old Newporters, but the people who have followed in their train—are so incensed by the reports published about the misdoings of the Four Hundred that they have organized a Society For the Suppression of Newspaper Notoriety.

Dear, comical, old Elbridge T. Gerry is at the head of the new society, and it looks as if he would have time to attend to nothing else.

The purpose of the society is to prevent the publication in New York and Boston (other cities don't count) of matters that are purely personal to the Four Hundred and of no public interest.

If Mrs. Stevens' maid takes advantage of Mr. Tom Cushing's valet, that is legitimate news, and no objection will be made to its publication, but if Mrs. Stevens herself should cast sheep's eyes at Mr. Cushing, or if Mr. A. should compromise Mr. B.'s wife, or Mr. C. sue his wife for divorce, or Mrs. D. go wrong with a dude—these are matters that concern nobody but the culprits themselves and their most intimate friends.

No wonder the laugh is loud and long at these good people's expense.

Did it never occur to dear old Gerry and his younger friends on the social toboggan slide that a "Society For the Suppression of Vice In the Four Hundred" would cut at the very root of the evil of which they complain, whereas the step they are taking now can only trim off some of the topmost boughs?

There is without doubt a certain amount of reckless newspaper writing going on which every one abominates—and every one reads.

This writing keeps pace with the doings of the day. It is often inaccurate, vulgar and malicious; but, on the other hand, there is so much social evil doing that never finds its way into print at all that the score is pretty even up to date.

I could mention the names of hundreds of prominent New York and Boston families who have never had cause to complain of a single line or word printed to their derogation.

And why? Simply because they have never given the opportunity.

While not making a plea for the society reporter or the scandal loving editor I am sufficiently familiar with their methods to know that they would just as lief print good news of prominent people as bad news.

Bad news sells better than good news, of course. In times of war, tempest, famine, fire and flood the demand for newspapers doubles and trebles.

So it does in times of great social disaster.

The collapse of Duncan, Sherman & Co., the failure of Grant & Ward, the elopement of Herbert Pell and Mrs. Kate Kernochan, the divorce of Mr. and Mrs. Fernando Yznaga and the subsequent marriage of both, the Drayton scandal, the Vanderbilt imbroglio, the Gould fiasco—all these stirring incidents in social life, and thousands of others for which I haven't space, constitute the gossip of the day which is on every one's lips, and which can no more be kept out of the newspapers than a duck can be kept out of water or Ward McAllister out of print.

That is why I advise kind old Gerry and his pretty playmates to begin to trim ship before they yell that they are overpowered by water.

I cannot predict any success for the new society with the object of suppressing bad news about fashionable people.

Murder will out—so will adultery, drunkenness, cheating at cards, dishonorable indebtedness and all the other vices to which flesh is heir.

As I said before, a society that condemns publicity has only to ponder for a moment upon all it does that is not printed and be grateful on its marrow bones that such matters are still personal and have not yet become of public interest.—Cholly Knickerbocker in New York Recorder.

AN INTERESTING SLAB.

It Marks the Boundary Between Mexico and the United States.

Under the direction of the boundary survey commission the old marble monument which since 1849 has marked the dividing line between the United States and Mexico at the coast has been brought to the city to be dressed up. For years that monument has been a point of interest and has been visited by thousands of citizens and strangers. Each has apparently felt that no one would believe he or she had been there if some portion of the slab were not carried away to be offered in evidence on all occasions.

The result has been that the marble has been chipped and defaced until its original form is almost lost. It is because of all this that the slab was brought to the city. To work out the effacements the surface would have to be worked down two inches. When redressed, the stone will again be placed in position, but this time it will be protected by a fence of steel pickets. The inclosure will be 12 feet square. The pickets will be 8 feet high, the tops sharply pointed and leaning inward, after the device of some rattraps, so that while it might be possible for an active person to climb in it would require a first class acrobat to climb out over those curving pickets. Besides this a new law makes it a penal offense to mutilate the monuments.

At Tia Juana a similar slab will be erected on the old brick foundation in National avenue, which has long been a landmark there. The Tia Juana monument will be of granite instead of marble, and it will be inclosed with steel pickets, like the one at the coast line.—San Diego Sun.

A FROST FOR A FROST.

Colonel Slupsky Puts a Gentleman on Ice to Take the Chill Off.

The Sabbath calm that usually reigns seven days in the week at the Hon. Jim Cronin's establishment at Twenty-first and Market was violently disturbed early in the week by Colonel Abe Slupsky, the school board reformer, who attempted to kill, murder and slay Mr. F. C. Howard by freezing him to death in Mr. Cronin's icebox. Colonel Slupsky dropped into the saloon with a couple of friends just as Mr. Howard, who seems to have been blowing himself, invited all hands to take something. When he saw the colonel ranging up to the bar, Mr. Howard looked at him severely and said, "Nay, nay, Pauline; it's off!"

"What's off?" queried Slupsky, who had not been aware of Howard's generous intentions.

"Your graft. We are not playing ringers on this track. You're ruled off the course. In other words, such drinks as you pays for you gets; not otherwise. See?"

"I was paralyzed," Abe confided to a friend. "I'd never laid eyes on the fellow in my life before, nor he on me, but I couldn't stand a play of that sort, you know. Great Scott! If I had all the drinks that are coming to me! Well, anyhow, I put a quarter in the darky's hand and whispered him to open that long, low icebox Jim has over against the wall and, leave it open, and then I walked up to Mr. Howard and said:

"'I don't know who you are, sir, but you mustn't leave me out of a general treat this way. It hurts my feelings.'

"He said he'd see me gorned first, and with that I caught him, and before he could even begin to cuss any I had him in that icebox, with the cover down. Well, sir, I thought I'd die. He was the most surprised man I ever saw in my life. I guess that icebox was about the last place on this earth he thought he was heading for when he began his play.

"Well, I went to the door and stood there, although at first I intended to keep him there until he agreed to treat me. While they were getting him out and peeling the things off him somebody asked him what he wanted to insult Congressman Frank that way for.

"'Great Scott! Was that Congressman Frank?' he says. 'Let me see him,' and he came to me, with his hand out, saying: 'Congressman, you must forgive me. I had never seen you before, and I'm sorry that I insulted you.'

"I stood on my congressional dignity awhile and asked what my constituents would think of it if they heard I was grafting for a drink, but finally I forgave him, and we all went in and had something. I invited him to come down and see me at my office in the Turner building, and when he calls I guess Nat Frank and he will have a nice time getting themselves straightened out.

"I'd give a dollar to see the interview between 'em."—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

The Work of Dust.

Dust has a very large share in nearly all the phenomena of the earth's atmosphere. It is what makes the clear sky appear blue, and when we look up into the sky we see the dust in the atmosphere illuminated by the sun. There is nothing else before us that can permit the light to reach the eye. Light goes invisible, straight through all gases, whatever their chemical composition. The dust catches it, reflects it in every direction, and so causes the whole atmosphere to appear clear in the same way that it makes the sunbeam visible in the darkened room. Without dust there would be no blue firmament. The sky would be as dark as or darker than we see it in the finest moonless nights. The glowing disk of the sun would stand immediately upon this dark background, and the same sharp contrast would prevail upon the illuminated surface of the earth—blinding light where the sun's rays fall and deep black shadows where they do not.

Only the light of the moon and the stars, which would remain visible in the daytime, would be able to temper this contrast in a slight degree. The illumination of the earth's surface would be like that we see with the telescope on the lunar landscapes, for the moon has no atmospheric envelope that can hold floating dust. We then owe to dust the even moderately tempered daylight, adapted now to our eyes, and it is that which contributes much to the beauty of our landscape scenery.—Dr. P. Lenard in Popular Science Monthly.

Girls Who Sell Their Hair.

"Do we have many girls come to sell their hair? Well, I should say so, but we don't make a business of buying on account of the risks we would have to run. I have had girls come to me and offer to sell their hair as it was on their heads. No; they don't get good prices, $1.50 to $2.50 being as much as I ever gave. I know of one case, however, where a well known society woman took a fancy to the hair of a young lady she met accidentally, and she paid the highest price I have ever known for a head of hair. The young lady in question had a luxuriant growth of golden brown hair, and one day she was approached by this lady, who was compelled to use false hair, who said to her, 'Miss ——, if at any time you desire to part with your hair, you can find a customer in me.' The young lady was in need of pin money at the time and said, 'Well, I am not particular about keeping it now, as it is a little too light for my taste.' So she agreed to have her hair cut, and in payment received $8.50. If girls could always get such a sum for their flowing locks, there would be a great many more short haired young ladies about the city."—Pittsburg Dispatch.

Thunder Doesn't Sour Milk.

Science has disproved the rural belief that thunder sours milk. It is now known that the souring results from a fungous growth, and that this fungus is peculiarly fatal to nursing children. The old time rural belief was that the concussion from thunder acted mechanically upon the milk and first soured and then solidified it. The theory is a plausible one, easily derived from observing one set of facts without knowing the existence of others more important to the situation. It happens that milk sours during or just after thunderstorms because the atmospheric conditions then prevailing are usually of a kind favorable to the rapid development of the fungous growth that sours milk.—Philadelphia Press.

Order of Adjudication of Insolvency.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE County of Inyo, State of California.

Pierre Beveye and Francois Hagata, Copartners, etc.

Pierre Beveye and Francois Hagata, Copartners under the firm name of P. Beveye & Co., having filed in this Court their petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, from which it appears that they are insolvent debtors, the said Pierre Beveye and Francois Hagata Copartners under the firm name of P. Beveye & Co., are hereby declared to be insolvent. It is hereby ordered that the Sheriff of the 3rd County of Inyo be, and he is hereby appointed Receiver of the property of said insolvents and that upon his giving a bond to the people of the State of California, conditioned as required by law, and in such sum as the Court may order, and qualifying, he take charge and possession of all the estate real and personal, of said insolvent debtors, whatsoever and wheresoever situate, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all their deeds, vouchers, books of account and papers; and to keep and care for and dispose of the same until the appointment of an Assignee of their estate. All persons having the same or any part thereof in his or their possession are hereby directed to deliver said property to said Receiver, and all persons owing money to said insolvents, or either of them are hereby directed to pay the same to said Receiver, and that said Receiver keep said property, or the proceeds thereof, till the further order of this Court. And all persons are hereby forbidden to pay any debts to said insolvents, or to deliver any property belonging to such insolvents, or either of them, to him or them or any person, firm, corporation or association for their use, and the said debtors are hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered.

It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtors be and appear before the Hon. Geo. M. Gill, Judge of the Superior Court of said County of Inyo, at a court to be held at the court room of said court in the town of Independence, in said County of Inyo, on the 22nd day of December, 1894, at 10 o'clock a. m. of that day, to prove their debts and choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtors. It is further ordered, that this order be published in the Inyo Independent, a newspaper of general circulation, published in the County of Inyo, as often as the said paper is published before the day set for the meeting of creditors.

And it is further ordered, that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvents be stayed.

Dated November 14th, 1894.

Grand Jury Report

INDEPENDENCE, Calif., Dec. 14, 1894.

TO THE HON. N. D. ARNOT
Acting Judge of the Superior Court of Inyo County.

The Grand Jury impanelled by you on the 11th of December, 1894, respectfully submits the following report:

We have examined four (4) cases and found two (2) true bills.

We have inquired into the condition of the county invalids.

We have examined the Public Buildings and Records.

We have discussed means to be employed in checking minor offences committed throughout the county that tend very materially to lower the moral tone of the community.

We have discussed measures to be taken in correcting, or entirely changing, what appears to us to be an expensive system of working our roads.

The new hospital building is found to possess commodious and comfortable quarters well supplied with good bedding and the table supplied with good substantial food. It contains three (3) inmates.

The jail contains one (1) prisoner serving a sentence of imprisonment from the Justice Court.

The public buildings, with the exception of the vault and some of the out buildings, are generally in good condition. The vault, especially the roof, is in bad condition. The roof is leaky, rendering the records and papers of various kinds liable to serious damage.

We therefore, recommend this matter to the immediate attention of the Board of Supervisors.

We fully recognize the advisability of frequent and careful examination of our Books and Records. Errors may creep in, and those errors sometimes of the most serious nature, no matter what care may be used. Any business worthy of the title must keep correct accounts. This can only be done by frequent and careful revisions. To this end we have resolved to employ an expert to examine the county Books and Records for the years 1893 and 1894, and ask to adjourn until Tuesday, the 5th day of March 1895, to act upon the report of the expert.

From reports received from various parts of the county, it appears that the recommendation of the last Grand Jury "That minors be not allowed in saloons" is not regarded in all instances. We desire to call the attention of the District officers to this matter.

We find the present road law and its workings, and the way it is administered, very unsatisfactory and extravagant. And the amount of benefit received out of harmony with the cash expended. We would recommend that measures be taken to have the present law amended so as to more fully meet the wants of Inyo Co.

ALBERT O. COLLINS
Foreman.

The Superior Court.

On Friday last the Hines case was continued. Volney Goodale, J. S. Gorman, A. V. Davidson, Hienan McCarrol were examined for the prosecution.

The Grand Jury filed their report, filing two indictments for felony and bench warrents were issued for the arrest of A. J. Murphy.

On Saturday last the time of trial of Arthur Matteer was continued until after the case of Jos. Espitallier.

In the Hines case Dr. I. J. Woodin, Miss C. E. Berkshire, David Holland and C. W. Craig were called and examined for the prosecution.

In the case of A. J. Murphy, on motion of P. H. Mack Esq. District Attorney consenting bail was reduced from $2,000 to $1,000.

On Monday the Murphy case was called and time for the arraingment of defendant was fixed for Friday, December 28, 1994, at 10 o'clock a. M.

The Hines case was continued, C. W. Craig being called for the prosecution. A. V. Davidson was also called.

Dying statement of Thomas J. Goodale offered in evidence, after striking out certain matter therein the document was admitted and marked exhibit "H".

In the afternoon, P. Reddy Esq. as counsel made opening statement for defense. Joseph Seely called and examined.

In the case of Jos. Espitallier vs. J. S. Gorman hearing was set for December 21, at 10 o'clock a. m.

On Tuesday the Hines trial was resumed. Joseph Seely, P. W. Forbes, S. G. Gregg, J. S. Gorman, T. W. Hill, W. H. Uhlmeyer, Wm. McDonald and W. R. Tootes were called and examined for the defense.

After filing a number of documents the defendant, James Hines was called and examined.

On Wednesday James Hines again occupied the stand for cross-examination, after which William Hines was called and examined. Luke E. Smith, C. A. Walter, D. W. Nerney, Jerome Nerney, and S. H. Spratt, were also called and examined for the defense. This took up the entire day and a recess was taken until Thursday.

On Thursday morning the case of Espitallier vs. Gorman was called and continued until Friday at 10 o'clock.

The Hines case was then resumed and the following witnesses were called and examined for the defense: William Rowan, Heenan McCarrol, Mrs. Kate Walter and J. S. Gorman whereupon the defendants rested their case.

H. T. Stebbins, was called by the prosecution to give testimony on rebuttal but was ruled out, and the prosecution closed. Special counsel J. W. P. Laird then delivered his opening statement to the jury and the court adjourned until this morning at 10 o'clock.

Hon. P. Reddy began his argument for the defense this morning and occupied about three hours, concluding this afternoon, when J. W. P. Laird Esq. made the closing argument on behalf of the people. It is almost certain that the case will be given ta the jury to-night.

There was another heavy rainstorm on Tuesday and Wednesday of this week. About .63 of an inch of snow fell, and an additional large amount of snow was precipitated in the mountains.

THE official reports show that no baking powder received an award over the Royal at the Chicago World's Fair.

The judge of awards on baking powder writes that the claim by another company to have received the highest award is false; that no such award was given to it.

The Royal Baking Powder is the purest and strongest baking powder made, and has received the highest award at the Great International Expositions and World's Fairs wherever exhibited in competition with others.

It makes the finest, lightest, sweetest, most wholesome bread, cake and pastry. More economical than any other leavening agent.

How Stout Got Stout.

THE REMARKABLE EXPERIENCE OF A RHEUMATIC SUFFERER.

All But Paralyzed—Lost His Flesh and Expected to Die—How He Got Well and Strong.

(From the Mt. Sterling, Ill., Republican.)

Few men are held in higher esteem by their fellow townspeople than Jas. W. Stout of Ripley, Ill., and it is due no doubt partly to this popularity that the record of the case has created such widespread interest. While his experience is not without an equal, yet, it has been sufficiently remarkable to demand the attention of thousands of people in Illinois, among whom are numbered some of the most eminent physicians.

In January, 1893, Mr. Stout was stricken with what was then believed to be sciatic rheumatism, and in a short time was barely able to hobble around on crutches, and it seemed to his friends that his days were numbered. To-day he is a strong, hearty looking man of 160 pounds.

How this wonderful change was brought about is most interesting as told to a representative of the Republican by Mr. Stout himself.

"I was afflicted with sciatic rheumatism and lumbago in January, 1893. The sciatic nerve on the right side became affected in the hip, running down to the ankle and across the small of the back to the left side, and soon my whole system became afflicted, causing me the most excruciating pain. In a very short time I become totally unable to attend to any business whatever, and the disease rapidly growing worse I had to take to my bed, where I lay suffering almost continuously for months the most agonizing torture, scarcely being able to move or be moved. At one time I lay for six weeks flat on my back, the slightest mevement causing me such pain as almost to throw me into convulsions. I cannot begin to express to you the intense pain I suffered. I was drawn, by the severeness of the malady, over to the left side; lost my appetite, had no desire for food, and what little I did eat I could not digest, the digestive organs failing to perform their duty, adding greatly to my already precarious condition. For weeks at a time I was unable to eat or sleep, suffering all the time most intensely and at times fearing I would lose my reason, and would have welcomed death to relieve me of my sufferings.

I consulted with local physicians and some of the most eminent specialists of the larger cities throughout the country, some treating me for one thing and some for another, but without effect, and I received no relief whatever. One physician told me I had double curvature of the spine and would eventually become paralyzed. I spent hundreds of dollars in the short time I was afflicted without receiving the least benefit. My friends all thought that there was no hope for me whatever and said that I must die, and I, myself, had almost given up in despair, when in September, 1893, about eight months after I was first afflicted, my attention was called to Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for pale people. Without much hope, I at once sent to C. F. Rickey & Co., Druggists, Mt. Sterling, Ill., and procured some of the pills and immediately began taking them. Before long I became aware of a great change for the better in my almost helpless condition. My appetite came back and my digestive organs performed their usual functions properly. I took some more and grew rapidly better—could sit up in a chair and my body began to straighten out; continued the treatment and in a short time was able to be about on crutches. My recovery from that time was very rapid and assured. My right leg, which before I commenced this treatment, was numb and dead, now experienced a pricking, tingling sensation. I was enabled to throw away my crutches and walk upright once more among my fellows, a better man physically than ever before. When first taken by the disease I weighed 160 pounds, was reduced to 115; I now weigh 166, more than I ever weighed at any time in my life. Yes, sir; I lay my recovery entirely to Pink Pills."

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People are an unfailing specific for such diseases as locomotor ataxia, partial paralysis, St. Vitus dance, sciatica, neuralgia, rheumatism, nervous headache, the after effects of la grippe, palpation of the heart, pale and sallow complexions and all forms of weakness either in male or female. Pink Pills are sold by all dealers, or will be sent post paid on receipt of price, (50 cents a box, or 6 boxes for $2.50—they are never sold in bulk or by the 100) by addressing Dr. Williams' Med. Co., Schenectady, N.Y.

AN OLD FISHERMAN'S VIEWS.

The following incident, which is an actual fact, has in it a sharp suggestion to every one of us.

Some wealthy young man in New York, who had been fishing and shooting last summer at a lonely sea-island off the Southern coast, brought home their guide for a few days' visit, prompted partly by kindness, and partly by a mischievous desire to surprise the ignorant old savage by the luxury and splendor of their homes.

Joe, however, walked quietly about in his clean homespun suit, manifesting little surprise and less admiration.

"Now, Joe," said one of the boys, nettled somewhat by his calmness, "tell me candidly what you think of New York? Isn't it grand?"

"It 'pears too shut in for to call it that," the old fishreman said, reluctantly, unwilling to be ungrateful or uncivil. "My cabin has all outdoors behind it, an' ther sea in front. Thet's what I call grand."

"Oh, certainly. But wouldn't you like to give up your drudgery and live as New Yorkers do?"

"No," said Joe, thoughtfully. "Taint as easy livin' here. Your uncle sets in his bank all ther day, an' your father in court, an' I set in my boat. They fish for men an' I fish for mackerel. They hev to study and fret to catch their fish, I don't."

"Well," said the boy, discomfitted, "wouldn't you like your wife to live in a house like this?" glancing around the stately rooms filled with costly draperies and bric-a-brac.

"No!" said Joe, laughing. "Jane scrubs our two rooms an' cleans them up, an' then she sets an' rests, or has some fun. She never 'ud finish keepin' this house tidy."

"Oh, my mother has plenty of servants to do that."

"Yes. An' she told me they was a onbearable weight an' a worry on her."

"But we see people," urged the lad, "and have music and gaiety, and many things to see?"

"We have company, too; we ain't buried! Ther neighbors come an' set round evenin's an' tell stories an' sing. I reckon we enjoy ourselves as much as you do at your big dinners."

There was a short pause.

"We've got friends, like you," Joe went on, gravely, "an' our families. It's the same thing in ther long run. Your preacher in that gilt pulpit said pretty much the same words as old Parson Martin does. An' when we die we rest jest as quiet under the grass as under them thousand dollar monymints you showed me. I'm glad I've seen it all," he added, smiling, "an' it was kind in you to show me. But it don't seem to make such a diff'rence between you an' me as I thought it would. Inside we're pretty much alike."

"That's a good sermon you've preached to me," the lad said, laughing. "I wasn't aweer I was preachin', Joe said, anxiously.—Youth's Companion.

The official reports show that no baking powder received an award over the Royal at the Chicago World's Fair.

The judge of awards on baking powder, Dr. H. W. Wiley, writes that the claim of another copmany to having received the highest award is false; that no such award was given to it.

The Royal Baking Powder is the purest and strongest baking powder made, and has received the highest award at every fair, wherever exhibited in competition with others.

There is a stream in India where at one point 3,000,000 cubic feet of water makes a clear drop of 200 feet. It is proposed to utilize this remarkable fall through the medium of twelve turbine water wheels of 1,000-horse power each, to generate electricity and transmit it over a line 110 miles long. The current will be used for power in mills, shops, etc., as well as for street cars, boats and lighting.

Owing to the bad state of the finances of Montreal the Board of Alderman at a recent meeting recommended that all properties now exempt from taxation be taxed one half of their assessed value. These properties include churches of all denominations, parsonages, hospitals, religious institutions of all kinds and educational establishments, the whole said to amount to $34,185,894.

SLUG SIX.

And the Reforms She Made In That Composing Room.

Slug Six was the prettiest girl in the composing room, and that is a large saying, for all lady typos were charming creatures.

But Slug Six was not merely pretty. She was exquisite, and more than that. All the boys were in love with her. They avowed it openly—that is, all the boys except Slug Thirty-seven. If he was in love with her, he never boasted about it. Perhaps he was too shy, or perhaps he was inspired by one of those queer passions which Slug Nineteen called a really truly love, and hence found it too deep for utterance. Or perhaps, again, there was some black eyed beauty down in Dixie to whose remembered charms he remained faithful.

For Slug Thirty-seven came from "South Cahlina." He was a tall, serious, sunburned youth and very green about city ways. At first he was quite in despair at the complications of a large printing office.

"You see, I came from a country printin office," he confessed to Slug Six. "I nevah saw copy cut in 'takes' this way befo'e."

"I am sure the foreman is very kind," she said.

"Yes, ma'am, the fo'eman is kindness itself, but it's the galley boy I'm afraid of."

Slug Six smiled.

"He is an autocratic young gentleman, isn't he?" she said. "But you're a good compositor—better than the most of us, in fact. You will get along all right in a few days, and if there's ever anything in which I can help you I hope you will not hesitate to call upon me."

"Thank you, ma'am. You are very kind. I'll be suah to do it."

The boys were highly amused at Thirty-seven's innocence. They would get him to talk about South Cahlina and Gawgy and then laugh hysterically at his quaint southernisms.

Slug Six was sorry to see him chaffed so cruelly.

But Slug Thirty-seven wasn't such an "easy mark" as they took him to be. It was not apparent at first, but they gradually discovered that he gave them tit for tat, and quite often, in the height of their hilarity, they were shocked to find out that the laugh was really on his side.

And Slug Six, who was much surprised at this, was very glad of it—perhaps unreasonably glad.

There were more surprises in store for her, however.

"You know," said Thirty-seven, laying his stick on the case one morning and turning toward her, "you know I haven't been to a theatah since I came heah."

"Haven't you, really? Well, you ought to go."

"Yes, ma'am, that's what I think, but I nevah did like to go anywhah alone."

Slug Six had no comment to make.

"I thought," he continued, "that perhaps you would go with me some evenin?"

"Oh, I don't know. I—I"—

"Of co'se, I had no right to expect you to go," he said gently, "and if you would rathah not"—

"It isn't that," she replied, realizing that he was entitled to perfect frankness, "indeed, I should like very much to go, but you see I haven't known you very long, and my parents are not acquainted with you at all."

"Yes, ma'am, that's so," he said and went back to his work.

Slug Six saw that he was hurt and hurt bad. She felt highly uncomfortable about it. He was certainly a gentleman, and she had wanted to go to "Charley's Aunt" so long.

Later in the day she came and stood timidly beside him.

"Mr. Woodruff," It was the first time anybody in the office, excepting the cashier, had ever spoken his name. It sounded sweetly strange from her lips. "Mr. Woodruff, I have been thinking that perhaps, if you care to, you might come out some evening—say tomorrow evening—and get acquainted with my father. Then we can ask mamma about the theater, you know."

That was three months ago.

And Slug Twenty-three, who is a bachelor old enough to be called "uncle" by all the typesetters and is therefore excellent authority on matters matrimonial, now says he soon expects to be invited to the wedding. He gives the following reasons for his belief:

Slug Thirty-seven has quit chewing tobacco. He puts $12 in the savings bank every Saturday night. He studies the "for rent" advertisements with great solicitude and is interested to an unusual degree in the price of provisions.

Slug Six has a new light in her beautiful eyes. Last Sunday she might have been seen closely scrutinizing a four room flat near Lincoln park. And there has been a dressmaker at her house sewing ever so busily for two whole weeks.—Chicago News.

The British Empire.

The British empire is a political creation unparalleled in the world's history not only by its extent and population, in both of which respects it is slightly surpassed by China, but because, with an area of more than 10,000,000 square miles and with 352,000,000 inhabitants, it is scattered over the whole globe. It embraces all zones, from the icy wilderness of Hudson bay to the tropical jungles of India and the mahogany forests of Honduras. There is scarcely a product which a British province does not bring forth in excellent quality, and not less various are the degrees of civilization of its inhabitants, from the Kaffirs of the cape to the highly cultivated citizens of Toronto or Sydney. We find, with Christians of all confessions, 200,000,000 Hindoos, about 70,000,000 Mohammedans and 8,000,000 Buddhists, and the Bible is printed in 130 languages and dialects represented in the empire; yet, notwithstanding such promiscuous elements, the government, with rare exceptions, maintains order, and no sign of dissolution is visible.—Dr. F. Heinrich Geffcken in Forum.

Romance and Reality.

"I say, is this here the novel you advised me to read?" said the cabman to the librarian.

"Yes," replied the librarian. "That's the one."

"Well," said the cabman, "you can just take it back. There's nine people in the first four chapters who hired cabs, and each of 'em when he got out 'flung his purse to the driver.' Now, when I want that sort of literature, I'll go to Jools Vernes and get it pure."—London Tit-Bits.

A young woman who has a kindergarten in Avenue C has a practice of telling the children stories. One day she called for a return of the favor, whereupon a small girl began in a whisper: "Once there was a father and a mother, and the mother got sick, and she said, 'Be good to me, I'm sick.' And she kept on being sick, and they died in each other's arms." Certainly, for brevity and breadth, this laconic tragedy could hardly have been better put. In these thirty-five words there are elements enough for a three column tale.

Coffee For Impaired Digestion.

If you find that coffee disagrees with you, yet are unwilling to give it up, try drinking it without sugar and cream. It is said that the combination of coffee, sugar and cream is bad for a person with impaired digestion, but that clear coffee may be taken without disturbance.

PATRONS PUT ON THEIR HONOR.

Success of Restaurants at Which No Checks Are Given to Customers.

In the matter of personal honor there is a new and wonderful exhibit on the pleasant side. A big restaurant was opened a little while ago in the busiest part of lower Broadway. It occupies a very deep store on the sidewalk level, fitted up very handsomely with polished woods and broad mirrors, and it has an extensive outfit of luncheon counters and sideboards. It is meant for the accommodation of hasty midday eaters.

Hot dishes are served in a jiffy, there is an astonishingly diverse assortment of sandwiches at hand and the prices are as low as those which rule in the cheap and sloppy sort of eating houses. The scheme of the proprietor seems to have been to supply viands of the best quality, with a luxurious place in which to eat them, and at the lowest possible rate, depending upon the largeness of the business for profit.

But the novelty and wonder of the place is the fact that the visitor pays what he chooses for his luncheon—or, at best, he thinks he does. No check is given to him. After eating and drinking as much as he likes he passes toward the exit and there comes to one of those automatic machines that impress figures into a card. To the operator of this apparatus the customer names the amount which, by his own figuring, he ought to pay, being easily guided in his arithmetic by the conspicuous placarding of prices, as well as by the printed bill of fare. Then the employee turns a crank, grinds out a check for the amount and the honor bound man passes along to the cashier's desk and pays.

Of course it is likely that more of a watch is kept upon the eaters than they are aware of, but to all appearances the polite waiters are utterly oblivious to anything except serving the food, and the machine man and cashier do not betray the slightest solicitude as to getting what is due. Probably the shrewd proprietor realized that in the great competition of down town lunchrooms he needed to do something singular to advertise his establishment, and so he hit upon this device of placing the lunchers upon their honor. The success seems to be enormous.—New York Cor. Pittsburg Post.

Substitute for Iron Pipes.

W. H. Preece, who is well known in England as the electrician in charge of the governmental postal telegraph service, in writing on the retardation due to iron pipes, comments on the tendency of engineers to put wires in iron pipes under ground to secure safety from wind and snow. This is done at the expense of effectiveness, and long lines of iron piping will probably be death to fast speed telegraphy. Of course in telephony iron piping is seriously detrimental to single wire working, but then no one would now dream of using any but the metallic circuit system in any underground work.

But Mr. Preece offers for the serious consideration of electrical engineers another point. He says: "May not wood or earthenware or cement replace iron as a conduit for electrical conductors, and be made equally effective for the mechanical and economical point of view? There is no doubt that this question will presently be answered by the production of a conduit that will entirely supersede the iron pipe, which now is the nearest appliance to the hand of the engineer."—New York Telegram.

The Primitive Baby.

Dr. Louis Robinson, in The North American Review, studies the evolution of the primtive child. If the modern baby is fat and descends from an arboreal lineage, why has it "rotundity of outline?" How could a mother monkey, trying to escape from, say, a python, climb a tree with a fat little monkey? The supposition is that babies are fairly fat in order better to withstand loss of sustenance at the beginning of their lives. Then at the commencement, when the primitive infant was lanky, there must have been an enormous waste of life; hence the survival of only the chubby babies, and the constant elimination by means of death from want of thousands upon thousands of infants of the primitive simian type.

Canned Corn Factories in Maine.

There are not less than twenty-five factories in the state of Maine where green corn is put up by the hundred thousand cans. More sweet corn and better sweet corn can be raised to the acre in Maine than anywhere on earth.

THE BURDEN BEARER.

There is a big insulated wire in telegraphy which transmits the bulk of daily intelligence; there is a big insulated nerve in the human system which can bear the burden of more pain than all the rest of the nerves combined, and is known as the sciatic nerve. Sometimes the wire is cut to cut off its current; sometimes the surgeon's knife is used to cut the nerve to relieve excruciating pain. But there is one thing which avoids this radical treatment: one cure which penetrates to the pain-spot, and sciatica has been cured almost without fail by the use of St. Jacob's Oil. It reaches misery's seat and dethrones it. Thus attacked and routed in its hidden ambuscade pain seldom returns to annoy. The great remedy does its work well.

When Others Fail

Hood's Sarsaparilla builds up the shattered system, by giving vigorous action to the digestive organs, creating an appetite and purifying the blood. It is prepared by modern methods, possesses the greatest curative powers, and has the most wonderful record of actual cures of any medicine in existence. Be sure to get only Hood's.

Hood's Sarsaparilla Cures

"Hood's Sarsaparilla is the best medicine I have ever taken for a blood purifier. I had a tired feeling, and was restless at night. I feel much better since taking Hood's Sarsaparilla. I have taken a great many other medicines, but they have given me no relief. My wife and children have also taken Hood's Sarsaparilla for purifying the blood with beneficial results. LITTLE PEOPLE.

Little Girl—Did you ever dream of being in heaven? Little Boy—No, not exactly; but I dreamed once that I was right in the middle of a big apple dumpling.—Good News.

Some weeks ago London "Tit-Bits" offered a prize for the most puzzling question asked by a child. The competitor won who sent in the following: "Mother, where does yesterday go to, and where is next week kept?"

Tommy has a pop-corn ball and a penny; Frank has a bag of peanuts. Frank—Let's play store! You buy a penny's worth of my peanuts; n'en I'll buy a penny's worth of your pop-corn; n'en you can buy some more peanuts, 'n' I can buy some more pop-corn, 'n' you— Tommy—Yes, but (cautiously), but who'll have the penny when everythin's e't up?—Exchange.

An unspeakable Thing—One day the children were having an object lesson on the blue heron. The teacher called attention to its small tail, saying: "The bird has no tail to speak of." 98% of all cases of consumption can, if taken in the earlier stages of the disease, be cured. This may seem like a bold assertion to those familiar only with the means generally in use for its treatment; as, nasty codliver oil and its filthy emulsions, extract of malt, whiskey, different preparations of hypophosphites and such like palliatives.

Although by many believed to be incurable, there is the evidence of hundreds of living witnesses to the fact that, in all its earlier stages, consumption is a curable disease. Not every case, but a large percentage of cases, and we believe, fully 98 per cent. are cured by Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, even after the disease has progressed so far as to induce repeated bleedings from the lungs, severe lingering cough with copious expectoration (including tubercular matter), great loss of flesh and extreme emaciation and weakness.

Do you doubt that hundreds of such cases reported to us as cured by "Golden Medical Discovery" were genuine cases of that dread and fatal disease? You need not take our word for it. They have, in nearly every instance, been so pronounced by the best and most experienced home physicians, who have no interest whatever in misrepresenting them, and who were often strongly prejudiced and advised against a trial of "Golden Medical Discovery," but who have been forced to confess that it surpasses, in curative power over this fatal malady, all other medicines with which they are acquainted. Nasty codliver oil and its filthy "emulsions" and mixtures, had been tried in nearly all these cases and had either utterly failed to benefit, or had only seemed to benefit a little for a short time. Extract of malt, whiskey, and various preparations of the hypophosphites had also been faithfully tried in vain.

The photographs of a large number of those cured of consumption, bronchitis, lingering coughs, asthma, chronic nasal catarrh and kindred maladies, have been skillfully reproduced in a book of 160 pages which will be mailed to you, on receipt of address and six cents in stamps. You can then write those cured and learn their experience.

HAUNTED!

A haunted house in these practical and unromantic days is something of a rarity, but an individual haunted with the idea that his ailment is incurable is a personage frequently met with. Disbelief in the ability of medicine to cure is only a mild form of monomania, although in some cases repeated failures to obtain relief from many different sources would almost seem to justify the doubt. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters has demonstrated its ability to overcome dyspepsia, constipation, liver and kidney trouble, malarial complaints and nervousness, and its recorded achievements in the curative line ought at least to warrant its trial by any one troubled with either of the above ailments, even although his previous efforts to obtain remedial aid have been fruitless. Used with persistance, the Bitters will conquer the most obstinate cases.

COLORADO

Is a splendid place for people with weak lungs, but thousands of people in that condition cannot possibly go to Colorado. There is not one, however, who cannot keep a supply of ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS. The moment any one feels that he has taken cold, one of these world-renowned plasters should be put on the back between the shoulder blades, and another on the chest.

These will serve two purposes. They will protect the delicate lungs and will also relieve the congestion occasioned by the cold. ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS keep the pores of the skin open and assist nature in her remedial work. They neither burn nor blister, and can be worn without the slightest inconvenience.

APPROPRIATE FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

"Little Miss Faith" is a story for young readers that is marked by wholesome love for all that is best and helpful in life and by tender pathos, written by Grace le Baron (Mrs. Henry M. Upham) of Boston. It tells of the influence for good of a little invalid who selects for her chum a girl of lower social station. The story is told in simple language which any child may understand. The author shows rare knowledge of child nature, and, as this is the first of the Hazelwood series, we may look for more stories from her pen. [Boston: Lee & Shepard.

A CELESTIAL CREW.

Pig-Tailed Jack Tars on Board a Steamer.

THE PING SUEY A MARINE BEAUTY.

A Female Correspondent Visits the Crew of a Chinese Vessel now Lying in Baltimore Harbor.

Baltimore has been enjoying the novelty of a steamship manned by Chinamen, and, along with the rest of the folk, I have been enjoying it, too, and that from a closer standpoint than any other woman, except the friend who braved the "interview" with me. The captain being "off shore" at the time of our call, the first engineer, Mr. Dorward, and first officer, Mr. McCollom, were left to do the honors of the vessel, and it must be said they proved worthy of the trust—that is after they had gotten over the first surprise of women being interested in a trading vessel and its Godless crew, and not being missionaries, either! Of the "Christianizing influence' they confessed to have had enough and to spare on this their last voyage, since they had brought out two "lady missionaries," who had held services at any hour they could get the crew to listen to them, and it had to be admitted they were "capital talkers."

But we were not missionaries, only newspaper women, rather more interested in the temporal condition of the crew than in the spiritual—more shame to us.

Standing at the foot of the apparently inaccessible ship's ladder and looking up to the deck at the number of flying pigtails and then at the characters on the side of the big vessel which stood for her name, one could easily imagine the whole a great floating laundry. The Ping Suey has a crew of twenty-six Chinamen, all looking as much alike as peas in a pod, and at the hour of our visit engaged in scrubbing the deck, cleaning glass, greasing the beautiful machinery, which we were assured was exceptionally fine, and cooking the luncheon, which, judging by the odor from a big brown mystery just then being taken from the oven, we think would likely be pronounced "good," like the first thing created, by those who ate thereof. Not being able to get away from the idea that it was a rat pie, we declined the invitation to stay and "sample it."

We were much more interested in the great, beautiful vessel than in anything to eat. We are not posing as authority on ships, but do vote this one a beauty—a black beauty, since her hull is painted black—while the upper deck and inside of the rail are white freshly painted, a showy combination for all "hers" at the present time.

All her jewelry in the way of brass work showed the gleam of recent and thorough polishing. Everywhere the utmost cleanliness prevailed. The vessel is built of iron and steel from stem to stern. She was built in Glasgow. She has a stout, solid body like a mature woman, but with something of the grace of youth showing in her clean-cut graceful lines fore and aft.

She impresses one upon first sight that if she had been a woman instead of a ship she would have belonged to the "progressive," one who would go in for "her rights" and all that sort of thing.

But as a ship she seemed to be confident of her strength. Her hull, we were told, is 41 feet wide and 26 feet deep, and that she can carry 3,079 tons, or enough tea to give every one of the 1,500,000 people in New York about four pounds apiece. She is 375 feet long and 42 feet beam, and sails under the British flag between London, Liverpool and Glasgow and Japanese and Chinese ports in the trade.

She was just 85 days and nights at her best sailing speed coming from Yokohama and Shanghai through the Suez canal, past Gibraltar and across the Atlantic to New York.

During the Ping Suey's eighty-five days' run from Yokohama to New York she picked up two ship wrecked crews. On September 7th, while in the Indian Ocean, near the island of Ga-or, the officers sighted the German steamer Erlanger ashore on a coral reef. She had been three weeks there, going to pieces. She had carried a cargo of silver. The officers and crew and a German band on board had escaped in a small boat and reached the Island of Ga-or, a mile from the wreck. They were living in tents and on friendly terms with the natives. When taken off the island by the Ping Suey the German band played "Die Wacht am Rhine."

The other crew rescued was that of B. R. Woodside. One hundred miles from New York this schooner was sighted. The bowsprit and masts had been carried away and waves were washing over the dismantled vessel.

The second officer of the Ping Suey and four volunteers, set off in a small boat to her rescue, and it took hard work all the night long to get lines from the steamer to the schooner, but it was finally accomplished, and they towed her into New York.

The Chinamen no board the Ping Suey compose three gangs of firemen, half dozen cooks, which the officers assured us are the best of cooks, and the balance are servants to the captain and engineers.

They occupy the one-half of the forecastle, eating and sleeping apart from the other seamen. Their bunks are filled with Chinese matting, and scattered here and there are tiny tea-kettles of most fascinating shapes and colors. Large jars with bamboo lattice work around them, and no end of tobacco boxes of every kind and manufacture. Sticking out of crevices everywhere were little bundles, which, from the gold embroidered cloth about them, we imagined must contain treasures—their gods, maybe.

And then there were tapers, which they burn, and these were bundled in red gilt-lettered paper; and there were long-handled banjos, with small drum-heads, said to be of snakeskin, and any number of bamboo stools, which were mostly drawn close to the portholes, where the light was best, and left there, with books all in Chinese character-print. There was no evidence of cards about, but Mr. Dorward assured us they had not left their favorite game of fan-tan behind them, but played it every odd moment. They have their own cook in the forecastle and full license to "muss up" their victuals to their own taste.

Their everyday clothes when on a cruise are thin white trousers, wide, full blue blouse, white stockings and the usual thick, round-soled, turned-up shoes. But evidently they have found the thin white wear a trifle airy for this climate, since something heavier in the way of blue trousers has been substituted, and, doubtless in order to lessen the danger of hanging by their own pigtails, they have them wound round the body and then the last yard or two of end thrust in a pocket. Altogether, they looked upon this morning very laundry-like, and were in such a talkative mood that, but for an occasional weary-looking grin, we might have thought there was a "scrap" among them or that they were plotting mutiny.

However, the sight of the so numerous guns and other warlike paraphernalia which rendered fierce the deck would doubtless have dampened any such plot. Our hosts gave us only good report of the Celestials, both in respect to obedience and adaptability, and would not agree with us, who had never been to either country, and therefore the more full of opinions, that the Japanese were in every way superior to the Chinese. "The Japs are a race of apes, of imitators only, and they are plainly in the wrong in the present trouble," etc. We realized we had struck Chinese sympathizers; also that we had struck gentlemen of great refinement in the Scotch hosts, as evidenced in the tasteful and homelike decorations of the close quarters wherein they sleep and otherwise pass time when off duty.

Mr. Dorwood is a photographer of more than amateur pretensions, and to look through his album of photographs taken in different far away countries, as often as they were in port, we found to be a great delight. Many such scenes have been photographed to order for the London "Graphic." On the walls of both the engineer's room and that of the captain were pictures of their respective wives and children, books, growing plants and all such trifling, but yet unmistakable, evidences of the man of heart and the man of culture.

But perhaps the greatest curiosity on board to us was what we called the "barnyard." There we saw great quacking geese with feet like palm leaf fans, which we were told had been brought from Foo Chow. There were dozens at first, but some had been killed and eaten on the way. When out at sea these geese were allowed the freedom of the deck. The same with the sheep, only three remaining of quite a drove brought out of China. These looked lean and lank to us, but we were assured they were excellent meat all the same and that they never fattened or rounded out but were by nature as slender and as graceful as were some women.

All during our visit the vessel was filled with songs of birds, which hung in curious wicker cages in the unexpected corners of the ship. These were Chinese birds, too. And there was belonging to this floating Zoo a sad-eyed, homesick cat, but dear knows where the cat came from—one forenoon is too short a time to learn everything in, and in learning that the Ping Suey of the China Mutual Steam Navigation Company was a place of interest and education we felt that we had learned enough.—Meg, in Philadelphia Times.

THE OLIVE AT PALERMO.

J. E. Schram, a very successful grower of olives at Palermo, gives the Oroville "Register" some details that will interest all who are engaged in olive culture: "I have four acres in Mission olives, most of which were planted five years ago. The soil is rather heavy red land with good surface drainage, and which will average about two and a-half feet to hardpan.

The trees have made a good growth and bore their first fruit last winter about thirty-five gallons in all. I irrigate and cultivate my olive trees the same as I do my orange trees five or six times during the season, and I think on shallow red lands the olive requires as much water as the orange, for while the olive will live without irrigation and with poor cultivation, I think there is no tree that will respond to good treatment more freely than the olive, and I think it profitable to care for it well, for trees in Palermo that have been well irrigated and cared for have grown more in one year than those which have not in two years.

prune and head back my olive trees in February, and try to keep the tree top well balanced and not too high, thinking, for various reasons, that a low and not too open a head is the best. The Mission olive ripens here in November. I had good success with my pickles, and every one who tasted them thought them very fine and superior to the foreign pickled olives. The olive at Palermo has developed no disease or pest of any kind, and we have had no loss by cold or wet, it being the hardiest tree planted here, and it is growing in all kinds of soil. Nearly all of the trees planted here are of the Mission variety. While I think this is the best olive at present, I also think that some of the later kinds will prove superior to it.

LIVING IN NEW YORK.

The Outlay for Rent, Food and Clothing.

APPEARANCES HAVE TO BE KEPT UP.

Expenditures in Gotham on Incomes Ranging all the Way from $1,000 to $5,000 a Year.

Rent, food and clothing are the heavy items in most expenditure accounts that are defrayed out of a moderate income. In a city like New York they are heaviest of all and too frequently leave no margin whatever. Those who speak of saving a tenth of one's income too frequently forget that the very continuance of one's income is in itself an item of expenditure. A man must often live up to his income to insure its permanence. For instance, a man may earn $2500 a year but if he do not dress well, if he fail to be generous in cigars, little luxuries and nothings of one kind and another, he cannot maintain himself against rivals for his place. Thus it is that one of the conditions tacitly precedent to the receipt of a good salary is that nothing shall be saved out of it. At any rate, there are hosts of men in New York acting upon that theory.

A resident of the metropolis earning $1000 a year almost invariably, if he be married, lives in a flat. Flats in Harlem, the upper section of the city, can be had for as little as $20 a month, but they have but five rooms and no bathroom. A six-room flat with a bathroom costs $25 a month at least, and then you must go up to the top of the house. An ordinarily good flat in a nice neighborhood brings $40 to $75 a month. One can secure flats on the East Side for as low as $18, but they have no bath, and children are not permitted. This is owing to the fact that a cheap flat full of children is apt to degenerate into a tenement. But rent alone may be safely calculated upon to eat up $300 of a $1,000 income.

Looking higher up the scale we reach house rent. A respectable house, so far as appearance and locality are concerned, is hardly to be had in New York under $2,000 a year. That would send a $2,000 man into an apartment house. An apartment house may be described as an aristocratic flat, except that it is not primarily designed for housekeeping. A suit of good apartments may be had for as little as $60 a month, but a fair price is $100. Yet $200 near Central Park is an ordinary rental.

Some of the large hotels like to have a married couple without children, as it looks well and imparts a domestic air to the establishment. Special rates can be made for two rooms by the month as a permanency. Hotels do not like children but they will accept them at a price. For a $2,000 income, $750 yearly is a fair outlay for rent. A $3,000 man might set up in a really fashionable apartment house. But the cheapest arrangement of all is to rent a few rooms in a private house. There are hundreds of houses all over New York in which good rooms are to be had. If furnished, a second-story room in a good location may be had for $10 a week. An adjoining room would cost $5 more. That would make $750 yearly for rent, provided a man had no children. People in New York who rent rooms have a great horror of children, as many parents could tell you. A whole floor in a well-furnished house would cost $1,000 a year unless the location was exceptionally good.

When a man's income, however, is up to $3,000 a year he naturally thinks of a house to himself, unless he be single. New houses in New York are almost luxuries. Rents are very high. Two thousand dollars a year will get you a litte better than a plain two-story in a dubious neighborhood. A fair-looking three-story brick in a nice locality costs $3,000 a year and the scale rises to the $20,000 a year, if Fifth avenue, which even then commands nothing to boast of. This is one reason why so many well-to-do New Yorkers live in hotels or apartment houses. However, if a man be good at driving a bargain, he can get a nice house occasionally for $2,500 a year. Then he might rent one or two of his rooms to a nice single young man.

We will now ascend into the $5,000 a year region. There are very many men in New York with this income who find it pays to spend more than half of it for rent. In the first place, to live in your own house in the metropolis is almost a certificate of financial responsibility. People argue that you can't do it unless you have money. For $3,000 a decent house can be had.—almost fashionable house, for now and then New York houses get obstinately empty, and landlords grow anxious for tenants.

Food in New York is not dearer than elsewhere, but people consume more of it. For some reason or other, New Yorkers have usually big appetites. A man who will tolerate no housekeeping must expect to pay $5 a week table board. But if he will endure his wife's cooking, food enough to feed a family one year can be bought for $300. But they will only live. People who live in flats on a $1,000 yearly income, however, manage to get along on $300 worth of food per annum. A good table can be set for three on $600 a year. It may be said on this matter of eating, that in a good boarding-house eating will cost $5 a week per person. There are good apartment houses in which guests are allowed the privilege of the table for $6 a week each, additional. A man whose income amounts to $3,000 yearly would pay a fifth of it in food for his family in New York. A $5,000 man would be obliged to give up say a sixth. That presupposes economy like wise.

Clothing is cheap in New York, as cheap as anywhere. Some men dress well on $200 a year. But they own no dress suits or silk hats. A good dresser would spend about $800; a very fashionable dresser $2,000. Womens' attire is more complicated. Some members of the fair sex in the metropolis have $5,000 yearly to dress well upon, and can't do it. A man spends about one-fifth of his income for dress in New York. Luxuries are surprisingly high in the metropolis. A fair seat in a theatre costs $2. Books are higher in New York than anywhere else in the country. In the Empire City they ask $2 for a book that in Philadelphia could be purchased for $1.50. Then transportation eats up a goodly sum annually. You can hardly pass a day without paying at least two fares to get somewhere or other. This is because the city is so long and narrow and its places of importance or of interest are arranged up and down the city instead of on side streets. This feature of the metropolis is one of the first to attract the attention of newcomers. The difficulty is enhanced by the fact that cab hire is at least twice as high as it is in Philadelphia or in Boston.

Then little suppers are costly in New York. You can get less in that line for $20 than $10 would bring in another city. The cooking is not particularly good, either. A man who wants to live well in New York should spend his money on his home. If he spends it outside he almost invariably regrets it.

To sum up: A married man with $1,000 a year can live on $900 in a little flat in a poor neighborhood. On $2,000 he can do well in a cozy flat and save $300. With $3,000 he can have a house of his own across the river and put by $500. The $5,000 family man is apt to be extravagant. With a house in town he may, by economizing, save $600, and live well.

And the unmarried? They are usually the worst off. They fritter away all they make and either marry or die. They certainly do not make out as well as the men who marry.—Boston Herald.

MERITS OF THE JERSEY.

The Jersey has been well demonstrated a milk machine. Small usually, in size, there is no room for surplus fat while she is making the rich milk for which she is noted. Mr. Wayback may continue to feed a large cow through many years in order that finally she may make more beef, but he who is abreast of the times adopts the economic Jersey. A beef breed the Jersey is not, but every part of the little cow has a use in producing the present profit of her owner.

The reasons for the so general adoption of the Jersey as the cow for all purposes are numerous and important.

Along most lines the Jersey has no superior. Quality and quantity of butter product, small cost of keeping, the ability to trace her pedigree through many generations, these are some of the points in which the Jersey is invulnerable. From being called the "gentleman's cow," her superiority has gradually asserted itself until, as a dairy cow, such records are registered for her as can be shown by no other known breed.

The idea is prevalent that the Jersey is a cow only to be owned by the wealthy cattle breeder. No greater mistake could be made. Economy points to the Jersey as the cow also for him who uses but a single head for family purposes. True, the original expense may be somewhat greater for a Jersey of good breeding than for a cow of common stock; but can we say that it would be economy in this age for the publisher of any newspaper, however small its circulation, to use a press such as Caxton employed because its cost would be less than that of one of those models of ingenuity in use to-day? The utility of the Jersey, and her adaptability to all situations, were fitly praised in a recent number of the "Country Gentleman: The Jersey cow that can average a pound of butter for 365 days in a year, with good care, is the cow for the millions, and it has been proved that the Jersey will do this five to one over all other breeds, and with less feed.—C. E. Keck, in Southern Cultivator.

ODDITIES IN FACT AND FICTION.

It is said that the secretary bird in attacking a snake uses one wing as a shield and the other as a club. There is no information as to what the treasurer bird does when it tackles a safe.

One of the ostriches on Berry's farm, about thirty miles north of Denver, got her neck tied in a knot while trying to swallow a pudding dish, and was strangled before she could be untied.

James McHenry and Frank Delman quarreled over a wager in Wheeling, Va., and injured each other fatally with sickles which they were using in a truck patch. McHenry bet that he could name an American city of more than 90,000 inhabitants where at the next election the Democratic party would not get three votes. When called to name the city McHenry said it was Washington, D. C. Delman admitted the truth of the assertion, but said it was a catch bet. The fatal encounter followed.

SHIPPING FRUIT.

The Auction Plan Has Developed New Markets.

A GLUTTED MARKET CONFRONTS US.

H. Weinstock of Sacramento, Explains the Causes of Low Fruit Prices in Eastern Markets.

"The California fruit-shipping industry," says the Sacramento "Bee," "is confronted by a problem somewhat similar to that which existed in 1885 and 1886, and which was satisfactorily solved by the adoption of the auction plan of marketing. At that time, with shipments of only about 1,000 carloads per year, the markets were apparently over-glutted and poor prices resulted. The auction plan developed new markets and 4,000 and 5,000 carloads were shipped with profit. Now 7,000 carloads nearly go eastward, and there is again an apparent overproduction with unfortunate results. As a fact, however, some markets are glutted and prices ruined, while others that could take a certain amount of fruit at profitable rates are neglected. This results from the present large number of independent shippers, and that each is ignorant of the markets chosen by the other."

H. Weinstock of Sacramento, who was the prime mover in the adoption of the auction for the sale of California fruit, writes to the "Bee" substantially as follows in explanation of the causes of low prices received in Eastetrn markets this year for California green fruits, and giving his views of the remedies needed:

"So far as I can see them, the causes for the low prices are manifold and may be enumerated as follows: First, the glutting of markets; second, the railway strike; third, hard times; fourth, unsatisfactory railway service.

"We find ourselves in 1894 back again to similar conditions that existed in 1885 and 1886—with this difference: in those years about 1,000 carloads glutted the markets of the East; this year it takes about 7,000 carloads to do it.

"In spite of the railway strike, the hard times and the unsatisafctory railway service, the year 1894 should have been a prosperous year for the California fruit-grower, who, so to speak, had for the first time in the history of the fruit industry the great markets of the East largely to himself, an opportunity caused by the almost total failure of the Easten crop, and such as may not again present itself in many years. This golden opportunity, however, was largely wasted through lack of proper and intelligent distribution of his products.

"As a rule, the markets of the East were kept constantly glutted and the prices to the grower thereby made ruinously low.

"I, for one, do not believe that in a year like this, with a perfect fruit famine in the East, 7,000 carloads should glut all the great markets east of the Rocky Mountains, especially when it is known that the market of New York city alone has, in the past, without breaking, consumed as many as 500 carloads of domestic peaches in one week. The fault is not with the fruit nor with the markets, but with our manner of distribution. Fortunately this is a matter that can be remedied.

"During the earlier history of the auction sale system it was comparatively easy to regulate the distribution of our fruits in the East, from the fact that over 90 per cent. of the shipments were made through two mediums, the California Fruit Union and the Earl Fruit Company, which made it possible to more or less regulate its distribution. But within the past year or two new conditions have arisen. In place of the great bulk of the fruit passing chiefly through two hands, a large number of co-operative companies, eastern brokers, fruit commission men and others have entered the field and have been making indiscriminate shipments to the various Eastern markets, resulting in disaster all around. Each shipper has, naturally, endeavored to hide his movements from all others, and the result has been that all have worked in the dark, and the routing of the fruit has been almost entirely a matter of guess-work.

"Early this year I foresaw the present results and advocated the establishment of a bureau of information, to be supported by all engaged in shipping fruit, whether growers or shippers. The purpose of this bureau of information being to issue daily bulletins to all subscribers, showing the condition of each market, the prices realized for the various fruits at various selling points the preceding day, and the contents and the destination of the cars of fruit eastward bound, so that all shippers might each morning have before them a photograph, so to speak, of the situation, and in that way be enabled to more intelligently determine where their fruit should be sent.

"With all the advantages and benefits that have followed the introduction of sale by public auction, the auction system has not been able to make it possible for a market that can use but five carloads a day to use ten carloads a day at an equally fair price. Nor is it possible for the human mind to devise a plan that will make a five-carload market handle at a satisfactory price a ten-carload shipment.

"The remedy must lie in the direction of sending to the one-carload market one carload of fruit only; to the five-carload market, five carloads of fruit only, and so on. The surplus, if there be any, must be retained at home, dried, sold to canneries, or, if this cannot be done, then it is better that such surplus shall, for the time being, rot on tree or vine, rather than be permitted to go East and there demoralize the prices for the great bulk of shipments which otherwise would yield fair prices.

"With proper and intelligent distribution, however, there need, as a rule, be no surplus; at least not for years to come. It is to the end that the glutting of markets be hereafter avoided, and that our fruits be more intelligently distributed that the proposed 'Bureau of Information' is advocated."

BEDROOM FURNITURE.

In the first place, speaking for bedrooms as a class, they should be made as cheerful in design as possible. The wall paper, if used, should be lighter, rather than darker, than that in other portions of the house. There should be some character in the design of the paper, especially if by any chance it is possible that the room may be occupied as a sick chamber. How often, as we know, have the eyes of a sick and weak person followed the designs upon the wall paper, hour after hour, and thus brought to the invalid diversion of a wholly gentle and unobtrusive nature. For this purpose, a simple design, capable of awakening interest and attracting attention is better than a picture even of pronounced merit, since the latter is too likely to excite strong emotions, to awaken reminiscences, and to lead the thought in altogether too vigorous a manner.

Pictures need not be banished from the sleeping room altogether. At the same time we must not forget that the primary idea of the apartment is that of rest and repose, of a surcease from anxiety, activity and excitement of any sort. Unless, therefore, the apartment must also be used as a living room to some degree, any picture, or any style of decoration, which represents the spirit of activity is foreign in tone to the primary purpose of the room. On the same principle a surplus of furniture, of books or of bric-a-brac is to be avoided. Surplus garments hanging here and there about the walls are an abomination. Provide for them a closet, wardrobe, trunks or drawers, so that the general aspect of the room may be that of tidiness.

If circumstances permit there should be in each sleeping room, apart from the indispensable furniture and fixtures, a small table, which can be readily moved to any portion of the room, one or two comfortable chairs in which the occupant may sit restfully, and lounge or couch, properly fitted with cushions or pillows, upon which one may drop for a few moments of repose at any hour. And there should, of course, be harmony in the ensemble of the room. Let the prevailing tones match each other, and do not drop into the idea that any odd and ugly article, left over from other apartments or picked up at random, is good enough for this place. There is a distinction between true and false economy, fitness and unfitness, here as elsewhere.—Good Housekeeping.

LOVE WALKED AWAY.

"Did nobody ever tell you that in some far prehistoric time I was in love with my husband?" said Mrs. Romaine carelessly. "Well, I was. I used to go to afternoon services in Lent and pray for that love to last, because the sensation was so much to my taste. I used to have ecstatic feelings when his foot was on the stair, and I sat sewing little baby clothes. We lived in a plainish way then; $3 spent in two theatre tickets was a tremendous outlay; and we walked out to dinners—I tucking up the train of my best gown under a long cloak, and laughing if the wind snatched it away from me at the corners and whipped it around my feet. Then he grew richer and we broadened the borders of our phylactery and then—how—when—dear knows if I can remember, we grew farther and farther away from each other. Now, when he is at home, I am aware of it, because he is there behind a newspaper, but that is all! When our lips meet it is like two pieces of dry pith coming together. I have a perfectly unsurpassed power of annoying him by my presence. I know nothing of his affairs, nor he of mine. Our interests are his, not mine. Our house is mine, not his. All my tastes are 'fads;' but so long as I don't disgrace him he does not interfere. I have money in abundance. Money—money—who cares for money when a man's heart and soul and brain have gone into it? How long is it since he has thought I could want anything from him but a check? But, ah, if I were you and Gordon were my suitor—if, knowing what was to come, I had it all to live over again—I think I would take the bitter present for one taste of the old sweet that never can come back!"—From "A Bachelor Maid" in the Century for October.

It is reported here that John D. Rockefeller and the Standard Oil Company have induced the Amoor Steamship Company to be operated in connection with the transsiberian railroad, to locate the terminus of its transpacific line at Everett, Wash., in which town Mr. Rockefeller is largely interested. The same authority says that arrangements have been made in New York to start the line immediately, and that the new whaleback steamer City of Everett will be operated to Vladivostock, carrying building material for the eastern end of the transsiberian railway. The Great Northern Railway is supposed to be a factor in the combination.

This is the mildest that has appeared in a Kansas newspaper for months. It is from the "Larned Eagle Optic:" "Lafe Pence, the big, awkward, stammering, cracked-voiced, freckled-faced, sandy-haired populist, mixed up some hard sense in his talk to Pawnee County pops last Tuesday."

DURING WAR TIMES.

Suspicion of Secret Plotting in Washington.

THE UNEASINESS THAT PERVADED.

A Loyalist Who Thought Prof. Henry was Signalling to the Enemy—Confederates at the Capital.

Noah Brooks, who was a newspaper correspondent at Washington during the wartime, and who was admitted to an unusual degree of intimacy with Lincoln, has a chapter of reminiscences in the November number of "The Century." Mr. Brooks says:

It is impossible in these days, so remote from the excitements of the civil war, to give readers of the later generation any adequate idea of the uneasiness that pervaded Washington, or of the morbid sensationalism which characterized the conversation and conduct of the loyalists who were constantly haunted by suspicions of secret plotting all about them. One evening, while I was sitting with the President in his cabinet, Prof. Henry, then in charge of the Smithsonian Institution, came in for a social chat with the President. The conversation ran upon various unimportant themes, and presently a card was brought in by the doorkeeper, who said that the man in waiting was extremely urgent to see the President, as he had matters of pressing importance to communicate. He was brought into the room, and proved to be a modest shopkeeper, whose home was not far from the Smithsonian Institution. Glacing uneasily at the President's two visitors, whom he evidently did not know, he said his business was very important and should be kept secret. The President assured him that Prof. Henry and myself were to be trusted with any business of state however secret it might be, and genially encouraged his visitor to speak out without fear of being betrayed in case the weighty matter which he carried in his mind was of an explosive character. The man then went on to say that he had frequently observed lights shown from one of the towers of the Smithsonian Institution late at night. He had noticed that these lights invariably made their appearance about the same time (at midnight), and he was confident that the person displaying them was carrying on a contraband correspondence with the rebels by means of signals. The President, with great gravity, closely examined the witness, but elicited nothing more from him than the fact that the lights were actually shown.

The President said: "Do you suspect anybody in the Smithsonian Institution?"

"No," replied the witness, "I do not know anybody inside of that institution. But I have heard that Prof. Henry is a Southern man and a rebel sympathizer."

With that the President turned to Prof. Henry, and with admirable command of countenance, said: "This is Prof. Henry; perhaps he will be able to answer for himself." The look of dismay on the countenance of the visiting witness was so grotesque that the Prseident could not restrain his laughter. Prof. Henry, who was somewhat disturbed by this expression of suspicion on the part of the well-meaning but mistaken Unionist, very briefly disposed of his tale. He explained that the scientific instruments used to ascertain the direction and force of the wind, temeprature, etc., were examined at certain hours of the day and night for the purpose of taking their record, and that the supposed signal-light in the Smithsonian tower was the lantern carried to the observatory at midnight by the attendant, who made those observations. Somewhat crestfallen, the visitor withdrew, the President thanking him for his vigilance and well-meant promptness in reporting this incident, and adding, as the man departed: "If you should see any indications of a rebel conspiracy in Washington, you will do the country real service by reporting at once to headquarters."

The frequent appearance in Washington of parolled rebel officers, who usually wore their own uniform with evident pride and pleasure, and sometimes with a swagger, generally threw loyalists into a fever of excitmeent. More than once I saw ultra-loyal newsboys or bootblacks throw a lump of mud or a brickbat at the passing Confederate. One of these officers, a Lieutenant Garnett, being on parole, sent in his card to Representative Wickliffe of Kentucky, and was by him introduced upon the floor of the House, where he attracted attention, as well as indignation, from the members present. Presently a wave of excitement seemed to sweep over the galleries, the spectators being visibly affected by the appearance of an officer in full Confederate uniform, sitting on one of the sofas of the House of Representatives. This was intensified when a doorkeeper spoke to the visitor, who rose from his seat, gave a profound and sweeping bow, and withdrew to the outer corridor. It appears that the doorkeeper had told the Confederate that it was contrary to the rules of the House for him to be present.

The annual exodus of Scandinavians from the Northwestern States to the old country has begun, and Minneapolis and Chicago papers estimate that 20,000 of them will have left by December 15th. The cause of this remarkable hegira is twofold—the hard times and the Scandinavian's intense love of the yule-tide days. The Scandinavians can go to the old country and spend the winter and return in the spring at a less expense than they would have living in this country through the winter.

M. M. Estee has either gradually degenerated into a political mountebank or else his brain is turned by his defeat in the recent contest for Governor. Ever unfortunate in not being able to guage the temper of the people, he was never more so than when he put himself under the political management of Dan Burns and his claque of pothouse roysterers, such as Billy Levinson and Charles McCarty, late of the mal odorous Kangaroo salooon on Jibboom street in Fresno. His campaign was unfortunate by reason of the influences which surrounded it. His letters after his defeat were still more unfortunate, for the reason that while he claims in one breath to be utterly indifferent about the result, in the next he manifests an insane desire to be Governer by fair means or foul. He was still more unfortunate in having the matter carried into the Supreme Court—its members Republican—which unanimously agreed that there was no merit in it. By turns, he declares that he was sold out by his own party; thrown down by the rail-road; the A. R. U. opposed him; the G. A. R. was not true; the A. P. A. did it; he was counted out by fraud in San Francisco, and, while he "does not care to be Governor now," he wants enough precincts thrown out in San Francisco to thwart the will of the people and place him in the seat which belongs to James H. Budd, of Stockton; or as the poet lariat of our contemporary has aptly and suggestively dubbed him, "Jim Budd of California." To this end, Estee secured, last Saturday, the appointment of a committee to carry the contest into the next Legislature. He seems to recognize that he has reached the climax of his failures and, having now nothing to lose, has become desperate. If the people of this State could have the privilege of recasting the vote for Governor to-day, with the knowledge of what has taken place since the elections, Mr. Estee would go inio San Francisco with a majority against him. His course satisfies the people that his election would have deen a grave mistake.—Expositor.

The Reno Gazette says:—While the population in strictly mining towns like Eureka, Austin, Tuscorora and Virginia, has dwindled away to some extent, the farming counties have gained. Elko, Humboldt, Washoe and Douglas show slight gains. We are, unquestionably, down to "hard pan," and have been for a decade, but the least revival in bnsiuess possible, or an increase in population would put us on a "paying basis." Even as it is, we are better off than almost any other commonwealth, unless it is perhaps some of the great manufacturing States. The "calamity howlers" who see nothing but degradation for our State will hide their diminished heads in a few years, for Nevada is coming to the front again, not only as a producer of metals, but what is better still, and what all the old States had for a foundation to build upon—great agricultural sources.

The investigation being made in Judge Wallace's court in San Francisco, touching Colonel Dan Burns's method of stuffing the Baldwin Hotel with illegal voters has passed the hosts of the g. o. p. so hard that they have been compelled to contest Budds election in order to draw the public attention away from their crookedness. The respectable element of the Repubican party opposes Colonel Dan Burns and his methods now as they did at the Sacramento convention. They do not sympathize with fraud nor will they approve of the methods of the corrupt ring in San Francisco that has for years debauched all politics.

A financial calamity, such as was never known, has bafallen Newfoundland. Banks have suspended; merchants have closed their doors; the fisheries have suspended operations; work of evey kind has ceased; hundreds of idle men walk the streets; the winter is unusually severe and famine stares the people in the face, and yet, strangest thing of all, Cleveland's administration has not been blamed for all these misfortunes and conditions.

MINE OF LAGER BEER

IT WAS LOCATED IN BALTIMORE'S FAMOUS OLD HILL.

When It Was Uncovered, Residents of South Baltimore For Three Days Drank For Nothing—A Saloon In Federal Hill Which Evaded the Sunday Closing Law.

Famous old Federal hill, over in South Baltimore, was not always as it is, and many still remember its unsightly appearance when it was private property and sand and clay were dug from it to supply the glass works and potteries. This was before the war, but General Butler stopped the undermining when he camped there in 1862.

The only excavation that has been since made there was the magazine built by Colonel Duryea of the zouaves in 1863. This magazine was dug by John H. Walton, called "Groundmole" from the fact that for over 30 years he had been burrowing into Federal hill for the sand and clay.

In the early part of 1850 one of the periodical spasms of a rigid enforcement of all laws swept over the local police department in a virtuous wave, and the order for Sunday closing went forth.

After the populace had gone dry for almost two months a couple of young men felt that duty called them to the rescue of suffering humanity, and having by hard work succeeded in laying by a few dollars they invested it in beer for the public weal. They selected a cave having its entrance on Hughes street, near Covington, they walled up the sides of the entrance, a stout oaken door was put in place, and they took out a license and opened a saloon in the bowels of Federal hill.

As the summer months approached the "Underground" became more popular, as in the darkness of the cave it was always cool and dry, and the flicker of the tallow dips made a weird scene which was a novelty. On Sunday the big door was tightly closed and padlocked, and no violation of the law was noticeable. No other cave on Hughes or Covington street near the entrance to the "Underground" connected with it, and no one ever entered there on Sunday. But around on Warren and Johnson streets occasionally some one would enter the caves. There was no saloon on that side, however, and the police were not suspicious. Those who entered the hill went by many different tunnels to the northeastern part, and there they found, in a large amphitheater, lights and tables and many a jolly party telling stories and drinking in the cool, dry atmosphere of the cavern. From one of the many passageways that led off from this large subterranean room waiters came with the foaming glasses. Fifty feet down this passage was the bar. The business thrived for two years.

In the summer the air in the cave was cooler than it was outside, and in the winter it was warmer. All the year the "Underground" was the favorite resort. The two young men made money, and they increased their liquid stock. Toward the close of the second year they had $2,000 worth of beer stored away near Federal hill.

One night in April, 1852, there was a terrible thunderstorm. About 4 o'clock in the morning a crash shook the whole neighborhood, and when Adam Biddle went to his saloon under Federal hill the next morning he found that the door had been burst open by the weight of loose sand that had fallen and choked up the entrance. The huge padlock had been thrown across the street by the force, and it, with the broken staple, was picked up and is still in possession of Robert Henderson, who was then a mere boy.

Biddle, on discovering the ruin wrought by the storm, sought out his partner, George Snyder, and they tried to effect an entrance to the "Underground" through the other passages, but it was useless. The amphitheater was filled up and all the passages within 100 feet of it. The whole northeastern corner of the hill, at Covington and Hughes streets, had settled down.

With many a regret the buried beer was abandoned and in time forgotten. Biddle and Snyder went into other lines of business and afterward left the city.

One Sunday morning in the fall of 1858 two boys, one of whom was David Clark, now living at 223 Cross street, were playing on the hill. A fresh slide had occurred during the night and left an opening which seemed to be the top of a cave. With boyish glee, unmindful of the danger, they proceeded to explore the cave. They climbed down into the darkness, and as their eyes became used to the gloom they found themselves at the entrance to quite a cavern. They explored it and found it filled at one end with barrels half covered with sand. They soon climbed back out of the hole, and reaching the street told of their find to some young men standing on the corner of Hughes and Covington streets.

The news spread like wildfire. A "rescuing" party was formed, a big barrel was hauled from the cave, glasses appeared as if by magic, the bung was driven, and the amber fluid escaped, the thirsty residents of South Baltimore drinking their fill. There was no stint. Beer flowed like water truly, and as fast as one barrel was empty another was "rescued." The beer had aged and was heavy. The cool earth surrounding it had kept it sweet, and people came from all parts to drink at the fountain which flowed for them without money and without price.

For three days the carousal was continued. Then another cavein occurred, and the beer was again buried, this time probably forever, as no part of it has since been recovered, and piles have been driven into that part of the hill to sustain the terrace and prevent further landslides.—Baltimore World.

DIED OF A BROKEN HEART.

The Remarkable Case of Mrs. Mary Agnes Wolf of New York.

A remarkable instance where death followed a "broken heart" was recorded at the coroner's office Thursday. Mrs. Mary Agnes Wolf, 32 years old, died at her home on Wednesday evening. Dr. J. A. Sanders, who had last attended her, wrote a certificate that death was due to inanition and heart trouble and excessive grief. The board of health rejected the certificate, and it came to the coroner's office.

At the home of the dead woman it was said that she lived with her husband, George Wolf, an employee of the Metropolitan Traction company. Mary Melvin, the aged mother of the dead woman, had shared their humble apartments since the time of their marriage, five years ago. The mother and daughter had been constant companions all their lives. Melvin, who was an Englishman, died when Mrs. Wolf was an infant.

Last October Mrs. Melvin was stricken with a slow but fatal disease. Day and night the daughter waited upon her till her death, in June last.

For a few days Mrs. Wolf wept incessantly. Then a strange melancholy came over her. She ceased speaking of her dead parent, yet there was evidence of terrible inward grief. Her pining soon began to tell upon her health. Her husband talked with her about the folly of keeping the memory of her dead mother in mind, but she would not be consoled. She stopped going out and gradually ceased to partake of food. After a time she became so weak that she was obliged to take to her bed.

The husband returned nightly from his labor and sat by her bedside, imploring her to cheer up and live for his sake. Although she was sound of mind, she refused to pay any attention to her husband's importunities. Dr. Sanders found the woman suffering from no organic troubles and said that she would recover if properly nourished. He recommended that she be removed to a hospital, where she could better regain her strength. His suggestion was not heeded, because Mrs. Wolf declared she wished to die in the bed in which her mother had died. The doctor told her that he could do nothing more for her unless she took sustenance. She did not answer him, but shook her head. On Wednesday she died.

Mrs. Wolf will be buried in Calvary cemetery today. Dr. Cuff of the coroner's office said Mrs. Wolf's death was due to a broken heart. He said this was an instance where the woman's failure to pour out her grief in tears had brought on the disorders that caused her death.—New York Tribune.

INGRATITUDE OF NATIONS.

An Instance of It Toward a Hero of the Franco-German War.

A pathetic story of national ingratitude has been going the rounds of the London papers, which is interesting enough to be repeated, especially as it concerns those days of intense interest during which Paris was last in siege. Publicity has been given it by the fact that the hero of the incident has just gone into a French hospital in poverty, there to die. The Pall Mall Gazette thus tells the tale:

"When the German lines in the autumn of 1870 were gradually closing their boa constrictor grasp round the doomed capital, Durnof was the hero of the hour. An experienced aeronaut, who had three times been dashed into the sea and had run many other narrow escapes, he proposed, with his balloon, Neptune, to carry a mail out of Paris and to run the gantlet of the beleaguering armies. At daybreak on Sept. 23 he set out on his adventurous journey, the director of the posts assuring him as he handed in the dispatches and the pigeons that his courage and devotion would meet with a splendid reward. Durnof succeeded in his task and landed safe and sound at Evreux, but the poor old Neptune was never fit for another ascent."

Twenty-two years elapsed, but the unhappy aeronaut never received a penny from successive governments. Even his claim for the value of his balloon, which had been used till it was destroyed by the military authorities, failed to obtain the slightest recognition. After a couple of decades he got the bronze medal accorded to all who carried dispatches by balloon, and last year a small monthly grant was made, which barely sufficed to keep him from starvation. Swindlers and impostors of all kinds laid the foundation of future fame and fortune in the siege of Paris, but the first man who opened up communications between the imprisoned inhabitants and the outer world seems likely to die in dishonor and despair.

To Monopolize the Shopping Business.

A company has been organized in New York which will try to monopolize the shopping business. It has made an arrangement with the Broadway cable cars, and, it is said, will try to secure the same right on all the other lines, for the use of their front platforms as news and confectionery stands. On each car it will place a uniformed agent, who will sell the things on hand and will also take orders from the passengers for anything that they may want, from "collar buttons to a dress." The passenger has simply to tell the boy what he wants, and when he boards the car again the commission will be executed. The company proposes to make arrangements with a number of large establishments in the city to fill all orders that it brings in at the lowest possible rates.—New York Times.

The Crater Collapsed.

The great lake in Kilauea overflowed its banks on July 8, and on the 12th the lava fell 270 feet in 12 hours, causing the banks to fall in on all sides and engulfing about eight acres of the floor of the crater. The falling of the banks was going on all day and far into the night and produced a sight indescribably grand.—Honolulu Letter.

A Misapplied Text.

The October brew of homemade beer was the celebrated one in Bucks, and the farmer made it of sufficient strength by means of eight bushels of malt to the hogshead of 54 imperial gallons. Once, in an outlying village in Bucks, the rector on a certain Sunday gave out as the text, "First Hebrews, 9 and 10," Whereupon an old fashioned farmer, renowned for his good tap, called out: "And a very pretty tipple too. I brews eight!"—San Francisco Argonaut.

Order of Adjudication of Insolvency.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE County of Inyo, State of California.

Pierre Beyeye and Francois Hagata, Co-partners under the firm name of P. Beyeye & Co., Insolvent Debtors.

Pierre Beyeye and Francois Hagata, Copartners under the firm name of P. Beyeye & Co., having filed in this Court their petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, from which it appears that they are insolvent debtors, the said Pierre Beyeye and Francois Hagata, Co-partners under the firm name of P. Beyeye & Co., are hereby declared to be insolvent. It is hereby ordered that the Sheriff of the said County of Inyo be, and he is hereby appointed Receiver of the property of said insolvents and that upon his giving a bond to the people of the State of California, conditioned as required by law, and in such sum as the Court may order, and qualifying, he take charge and possession of all the estate real and personal, of said insolvent debtors, whatsoever and wheresoever situate, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all their deeds, vouchers, books of account and papers; and to keep and care for and dispose of the same until the appointment of an Assignee of their estate. All persons having the same or any part thereof in his or their possession are hereby directed to deliver said property to said Receiver, and all persons owing money to said insolvents, or either of them, are hereby directed to pay the same to said Receiver, and that said Receiver keep said property, or the proceeds thereof, till the further order of this Court. And all persons are hereby forbidden to pay any debts to said insolvents, or to deliver any property belonging to such insolvents, or either of them, to him or them, or any person, firm, corporation or association for their use, and the said debtors are hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered.

It is further ordered, that all the creditors of said debtors be and appear before the Hon. Geo. M. Gill, Judge of the Superior Court of the said County of Inyo, in open court at the court-room of said court in the town of Independence, in said County of Inyo, on the 22nd day of December, 1894, at 10 o'clock a. m. of that day, to prove their debts and choose one or more assignees of the estates of said debtors. It is further ordered, that this order be published in the Inyo Independendnt, a newspaper of general circulation, published in the County of Inyo, as often as the said paper is published before the day set for the meeting of creditors.

And it is further ordered, that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvents be stayed.

Dated November 14th, 1894.

DIED

MCKILLIPS—At Chrysopolis, Dec. 25, 1894, Alonzo McKillips, a native of Vermont, aged 64 years.

In the death of Mr. McKillips Inyo County loses another of its pioneers. He came here in early days, having lived at Lone Pine as far back as 1868. He was a respectable, law-abiding citizen, and the community loses a useful member of society.

Looks like more snow.

R. C. Spear spent a couple of days in town this week.

Fred Conn of Big Pine spent a couple of days in town this week.

Last Friday, December 21st, was the shortest day of the year.

Louis de Tourney arrived here last Tuesday from a visit to San Francisco.

Robert Louis Stevenson, the novelist, died at Samoa December 3rd.

P. H. Mack Esq., went to Benton last Saturday, returning Monday.

Dr. H. H. Howell is down from Bishop on business in the local Land Office.

Japan is marching into the interior of China against very light resistance.

Eugene Kelley, a pioneer banker of San Francisco, died in New York last week.

All the hotels at Bishop have reduced the price of meals to twenty-five cents.

Mrs. Thos. Callow came down from Big Pine on Wednesday, returning yesterday.

J. C. Miller and George Gillson of Fish Springs spent yesterday at Independence.

General Booth of London, the father of the Salvation Army, visited the Coast the past week.

Messrs Olcese and Fay returned home to Bakersfield early in the week, going south via Mojave,

Whats the matter with Jimmy Fresh? In the words of the song, "what did Bymm do to him?"

Judge Arnot returned to Alpine County on Tuesday. He is expected here again about two weeks hence.

The town seems very quiet this week. the various trials being over and witnesses and jurors returned to their homes.

C. A. Walter of Camp Independence has so far recovered from his late attack of pneumonia as to be out of danger.

Sheriff Gorman is preparing his residence at Camp Independence for occupation, and will remove there with his family soon.

Anxiety is felt for at least ten different vessels at various ports along the coast since the hurricane of two weeks ago.

Johnny Moore's health still remains in a precarious condition. He suffered a relapse yesterday but was better this morning.

The Givens contest case will be heard before Judge Arnot. P. H. Mack Esq. and District Attorney Forbes are attorneys for McGee.

The bad feeling between the whites and negroes in Georgia reached another climax December 22d when seven negroes and one white man were killed.

Contest Filed.

On December 21, 1894 Alney L, McGee filed a complaint in the Superior Court contesting the election of Arthur M. Given. The principal points of the complaint are embodied in sections ten twelve and thirteen, as follows.

X.

That the particular grounds of this contest is that said Defendant unlawfully promised office, place and employment to induce voters to vote for Defendant and to induce voters to refrain from voting for Plaintiff for the said office of Sheriff and Tax Collector at the General Election held in the State of California, and in the said County of Inyo on the sixth day of November, 1894.

XII.

That Plaintiff is informed and believes and therefore alleges that after his nomination as a candidate for said office and before said election, said Arthur M. Given offered and promised to appoint one David Holland who was then and there an elector of said county, Under-Sheriff of said Inyo County and to employ said David Holland as his Under-Sheriff during his term of office, in the event of the election of said Given, to induce said Holland and other voters to refrain from voting for Plaintiff, and to induce said Holland and others to vote for the defendant, the said Arthur M. Given.

XIII.

That Plaintiff is informed and believes, and therefore alleges that after his nomination as a candidate for said office, and before said election, said Arthur M. Given offered and promised to appoint one C. S. Meroney who was then an elector of said County of Inyo, Under-Sheriff of said County of Inyo, and to employ said C. S. Meroney as his Under-Sheriff during his term of office, in the event of the election of the said Arthur M. Given, to induce said C. S. Meroney to refrain from voting for Plaintiff, and induce said Meroney and others to vote for the Defendant, the said Arthur M. Given.

Christmas.

On last Monday evening, Christmas Eve, he young ladies of Independence gave a Christmas tree at the M, E. Church for the little folks. The church was filled at an early hour and a well-selected programme of music and recitations was rendered Old "Santa" then made his appearance and gladdened the youthful heart with a liberal supply of presents, in which Murphy, Ben Yandell, Walter Lamar. and a few other boys were not forgotten. In some way David Holland was overlooked and did not receive his until a couple of days later, by mail. Misses Maggie Gorman, Cora Craig, and May and Elma Parker deserve meritorious mention for their successful efforts to promote the happiness of the little folks.

Wedding Bells.

There was a very pleasant wedding party in Big Pine last Thursday night. The high contracting parties were Tom Callow and Mrs. Williams of Big Pine. The groom was one of the best known and most popular citizens of Hawthorne for many years, and his many friends congratulate him. The bride is well known and greatly esteemed in Big Pine, where she is conducting a hotel. The BULLETIN acknowledges the receipt of wedding cake and exends the season's greetings, hoping that the newly-mated may enjoy a happy and prosperous journey through life.—Walker Lake Bulletin.

Ada Lewis Very Ill.

Mrs. M. Lewis received a telegram yesterday afternoon announcing the serious illness of her daughter, Miss Ada Lewis, at San Francisco. A second message stated that she was sinking rapidly, while a third received late last evening holds out hopes that she might recover. She is suffering with pneumonia, brought on from a severe cold contracted while returning from a visit to Oregon recently.

The weather has been cloudy for a week past, and while there has been no rain in the valley a considerable quantity of snow has fallen in the mountains. It is safe to say that there will be an abundance of water next year.

John McBride, president of the United Mine Workers, was elected president of the American Federation Of Labor in Denver Colorado December 17th. New York was selected as the place to hold the next convention.

Andy Bowen, another pugilist, received his final knock-out at New Orleans December 15th. George Lavigne, his opponent in the ring, was arrested and charged with murder.

Eugene V. Debs, President of the American Railway Union, was found guilty and given six months imprisonment for having taken active part in the last strike.

Mrs. W. L. Hunter, accompanied by her daughter, Miss Nellie, arrived home last Monday, after a visit of several months with relatives in the vicinity of Los Angeles.

W. K. Miller of Lone Pine was in town yesterday. He says that a goodly number of passangers are carried over the Keeler and Mojave stage every trip.

In the Hines case the jury brought in a verdict of not guilty on the first ballot. Both defendants were discharged last Friday evening.

CONTEST NOTICE.

U. S. LAND OFFICE,
INDEPENDENCE, CAL.
December 6, 1894.

Complaint having been entered at this office by William H. Mitchell against Ethel Bigland for failure to comply with law as to Desert Entry No. 558, dated July 23, 1889, upon all of section 23, Township 13 S., R. 35 E., M. D. M. in Inyo county, California. with a view to the cancellation of said entry, contestant alleges that said Ethel Bigland has wholly failed to reclaim, irrigate, or in any manner improve the land embraced in said entry, or any part thereof, within four years from date of entry. That said land is now unreclaimed, unimproved and uninhabited, and in its original arid and desert condition, the said parties are hereby summoned to appeor at this office on the 9th day of February, 1895, at 10 o'clock a. m., to respond and furnish testimony concerning said allegedfailure.

KEEP YOUR MOUTH SHUT.

Great numbers of people go through life with their mouths open day and night. They take into the delicate organs of the mouth and lungs the dust of the street which is filled with the germs of disease, and they breathe into their lungs without the protection intended by nature the noxious elements in the atmosphere and lay the seeds of pulmonary disease and of many other beginnings of imperfect health. A prominent physician in Boston, acting as a throat specialist, remarked that he would have nothing to do if people could only be taught to keep their mouths shut.

If you notice persons on the street you will find that a large porportion of them keep their mouths habitually open, and that they breathe through the mouth instead of the nostrils, never having been taught that this is the special function and use of the nose. In many cases the nostrils have become so impaired by disuse that they are practically filled up so that it is impossible to breathe through them, and then it is only after a great deal of effort that they are made to resume their natural functions.

The importance of breathing through the nose is very great in the case of public speakers and readers, who, if they take in air through the mouth, are usually afflicted with dryness of the throat which speedily develops into some form of bronchial disease. This is the origin of the clergymen's sore throat. People living in the country, and never thinking of the use of the nostrils, easily form the habit of ignoring their use. It is said that people who sleep with their mouths open are usually snorers. The habit of disusing the nostrils is one that is overcome with difficulty but unless it is formed, people living in cities needlessly expose themselves to all sorts of disease that attack and enfeeble the lungs.—Herald.

OCCUPATIONS OF THE FRENCH.

Some very interesting facts about France are quoted by one of the Paris papers. We are told that one-half of the population of France is dependent on agriculture for a living, one-quarter on industry, one-tenth on commerce four-hundredths on liberal professions, and six-hundredths on income derived from funded property or stock. The number of land owners cultivating their own land is 9,176,000; bankers and merchants are set down at 789,000; manufacturers give employment to over 7,000,000; state functionaries form an army 805,000 strong, and there are 23,000 journalists and men of letters.—London Tablet.

Adam Hoefly, an erratic young farmer, near Ashley, Ill., has discovered a secret process of photographing bank notes on steel. He made and circulated $20 silver certificates, but an inquisitive banker noticed that the Treasury seal on the $20 Manning silver certificates belonged on a national bank note, and Hoefly's arrest followed. The new process of photographing directly from the object to the plate may revolutionize the engraver's business.

SHOULD THE GOVERNMENT ACT

To Suppress Fraudulent Advertisements of World's Fair Awards?

Letters from both the Chief of Awards (on Agriculture) at the Chicago World's Fair, Mr. J. S. Browning, and the Judge of Awards on Baking Powders, expose the falsity of the claim made in behalf of a Chicago baking powder that it received the highest award for leavening power, keeping qualities, purity and general excellence.

The Judge of Awards says that this claim is false, that no such award was given to that baking powder.

Mr. Browning in his letter already published also shows that there was no award given to the Chicago company for the best baking powder.

It now appears further that the analyses of the powders exhibited showed a baking powder made in New York altogether the superior of the Chicago powder in both purity and strength.

The Government has prohibited the use for advertising purposes of the medals awarded by the Fair. It would be a great protection to the public if the Government would also prohibit the publication of false claims such as those that have been exposed in relation to such awards.

The only official competitive test of a national character, from which consumers can obtain the actual facts as to the relative values of all the principal brands of baking powder of the country, is that made by the Agricultural Department at Washington, D. C. It so happens that this was conducted by the same eminent chemist who acted as Judge of Awards at the Chicago Columbian Fair. As has already been published, at this examination the Royal Baking Powder was found to be the superior powder and highest in leavening strength.

It is the medicine above all others for catarrh, and is worth its weight in gold. I can use Ely's Cream Balm with safety, and it does all that is claimed for it.—B. W. Sperry, Hartford, Conn.

IN A CHINESE RESTAURANT.

One In Washington In Which All the Dishes Are In Disguise.

Since the arrival of Moy Sam in town things have changed. He has taken one of the houses on the south side of the avenue between Third and Four-and-a-half streets, and here on the second floor he has opened a regular first class Chinese restaurant, such as one can find in the Chinese quarter of any of the large western cities—Denver, Portland or San Francisco. This is primarily intended for the benefit of the Chinese residents of the city, and here the homesick subjects of the Sunset Kingdom may come and regale themselves with all of their most fondly remembered home dishes, smoked oysters, dried ducks' feet, bird's nest soup and preserved, candied and conserved things galore, for the Chinese are master hands at the art of preserving, and they can put up anything from jellyfish to conserved citron so that it will keep for 100 years and cook up fresh and inviting at the end of that time.

But, though the main room of the restaurant is for the Chinese residents, where they may smoke their pipes and cigarettes and discuss the latest news of the Korean situation, there are private rooms where a party of Americans can be accommodated, and Moy Sam makes it a point to see that his visitors have a good time and have a chance to test all the products of his Chinese chef. The restaurant may be said to be run on the European plan.

When a visitor takes his seat, the straw slippered waiter flaps into the room and sets down a little of this and a little of that and keeps on going back for more till he is stopped, bringing something different each time. The visitor takes all he wants, and when the meal is over Moy Sam comes in, counts up the damage that has been done to the various dishes and charges accordingly. One can get as much as he wants of the various dishes for a quarter, and an outlay of half a dollar would stall even a professional diner out.

If the visitor wills it, he can have chopsticks with his meal, but for purposes of utility they are nil. The slender round pieces of snow white elephant ivory about 18 inches long are very pretty to look at and sharpened up would make capital knitting needles, but to investigate the inside of a Chinese doughnut with them or to explore the mysteries of a "gau tur" is like attempting to pick a combination lock with a hairpin or scoop up a drop of mercury with a three tined fork.

The best way is to submit to using a plain American knife and fork, which come on demand without extra charge, but there is a smile that is childlike and bland in the eye of the Celestial when he looks at the discarded ivories resting on the far side of your plate.

The first ceremony of the dinner is tea-making, and that is where the native of tea land gives the Americans a pointer. A thin porcelain bowl in a little, round, polished brass saucer is brought to each person, and in it is put the tea leaves, the sort of tea that sells for $5 a pound, and which never sees the inside of an American grocery store. On the tea leaves is poured boiling water, and over the bowl is inverted a saucer which just fits inside the rim and acts as a strainer for the tea leaves. The eggshell cups stand on the side, and the attendant initiates the tyro into the art of pouring out the tea without getting the leaves, burning one's fingers or spilling it on the tablecloth. There is no profanation of that tea with milk or sugar, and no one thinks to ask for either.

On the side of each place is a tiny cup that does not hold more than a good sized thimbleful, and with it a little china caraffe, with a spout on one side and a funny little concave lid that is held in place with the forefinger while the beverage is poured out. This is for "onga bey," or Chinese rose wine, a colorless, aromatic liquid, a tiny cupful of which goes with each course.

Then come the dishes in disguise. The first thing, when the meal is the light midday luncheon, is "tem sum," a curious little dumpling about 1½ inches in diameter, shaped exactly like a fishing creel. It is made of rice flour, and on top is traced a delicate figure in cochineal or some other like coloring matter, to "make it look pretty," as Moy explained, on the same principle of pepper thumbs on a boiled ham. The dumpling is hollow, and inside is stuffed with an utterly unfathomable compound of ham, lobster, roast beef, boiled duck and "ten a 'leven" other things, as Moy explains, to make it taste good. With the dumplings come little shallow plates, like artists' color cups, of highly seasoned, spicy sauce, not unlike Worcestershire. The next is a different grade of dumpling, made of a slightly different colored dough and stuffed with even a more varied mixture of grated meats and vegetables, prominent among which is Chinese cabbage, and the general odor of which is that of a pair of canvasbacks that are "just right." This is shaped like a half tied tobacco pouch and is known in the vernacular as "gau tur."

Then come the sweet things. Bread is known as "bow," but this, too, comes on disguised. It is in the form of a round dumpling of dry boiled dough, ornamented on the top in mystic hieroglyphics and filled inside with a sweet preserved mixture of groundnuts and "li che queong."

The meal is wound up with Chinese doughnuts with an unspellable name, but looking not unlike brown tennis balls and filled with another surprising mixture of sweet conserves, almost too sweet for an American palate to stand. The other features of the dessert are brown jelly, cut in nervous, agitating slabs and sprinkled thickly with dried tomato seeds, conserved citron, clear almost as amber and tasting like fresh pulled fruit.

Cigarettes and a final sip of onga bey close the meal. And the cost is 30 cents.

The regular dinner is heavier and contains roast beef, boiled duck, stewed chicken and smoked oysters, all of which are paid for on the European plan.—Washington Post.

His Ideal.

To live content with small means, to seek elegance rather than luxury and refinement rather than fashion; to be worthy, not respectable, and wealthy, not rich; to study hard, think quietly, talk gently, act frankly; to listen to stars and birds, to babes and sages with open heart; to bear all cheerfully, do all bravely, await occasions, hurry never—in a word, to let the spiritual, unbidden and unconscious grow up through the common—this is to be my symphony.

How Thoughtful!

Captain Irons—You people had better take to the boats at once. I propose to stick to the ship.

Mrs. Giddy—Oh, captain, if you'll only get them to open the place where they put my husband's luggage, you can get a pair of rubbers to keep your feet from getting wet!—Fort Worth Gazette.

CANTON STREET SCENES.

Some of the Picturesque Sights In the Busy Chinese City.

Florence O'Driscoll, a member of the English house of commons, has a timely article, "In the Streets of Canton," in The Century. Of the street scenes in Canton Mr. O'Driscoll writes:

Little if any sunlight struck down into these ways. Their narrowness would have prevented the intrusion of any but vertical beams or those slanting parallel with the street, and to guard against even these a shade loving people had hung matting overhead. This gave the city the aspect of a huge straggling bazaar sheltered beneath a great ragged roof.

The thoroughfares in the older portions of the city vary from about 4 to 6 or 7 feet in width. In the newer quarters there are frequently 10 and even 15 feet of space between the houses on each side.

These narrow ways were thronged with tens of thousands of people. Looking along them, it seemed almost as if one could walk upon men's heads, so close were they. High and low, rich and poor, all rubbed shoulders. Coolies, naked save for loose drawers rolled high up the thighs, carried on each end of a six foot stick water, firewood and burdens of various sorts. When an exceptionally heavy load was to be carried, some four coolies bore it, slung on the middle of a bamboo, two at each end of the pole. Peddlers carried their wares in baskets slung at each end of a stick, or in flat trays hung like an old fashioned pair of scales, with the pole or beam on their shoulders. Carriers thus bore creels of fruit, fish and all sorts of esculents; live rats, cats and dogs in wicker baskets; fat pigs in wicker cylinders, sometimes with their legs hanging out, and boxes, bales and trays of toys. Through the throng exalted Chinamen, fan in hand, in silken gowns and with cues pendent far down the back, made their slow way in dignity. There were plenty of women and children also in the crowd, some of the women hobbling painfully along on their tortured and distorted feet, which, from the tight binding, were so shrunken and diseased that their shin bones had become fleshless skeleton supports covered with a wrinkled parchment skin, and their legs seemed to be little better than gnarled and knotted stumps. Occasionally an empty chair was seen in this crowd, or a chair in which sat some mandarin, with awning and delicately fashioned lattice blinds closely drawn, or a man who hawked small wares or sweets for sale and carried in one hand a little flat metal plate and a string with a small weight tied to one finger. With each twitch of his finger a clear musical note rang sharply in the air. Ping, ping, ping! sounded his little gong, heralding his approach from a long way off. Who knows? Perhaps from this primitive but artistic appliance has in the course of ages been evolved our muffin bell—sweet music in the ears of those setting forth in quest of 5 o'clock teas. Anon our progress was checked by a funeral procession, which struggled past us amid a blare of discordant trumpets, beating of gongs and screeching of stringed instruments, the mourners bearing aloft paper and tinsel dolls, bright streamers or little trays of food and sticks of incense.

The coolies, who had their cues knotted up, wore for the most part a hat shaped like a flat lamp shade about two feet across. A little cup shaped wicker basket fixed underneath it held this covering ever their heads, and it served more as a sun and rain shade for the body than an actual head covering. Clerks, merchants and well to do people carried their cues loose and were either bareheaded or covered with a black satin or very fine black wicker skullcap, with a coral button on the top.

Every one seemed busy, no one seemed unhappy, each individual was polite and prepared to make way for another. To keep to the right was the rule of the road, a rule strictly adhered to, without which all progress would have been impossible. As I looked along the crowded way I could see always two long lines of people in single file passing one another and keeping close to their respective right sides. In places the streets so narrowed in that passersby rubbed shoulders. Every one stood aside for the passage of a funeral or a priestly procession, after which the acknowledged order of precedence was first a chair with a passenger, though even this moved aside to allow a passage to the lowest class laborer staggering beneath a heavy load, then any person carrying a load and lastly those who were unencumbered by burdens. A mandarin on foot or a wealthy merchant with a richly embroidered gown moved aside to allow the cooly wood carrier to pass alone uninterrupted. There were no policemen at corners to regulate traffic. Old established custom, based on a policy of mutual obligation, took the place of a man in blue.

Cromwell Fond of Sport.

Cromwell, like his brothers in arms, is often described as a morose and gloomy fanatic. We hear of him going through days of sorrow because he had partaken in some innocent enjoyment. He always had a great fear of the evil one. The real Cromwell, however, was by no means afraid to enjoy himself or averse to amusements. "Oliver," as one of his officers observes, "loved an innocent jest, and especially a practical jest." Under the cuirass of the general or the royal robe of the protector he was always an athletic country gentleman of sporting tastes. His royalist biographers make his early taste for athletics one of their charges against him. He learned little at Cambridge, says "Carrion" Heath, "and was more famous for his exercises in the fields than in the schools, being one of the chief matchmakers and players of football, cudgels or any other boisterous sport or game." He "was soon cloyed with studies," adds Bates, "delighting more in horses and in pastimes abroad in the fields."

This much we may safely believe, but Heath is probably inventing when he informs us that after Mr. Cromwell returned to his home at Huntingdon "his chief weapon in which he delighted, and at which he fought several times with tinkers, peddlers and the like, was a quarter staff, at which he was so skillful that seldom did any overmatch him."—Macmillan's Magazine.

War Craft of Samoa.

The skill and ingenuity displayed in making and finishing large Samoan canoes are something remarkable, for the reason that the planks are of such uneven lengths and widths and every part is fastened by fiber. Canoes for fishing outside the reefs are partially decked over at each end and ornamented with carving and shells. They are good sea boats and run close to the wind.

The war canoe, called an alia, is a double affair on the catamaran order. This is made by decking over two large canoes. On this platform is built a fort, formed of green cocoanut logs. This floating fort is pushed up close to the shore near some village or earthworks and a bombardment carried on from it against the enemy.

Many of the canoes are rigged with sails, which are frequently of ordinary sailcloth. The Samoan sail proper, however, is made of native mats sewed together, forming a triangle. The apex is fastened at the bottom of the canoe and one side made fast to the mast.

The natives construct a very ingenious temporary sail of cocoanut leaf by splitting the heavy rib down the center of the leaf and weaving the small leaflets together in the center. The two pieces of rib stiffen the outer edges of the sail, one side of which is tacked fast to the mast and the other lashed at the bottom to a projecting stick.—Outing.

An international telephone system to cover all Europe with its net work is one of the latest movements to bring the nations into more intimate and more peaceful relations with each other. The cities of Amsterdam, Rotterdam, Brussels and Antwerp are already connected by telephone, and the extension of the lines is a question of only a little time.

The people of Fond du Lac, Wis., had their ears almost split last week by terrific noises that came from behind Bill Epplescott's barn. The Mayor and several of the Common Council made an investigation, and found that the sounds proceeded from the throat of the bass singer of the Lyceum. He had a large demijohn half full, and he was practicing, he said, for the Christmas concert. They stopped him.

A peculiar glow-worm is found in the flat, marshy lands of the interior of Patagonia. It is about twice the length and thickness of the ordinary caterpillar, and possesses the power of changing the color of its lamp from purple to yellow, and from yellow to red. Two brushes are attached to the fore legs of the insect, and these are used at regular intervals to keep the lenses of the lamp in order.

At an egg-eating contest, Elk Springs, Mo., Will Farnsworth ate 146 eggs in 64 minutes. His competitor, Arlie Lake, successfully disposed of 119, when he struck a china nestegg, which had been surreptitiously introduced into the basket by an enemy. He claimed a foul, and when Farnsworth said he had a basket full, a free fight was started on account of the staleness of the pun. An old soldier lost his wooden leg in the melee.

Bedloe Hogswog, of Upper Sandusky, Ohio, is the owner of a mule which has been taught to keep the flies off the baby by wagging its ears over the cradle. The sagacious creature also pumps water from the well, carries in wood for the fire, and is now learning to turn the wringing machine at the washtub.

A PERTINENT PARAGRAPH.

"Our country if right, should be kept right; if wrong, should be put right," is a political maxim which paraphrased applies to other conditions of life, thus: our health if right, should be kept right; if wrong should be put right; especially in bodily ailments, such as pains and aches, which St. Jacobs Oil promptly cures. Many out of work should heed to give it a chance to cure and it will give them a chance to go to work cured. Another adage is; "he doeth best, who doeth well." Well, of course, you want to be well from all sorts of aches, and the best thing to do is to use the great remedy. He who does so is doing well indeed.

Without economy none can be rich, and with it few will be poor.

Dizzy Spells

Mr. E. Stiff, proprietor of the Centennial Rolling and Floor Mills, Dailey, Mich., tells the following story of his troubles and the relief afforded by Hood's Sarsaparilla:

Mr. E. Stiff

"Six months ago I was in very poor health. I had stomach and bowel trouble, dizzy spells, also very sick turns of stomach, with beating and throbbing of chest and head. I was Nearly Deaf in the right ear. It seemed like a sawmill running in my head. I used two and one-half bottles of Hood's Sarsaparilla when I felt a change for the better. My hearing has been restored and all the other troubles have vanished, so I feel like a new man. I keep Hood's Sarsaparell on hand, also Hood's Pills." E. STIFF, Dailey, Mich.

HAUNTED!

A haunted house in these practical and unromantic days is something of a rarity, but an individual haunted with the idea that his ailment is incurable is a personage frequently met with. Disbelief in the ability of medicine to cure is only a mild form of monomania, although in some cases repeated failures to obtain relief from many different sources would almost seem to justify the doubt. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters has demonstrated its ability to overcome dyspepsia, constipation, liver and kidney trouble, malarial complaints and nervousness, and its recorded achievements in the curative line ought at least to warrant its trial by any one troubled with either of the above ailments, even although his previous efforts to obtain remedial aid have been fruitless. Used with persistence, the Bitters will conquer the most obstinate cases.

CONSUMPTION

IN Society women often feel the effect of too much gayety—balls, theatres, and teas in rapid succession find them worn out, or "run-down" by the end of the season. They suffer from nervousness, sleeplessness and irregularities. The smile and good spirits take flight. It is time to accept the help offered in Doctor Pierce's Favorite Prescription. It's a medicine which was discovered and used by a prominent physician for many years in all cases of "female complaint" and the nervous disorders which arise from it. The "Prescription" is a powerful uterine tonic and nervine, especially adapted to woman's delicate wants for it regulates and promotes all the natural functions, builds up, invigorates and cures.

Many women suffer from nervous prostration, or exhaustion, owing to congestion or to disorder of the special functions. The waste products should be quickly got rid of, the local source of irritation relieved and the system invigorated with the "Prescription." Do not take the so-called celery compounds, and nervines which only put the nerves to sleep, but get a lasting cure with Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription.

"FEMALE WEAKNESS."

MRS. HOOVER.

MRS. WILLIAM HOOVER, of Bellville, Richland Co., Ohio, writes: "I had been a great sufferer from 'female weakness;' I tried three doctors; they did me no good; I thought I was an invalid forever. But I heard of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, and then I wrote to him and he told me just how to take it. I took eight bottles. I now feel entirely well. I could stand on my feet only a short time, and now I do all my work for my family of five."

Fat

Is wanting in most foods, or, if present, is not assimilated. The result is loss of flesh and strength.

Scott's Emulsion

the Cream of Cod-liver Oil, is a palatable, easy fat food that any stomach can retain and any system assimilate without effort. It gives flesh and strength. Physicians, the world over, endorse it.
